He called for a new world order in which all nations recognized the kingdom of Christ, the “king of Kings and Lord of Lords”, and drew attention to recent “external” events which should be considered in “the light of eternity.”¹¹ Referring to his personal role as pope, Pius XII wrote: “It has pleased God in His inscrutable Providence to entrust to Us, through no merit of Our own, the rank of Supreme Bishop and the burdensome anxieties of that office ...” Evidence of unshaken loyalty towards the Roman Bishop had reached him from every side giving “... full recognition to that quality of Head Priest and Supreme Shepherd which God's will has bestowed upon him ...” and “We had begun to feel already the difficulty of sustaining the weight laid upon us by the supreme power God's will had entrusted to Us.” The section on the growth of secularism began with the expression: “Christ, who has made Us His Vicar ...” which had been popularized in the hunt for concordats. The expression was carried right through the encyclical but notably in the section on civil authorities and their relationship to the church.

Referring to the church he wrote of the “...abundant proof of the indivisible unity which reigns in the Catholic Church; a unity which may be compared to a wall or rampart, that attaches itself more surely and more closely to Blessed Peter's impregnable citadel, in proportion as the boastful power of Christ's enemies makes greater head.” Gracious memories (of that Catholic unity) “...sweetened for Us those first months of Our Pontificate, even while We had to undergo the labours, the anxieties, and the perils which grow like thorns about the path of Jesus Christ's mystical Bride.” And according to the self styled Vicar of Christ “The Catholic Church, the City of God, whose king is truth, whose law is charity, whose frontier is eternity, on the one hand teaching truths that cannot deceive and cannot diminish, on the other hand moved by her motherly love to laborious deeds of Christian charity, herself, a blessed vision of peace, towers above the waves of falsehood and of human ambition.”

Those “waves of falsehood and of human ambition had turned the world into a very sorry place in the pope's view and with that few people would disagree. However not everyone would apportion the blame in the manner that he did, nor agree with his vision of the church which reads just like what it was – a blend of propaganda, politicking, another historical cover-up and self delusion on a grand scale.

Discussing the state of the world, Pius XII wrote:

Mankind, all through these years, has lacked both inspiration and guidance; it has been driven from its true course; it has allowed itself to become engulfed in worldly aims, and has grown weary and wretched in the pursuit of nothing else ... (and) ... The beginning of all the troubles which are driving this age of ours by a headlong course into spiritual bankruptcy and impotence for virtue, is the impious attempt to dethrone Christ. There are men who repudiate the law of truth which He has given us, who reject the commandments of that love, whose gentle breath inspires and invigorates all His leadership of us. The only means by which men can be brought back into the way of salvation are reverence for Christ on His royal throne, recognition of His kingly rights, and the restoration both of the individual and of society to the obedience which they owe to the law of Christian truth and charity ... (and) ... Even as We write these lines, Worshipful Brethren, the terrible news comes to Us that, in spite of all the prayers We offered to avert them, the fires of war have been lit.

That phrase is very important in considering the timing of the release of the encyclical. We know that first, the drafting of the encyclical began in July and was well in hand when the pope issued two statements a few days apart about the time of the German Catholic Bishops' Conference, and second the "fires of war" had been well and truly lit when Hitler invaded Poland on September 1, or perhaps even earlier, when the Catholic chaplains were called for their briefing in mid August in accordance with the secret annex to the Reich concordat, and third, Summi Pontificatus is dated Friday, October 20, several weeks after the partition of Poland, for public reading a week later, on the Feast of Christ the King, Sunday, October 29. That phrase therefore indicates that the preparation, editing and release of the rambling 46 page encyclical was carefully timed to ensure reading on a day which was highly provocative in interfaith relations: the Feast of Christ the King.

...Our heart sickens, as a father's heart must, at the prospect of the harvest which will grow up from the dark seeds of violence and animosity, for which war is now tracing furrows in blood. And yet, as We think of the bitter troubles that are now brewing, and shudder at the thought of worse troubles to come, We feel it Our duty all the more to direct men's minds and hearts, where goodwill is still to be found amongst them, towards Him who alone can bring salvation to mankind. His hand, merciful and almighty, can check the raging of this tempest. His truth, His love, can enlighten the understanding and kindle the resolve of those many who are now tossed upon the waves of error, the tide of reckless self-love, the waves of animosity and strife. They must be brought back, they must be informed anew, to the holy pattern and spirit of Jesus Christ.

There was no mention of the term "Jew" or "Communist" and ambiguity prevailed, as usual, so that every non-Catholic was supposed to get a message. However, quite clearly, this is one of the passages in the encyclical which was aimed at Jews and at the Christians of Russia who had succumbed to the anti-religious teachings of Marxism. In the case of the Jews, the encouragement was for Catholic proselytizing. In the case of Russia's Christians, the encouragement – or incitement – was for either another attempt at a religion-led counter revolution ('kindled and fanned by desire for heavenly things') or absorption in due course by courtesy of the Reich Concordat which would come into play when Hitler conquered Russia. Catholicization of Russia would follow the same pattern as the attempted Catholicization of Abyssinia following Mussolini's invasion of that country. (chapter 20) That passage was quite consistent with a number of other passages, such as the one which follows, which makes implied references to the Reich Church, Protestant churches generally, Nazism, Communism, Judaism and perhaps Islam as well, but few people would have been concerned about that. After all it didn't normally rate a mention and if it did it was called Arab politics in Palestine.

We see an immense multitude of our human brothers and sisters who have been blinded by error or charmed away by passion, or led into false paths by prejudice. They have wandered far from true faith in God and from belief in the saving Gospel of Jesus Christ. Who would not feel his heart glow with charity, who would not readily go out of his way to rescue them? We all belong to Christ's army, some holding rank among the priesthood, some among the faithful laity; all alike must feel impelled to mount guard more watchfully than before. We see the array of Christ's enemies growing ever more dangerously. We see the preachers of a lying doctrine at work. They either deny the saving truth and power of the Christian faith, or at least exclude it from all influence on human lives. Nay, their impiety goes so far, that they are not content merely to break the tables of God's law; they substitute another rule of life in its place, which utterly repudiates both the elements of morality set forth in the revelation on Sinai, and that divine influence which breathes upon us from Christ's Cross and from His sermon on the mount.

You will receive this Our first Encyclical Letter, Worshipful Brethren on the approaching feast of Christ the King"... "May the reign of Christ spread and flourish everywhere. The dedication of the human race to the Sacred Heart of Jesus Christ, which will be made on that day with solemn observance and with special devotion, ought to rally the faithful of all nations to the altar of their Eternal King"... "May (grace) be granted to those, too, who have no knowledge of a divine Redeemer, or have, to their cost, deserted Him. May countless millions of Christian folk offer their prayer to God on this Solemnity, that "the light which enlightens every man coming into the world" may mark out for us with its brightness the path of salvation, and that grace from above may kindle and fan the desire for heavenly things in the restless hearts of those who have gone astray; that this desire may force them back upon Him, who even now, from the bloodstained throne of His Cross, is their most eager advocate, ready to be "the way, the truth, and the life" for them as for us.

Then came the punch line, addressed to the clergy.

As you know, Worshipful Brethren, the reason why the principles of morality in general have long since been set aside in Europe is the defection of so many minds from Christian doctrine, of which Blessed Peter's See is the appointed guardian and teacher. As the centuries rolled over Europe, its nations were welded together by that doctrine, and it was the Christian spirit which formed them. Ennobled by the Cross, humanized and civilized by its influence, they reached such a high level of statesmanship and of citizenship that they could pass on the lesson they had learned, in its various forms, to the other nations and countries of the world.

By means of that simple statement Pius XII confirmed that his historical perspective was no better than that of his predecessors and he joined them in perpetuating the myth by which European colonial policies had been justified for hundreds of years. The same idea appears in other passages of the encyclical. He continued:

Then a time came when many of the Christian Family separated themselves from the infallible teaching of the Church; and it was after that that they went, alas, even further, and rejected the very doctrine of our Saviour's divinity, which is the fountain and the focus of all Christian teaching. In doing this, they were hastening on a general deterioration and decline of the religious idea.

The Gospel tells us that when Christ our Lord was nailed to His Cross 'There was darkness over all the face of the earth.' It was a mournful parable of what has happened before now and continually happens, when men lose their faith in religion" ... "This goes so far, that the individual citizen, the life of the family, and the commonwealth as a whole are all removed from the kindly, wholesome influence of God and of His Church. Then, day by day, the symbols and the symptoms of those errors which corrupted the heathens of old, declare themselves more plainly and more lamentably. And all this in parts of the world where the light of Christian civilization has shone for centuries; 'Darkness came on when they nailed Jesus to His Cross.' [Emphasis added.]

So there we have it. The darkness over the earth was, according to Pius XII, the fault of the Jews, the Marxists and the reformers jointly. No wonder Hitler approved of the encyclical. The German resistance movement was based around groups of Protestant clergy at that stage and Hitler certainly agreed with the sentiment about both the Jews and the crucifixion of Christ, and the Marxists who had deserted the church, the failures of which he was about to correct. He had said so repeatedly.

The pope then proceeded to criticize certain actions of civil states, including interference with private enterprise (a reference to Communism); his own interpretation of racism (which could be interpreted in various ways as a reference to Hitler by those who wished to read that into it especially, to the United States or to the Jewish community but certainly not to the church); moral laxity; and states which tried to survive without links with the Vatican. The "natural law", based on the notion of God as almighty creator, father of us all, supreme and perfect law giver, wise and just rewarder of human conduct whose will was administered through the church by the Vicar of Christ through whom all earthly authority flowed to states and civil authorities, was being ignored. Some nations even "impiously endeavour to dissociate the civil authority from any connexion at all with the Divine Being ..." while the tendency to lose sight of "that kinship and love which ought to bind human beings to one another" was disastrously widespread.

According to Pius XII it was the neglect and repudiation of the religion and morality of the Roman Church which had led to such errors. There was absolutely no hint of any responsibility for racial bigotry on the part of the church but that would hardly be expected. For one thing it would have required an openness of mind and historical perception which he clearly did not have and, for another, such an admission would have been counter to the concept of papal infallibility which Pius XII was still expounding, even in Summi Pontificatus. In fact in an effort to counter criticism that the Church of Rome was a threat to civil authority and had “an enervating effect on her subjects” the pope wrote that “...the Church is as far removed as possible from any intention of that kind; that she stretches out her motherly arms to men, not asking to have dominion over them but, in every possible way, to be their servant. She does not seek to intrude herself into the position occupied, in a special and perfectly legitimate way, by secular authorities. Rather, she aids them in their mission, filled with the spirit and following in the steps of Him who “went about doing good.”

“The Church enjoins and preaches that obedience and respect should be paid to earthly powers, which derive from God their high mission ...” and “she inspires (her subjects) with noble ideals, she gives them strength of character, as long as they remain true to the utterance of conscience. It is not likely that she, who has given civilization to so many races and peoples, should be guilty of having retarded the course of human progress; mother-like, she welcomes it with joy.” “...the history of the last nineteen centuries well illustrates the truth of what Holy Scripture says, that the man who resists God can have no peace. Christ only is that “cornerstone” upon which civil society like the life of the individual man, must rest if it will rest secure ... (and) ... conflicts, national and international, are increasing the strength and vigour of her life, are winning her new triumphs, weaving fresh crowns for her. Whereas those other institutions which are not founded upon the doctrine of Jesus Christ, must sink sooner or later into the shifting sands which are their treacherous support.”

THE POPE'S 'FINAL SOLUTION'

Then we come to the pope's version of a simple 'final solution' to all the world's ills. Follow the marvelous example of Mussolini, sign a concordat with the Vicar of Christ the King and all will be well. Or at least the government will have the backing of the Catholic hierarchy and its subjects while it pleases them.

Italy has, since the Providential signing of the Lateran Treaty, held a place of honour among the states which have regularized relations with the Roman Bishop.” “The peace of Christ restored to Italy” by these undertakings has shone out like a happy dawn, holding out the promise of peace and brotherhood in church and state alike ...

...our present troubles may have the effect of opening many blind eyes, teaching men to give serious thought to the claims of Christ and the office of His church, and see them in their proper light; that all those who control the destinies of nations may give the Church freedom of action, enabling her to fashion and to establish a new order in the world, based on the interests of justice and of peace. The church cannot play her part as a peace maker, as long as obstacles are put in her way to hinder her in her divinely appointed mission...

...And We, as the Vicar on earth of Him who is hailed by the prophet as “the Prince of peace,” address Ourselves to the rulers of states and all those on whose activities the state in any way depends, urging them to let the Church enjoy at all times the full freedom which is her right; let her carry out her work of education, shew the truth to men’s minds, instill justice into their hearts, and give them the love of Jesus Christ to be their refreshment.

There are few who turn their eyes with a newly-awakened hope to the church, citadel of truth and love, and to this See of Blessed Peter. They aim at finding some machinery to control the storms which are now threatening to wreck civilization, and they realize with regret that human efforts have failed. They know that the Church can give back to them that unity of religious and moral outlook which, in earlier times, preserved peaceful relations between the peoples of the world. Many, on whom the destinies of nations depend, finding continual disappointment in the institutions which they formerly trusted, look back with wistful longing to that earlier unity ...

They see the indomitable firmness with which the Church, for nearly twenty centuries, has professed her faith and has ordered men’s lives according to Christ’s commandments. They see the closely knit ranks of the Catholic hierarchy, which, in allegiance to the Prince of the Apostles, teaches the truths of the Gospel, directs souls towards their sanctification, and, all the indulgences of its motherly heart towards the sinner, can still stand unmoved in the face of bitter persecution and of martyrdom itself, when the time comes to settle a controversy with the words: It is not lawful. [Emphasis added.]

The Peace of Christ maintained with the indomitable firmness of the close knit clergy included, of course, the thrust of the Fascist Manifesto of the Italian Race except to the extent that the Vatican had declared the coincidental Italian regulations on marriage to be in conflict with Catholic canon law. (chapter 21) Pius XII devoted the later pages of the encyclical to a call for concerted Catholic lay action in support of the church’s hierarchy in whatever country they lived whether it was Italy, Britain, the United States, Germany, Poland or elsewhere. It was the infamous “neutrality” philosophy which could have undermined papal ultramontaniam but which, when coupled with the sections aimed at civil governments, placed enormous bargaining power in the hands of Vatican-appointed diplomats in countries of the Western Alliance and propped up the anti-Semitic policies of Germany and Italy at the same time.

Somewhat surprisingly, the pope had even drawn praise from some Jewish commentators on the subject of racial policies because of his fundamentalist reference to all mankind being descended from the Biblical Adam and Eve and by his often quoted use of the words of “the Apostle of the Gentiles” to the effect that there is no distinction between Gentile or Jew, slave or freeman. However they were no different to Western politicians. They were clutching at words with which to support their particular position and in the hope of relieving anti-Semitic pressure. Other statements in the encyclical actually gave them little more to be happy about than the section about darkness over the earth.

Bitter contentions are dividing the minds of men at this time and rending the unity of the human family. At this time, then, all Our children scattered throughout the world, shall have proof that the teaching, the practice, the mind of the Church is unchanged. She can never recede from the position taken by the Apostle of the Gentiles, when he wrote: "Clothe yourselves in the character of the new man, the man who is continually being renewed into a state of fuller knowledge, to correspond with the image of his Creator; with whom there is neither Gentile nor Jew, neither circumcision nor uncircumcision, no barbarian and Scythian, no slavery and freedom, but Christ is all things and in all things." "The very first page of Holy Scripture records ... that God crowned the work of creation which He had begun by making "man in His own image." The Bible further teaches... that the rest of the human race took its origin from the marriage of the first man with his partner. It describes to us, with vivid and significant wealth of detail, how mankind was divided into various nations or tribes, scattered throughout the different parts of the world. And how, even when His creatures were guilty of a wretched apostasy from their Creator, He would not abandon His fatherly care of them, but determined, in the decrees of His divine mercy, to unite them again to Himself at a later time, by a covenant of friendship... "The same Apostle of the Gentiles proves the unity of the human family from those links which bind us to Him who is the image of the invisible God, Jesus Christ, in whom "all things were made." He proves it from the fact of our common Redemption; telling us how Christ through His bitter Passion restored to us God's friendship, as it had been ours at first, and reconciled God to men: "there is only one God, and only one mediator between God and men, the man Christ Jesus.

...And as nations become more civilized, they become more highly differentiated in their ways of life and of managing their affairs. That is no reason why they should renounce the unity of the human family. Rather, they should enrich that family by making their own contribution to its variety, according to their several endowments. They should exchange, mutually, the advantages they enjoy; and that is a thing that can only be done satisfactorily where a lively, burning charity unites us all in a common brotherhood, as sons of the same Father and men redeemed by the same divine blood.

The Church of Jesus Christ is the repository of His wisdom; she is certainly too wise to discourage or belittle those peculiarities and differences which mark out one nation from another. It is quite legitimate for nations to treat those differences as a sacred inheritance and guard them at all costs. The Church aims at unity, a unity determined and kept alive by that supernatural love which should be actuating everybody; she does not aim at a uniformity which would only be external in its effects, and would cramp the natural tendencies of the nations concerned. Every nation has its own genius, its own qualities, springing from the hidden roots of its being. The wise development, the encouragement within limits, of that genius, those qualities, does no harm, and if a nation cares to take precautions, to lay down rules, for that end, it has the Church's approval. She is mother enough to befriend such projects with her prayers, so long as all is done without prejudice to those duties which the common origin and the common destiny of the whole human race impose upon us.

Of course there were qualifications in between the key passages so that read without consideration for any particular environment it could appear to be a well balanced statement. That was exactly where the power of Mein Kampf lay, too. However, because of the policies and practices which the church had adopted on that very issue ever since it had been established as a community institution, Summi Pontificatus can only be read as an historical document set in the politics and crises of a world embroiled in war and unprecedented race bigotry. Considered in that light it is not a very nice document. There was absolutely no indication of remorse for the consequences of the church's self-understanding over nearly two thousand years. There was such a total lack of any understanding of those consequences that the first encyclical of the war between Gog and Magog (one of the major outcomes of that self-understanding) gave the clearest possible confirmation of the nature of Mein Kampf as a parody on the church just as it was being put into effect.

Summi Pontificatus gave each government the justification for continuing with whatever policies and practices it had already been pursuing but at the same time it gave each of them propaganda ammunition to throw at those which were adopting different attitudes towards the issue of race and the Jewish question in particular. It failed to recognize the very real effort which the Soviet government had made to sort out the mess which it had inherited and which had been greatly complicated by Britain's Balfour Declaration. It avoided a conflict of conscience or the need to face facts for Christians in Germany and it therefore made it easier for Hitler to shift gear from his programme of oppression and enslavement to his final solution. It also enabled the United States to continue racial segregation in its armed forces and to resist change to its immigration policy. But ultimately it became ammunition which Zionists could use to support their demands for Palestine; which each party could use in the struggle over the partition of India; and which South Africa could use in the development of its apartheid policy. In view of all of these considerations, and notably the fact that all confrontational criticism of governments was omitted and censures were directed only at Communists and Jews, there is a very clear indication of the relationship between the non-publication of Humani Generis Unitas and the publication of Summi Pontificatus. Until the Vatican opens its secret archives for examination the only conclusion which can be drawn is that the non-publication of Humani

Generis Unitas involved collusion between Ledochowski and Cardinal Secretary of State Pacelli prior to his election as pope and his adoption of the title Pius XII.

ANOTHER CONSPIRACY OF SILENCE

At that critical time in mankind's communal evolution when a strong lead from the Christian Church could have had an enormous impact on the direction of that evolution the church was again found wanting. The ecumenical movement was struggling to gather momentum. From an organizational point of view it was in no position to do very much at all and the denominational churches which were involved in it generally showed little will and little more understanding. Only the Vatican had the worldwide organization and the capacity to take decisive action and the best it could do was politic to gain maximum advantage from the dynamic situation. It was more firmly locked into that stance by the institutional and political scaffold with which it propped up its interlocking self-image and doctrines than it had ever been and it was determined that nothing or no one would knock away a leg of the scaffold. And because by its own widely proclaimed belief the most critical leg of the scaffold rested on the shaky, paper thin foundation of its Lateran Treaty with Mussolini, the politicking had to be stage-managed very carefully indeed.

It was so well stage managed, with the Vatican collaborating with major players on both sides of the conflict, that the pope's actions simply confirmed the thrust of the parody Mein Kampf. Pius had known since mid August, when his bishops received their chaplaincy orders, that Hitler was about to invade but, despite the church's protests that he worked to avoid it, there is no evidence of that. Much has been written in his defence about steps which he took to protect individual Jews, groups or whole communities after Rome had been occupied by the Nazis. But these were each circumstantial decisions which did nothing to offset everything which he said and wrote which incited or fomented anti-Semitic reactions. On the other hand his collaboration with the regime before and during the early part of the war is clearly illustrated by his actions, the concordats, these encyclicals and programs such as the church's bell ringing celebrations after the occupation of Poland.

Hitler could afford to allow the Roman Catholic church some continuing limited role and in doing so he would reap the benefit through avoiding both a strong domestic backlash and enormous papal pressure on both the United States and other neutral or friendly countries to enter the war against Germany. In fact he could not afford to liquidate the Catholic Church completely because if papal influence were to undermine Italy's war effort or even break the Pact of Steel the strategic balance would lurch heavily against Germany.

For his part the pope could not afford to make a strong attack on Nazism and, subsequently, on Hitler's Holocaust. Some observers have explained this simply in terms of the likely loss of clergy and property in Germany and have assumed the maintenance of the church's position elsewhere. Some commentators such as Rolf Hochhuth writing in Der Stellvertreter (The Vicar or The Deputy), have explored additional motivations such as financial interests in the armaments industry and fanatical anti Communism.¹² Others have suggested continuing deep-seated anti-Semitism which was thinly disguised by humanitarian efforts to save a few Jews. Still others have suggested that the pope believed that a public protest would be useless in changing Hitler's policies but that it would cause a grave crisis of conscience among German Catholics. A grave "crisis of credibility", and therefore of faith, might be a better way of putting it because their infallible pope would be seen to be backing away from the position which he and the hierarchy had taken so dogmatically for a very long time. One authority, von Aretin, also suggests that Pius XII feared that a public protest would be fatal to his "neutrality."¹³

While none of these explanations are adequate in isolation, linked together they help to build a total picture. The situation had become more complex for the Vatican with every move which Hitler made, just as it had for imperial Britain, and the pope had to turn political hand springs if he and the church at large were to avoid the complete reassessment of their doctrines, theology and actions which the challenge of Mein Kampf called for.

The eventual entry of the United States into European Christendom's war was widely expected but it was by no means certain because of factors already outlined. If it did enter the war against Germany it would be largely because of pressure resulting from a reaction to Hitler's oppression of Jews and its policies could not be expected to be pro-Vatican. Against that, the eventual roles of Soviet Russia and Japan – both in firm alliance with Germany – were an unknown factor and an axis victory based on that alliance would be absolutely catastrophic for the Vatican. If Russia allowed any institutional Christian church it would be Orthodox and not Roman Catholic, especially in view of Pilsudski's Vatican-backed repression of the Orthodox Church little more than a decade earlier, and Japan was already stepping up its repression of the church at large in each of Japan, Korea and occupied China.

PLATITUDES, POWERS AND CONCORDATS

If the pope were to launch a strong attack against Nazism in those circumstances it could possibly result in the oppression or massacre of Catholic clergy in all axis occupied countries. However that was far from certain because Hitler knew that the quickest way to turn the entire Catholic world outside of the occupied territories – including the United States – against him was to unleash such an assault inside the occupied territories. On the other hand the political authority of the Vatican would be seriously undermined and the rebuilding of Catholicism would be a long drawn-out process based on clergy and support from countries opposed to Rome's ultramontanism. This pointed towards a further weakening of Vatican authority and towards greater pressure for the establishment of independent national Catholic churches. That would call into question yet again the theological justification for Vatican dominance, its opposition to the ecumenical movement, the doctrinal definition of the church as "the body of Christ" – its selfunderstanding – and ultimately the ghastly Jewish question. The Vatican therefore had to keep a foothold in Europe under Hitler. If that required it to reach some sort of accord with his shameful regime then in its view the means justified the end which was the preservation of its temporal authority and its supposedly divinely inspired empire. After all, that was no more than Britain and France were trying to do and, in the Vatican's view anyway, their divinely inspired authority was subordinate to that of the divine representative of Christ.

Apart from considerations related to America's neutrality, an attack on any one of Europe's totalitarian regimes with which the Vatican had a concordat, (the pattern of which had been actively sponsored during the previous twenty years), might be read as an attack-in-principle on all of them and, notably, on Mussolini's brand of Fascism in Italy and Franco's in Spain. Mussolini's displeasure, if he were spurred on by Hitler, could even lead to the repeal of the Lateran Treaty. At one stroke the pope's hard-won temporal authority would be eliminated, all those unthinkable issues would be thrust onto world centre stage and the Jewish question would lift from the level of anti-Semitic oppression to the theological level which had threatened after the Great War. Neither the Vatican nor the Western Alliance could afford to justify their positions on Judaism, Palestine and Jerusalem under concurrent pressure from Hitler, Mussolini, the Soviet Union, Japan, the Jewish Community and the Muslim community.

Of course it would have been unrealistic to expect a papal attack on Fascism in 1939 in view of the domestic situation in Italy coupled with the intimate family and political links between the Vatican hierarchy and the Fascist establishment which had influenced the actions of the Vatican (and the responses of the Roman Catholic Church world wide) ever since the rise to national power of the Italian Fascists. And those links or relationships were basically little different to the links between the hierarchy and the imperial political and financial powers of the Roman Empire, the Holy Roman Empire and their successors. The influence of the Christian Democratic Movement, taking its rise from the struggle for the reunification of Italy – the Risorgimento – had ebbed and flowed with the political interests of the papacy for about eighty years and in the years after World War II it was to provide the bolster which would secure both the anti-Communist civil powers and the Ultramontanist religious powers against those who would have dismantled them. However in the late 1930s it was in a state of disarray because its domestic aspirations were in conflict with the papacy's international aspirations or, as R.A. Webster explains it:

*a Catholic social or political movement can endanger Church State agreements, in which case the movement is often ignored or deserted by the Church in order to gain a concordat or settlement. Thus the Church mourned neither the Italian Popular Party in 1926 nor the German Center Party in 1933, but came to agreements with the victorious Fascist and National Socialist regimes through conventional diplomatic channels. However in both cases the Church's position in negotiating with the dictators was greatly strengthened by her mass organization and following. On the other hand, when the political climate is right, Catholic movements can shape Church State relations to the advantage of the Church.*¹⁴

As the clouds of World War II gathered, those segments of the movement which supported Fascism were actively encouraged while those which opposed Fascism and the Vatican's links with it were gradually silenced. For example, Giorgio La Pira, professor of Roman Law at Florence University and a key contributor to the Dominican-published bimonthly Principi, wrote that the destruction of Poland was a twofold crime. Firstly because the nations of Europe, grown up in the shadow of the church, each have individual personality and vocation regardless of whether they are great or small and, secondly, because Poland had been like a dike separating two non-Christian worlds. He went on to say that in contrast to the unjust destruction of Poland the possibility of a just war was still real. A crusade against the “new Turks” threatening Europe – the National Socialists and the Communists – would be just and Holy, he wrote. A war of that nature would put new life into Christendom and Our time, so tragic in so many aspects, is by now ripe for reconstituting around the See of Peter, that unity among the nations vainly sought elsewhere.¹⁵

La Pira had understood the Vatican and the historical buffer role of Poland quite clearly but like those around him he had not grasped the real challenges of Marx and Hitler. Within a few months of his Polish statement being published Principi had been silenced but La Pira managed to go to ground and he became a symbol of the resistance movement in Italy. In contrast the press of the Catholic University of Milan, led by Fathers Agostino Gemelli and Francesco Olgiatei which was constituted under the Vatican Concordat and sustained by its links with the clerico Fascists of Mussolini’s regime, flourished at least until 1943 when many of its professors became disenchanted with the regime and its policies. Until that time they had taught, written and preached along the lines that the Fascist system was a real application of Catholic social principles; that Fascist imperialism (in Albania, Ethiopia and North Africa) was in accordance with doctrines of living space and geopolitics; and that Fascist racial policies were justified by Catholic tradition.¹⁶ Mussolini’s propagandists took full advantage of an address by Gemelli at the University of Bologna on January 10 1939, (presumably aimed at the Arabs, Jews and Europeans meeting around Britain’s Round Table on Palestine at that time), about the decide people tragically unable to belong to Italy because of their blood and because of their religion.¹⁷

So: back to where we were. If Hitler and Mussolini were so happy with Summi Pontificatus it is surely surprising that the British and French also applauded it, but they did. They were so relieved that the pope had not openly pronounced in favour of the totalitarian Axis powers that they latched onto selected expressions in the encyclical, declared them to be statements of neutrality and, in an exercise best described as “I’ll scratch your back if you scratch mine”, lauded the pope for his stand on principles in a time of great difficulty. They took full advantage of the title given to the English translation, Darkness over the Earth, implying that it was a papal reference to Hitler’s regime and eagerly linked it with an attack on atheistic Communism which the West had forced into an uncomfortable alliance with Nazism and which certainly figured in a papal encyclical yet again, If they had not been able to point to papal neutrality, as a bare minimum, the powers of the Western alliance would have faced enormous difficulties raising armies, avoiding community conflict and maintaining effective neutrality among nonaligned countries in the Third World.

Any statement more critical of the Western Powers would have inflamed each of the Irish independence issue;¹⁸ the struggle for either India’s independence or partition; and the issue of French-Canadian separation. It would have encouraged the Philippines to lean more heavily towards Japan – an influence which the Vatican was eager to avoid at all costs – and it would have led to Latin America assuming an even bigger role as a halfway house for embargo-breaking trade between the Western Alliance and Germany as well as a base for subversion and diplomatic intrigue. It would also have cast doubt on Britain's relations with South Africa where the prime minister's intended declaration of neutrality had led directly to a constitutional crisis and a change of government. chapter 22) With a slender majority in parliament and the possibility of a hostile majority in the electorate, the new Prime Minister, General Smuts, had to tread very carefully indeed until Mussolini's subsequent decision to honour his Pact of Steel with Hitler cast a shadow down the length of Africa.¹⁹ An antagonistic papal statement in advance of Mussolini's decision would have undermined General Smuts' position very seriously indeed. And because control of the South African ports which dominated the alternative naval route to the Persian Gulf, India, Australia and the Far East via the Cape of Good Hope was vital for both Britain and France, the stability of the Smuts government was equally important.

Of course other European countries also had an interest in the security of the Cape route – notably Holland which also partly depended on it for its links with the Dutch East Indies (Indonesia) – but it had also become rapidly more important to the United States because of its oil concessions in the Middle East. Suddenly the US administration became just as interested in the stability of the South African government and in the pronouncements of anyone who might affect it. However that was not Roosevelt's only reason for taking a keen interest in the papal encyclical. His own country was just as deeply divided about the war in Europe as South Africa, and an antagonistic stance by the pope would have made a decision to enter the war against Hitler and his allies virtually impossible. America's strategic interests, already outlined, would then have been liable to more direct danger.

Britain and France therefore had good reason to be delighted with Summi Pontificatus and the pope's decision, in effect, that the response of the Roman Catholic church to the war should accord with local circumstances and, surprisingly, to leave it largely in the hands of the hierarchy in each country. It was a very risky decision because it was the nearest the papacy would ever come to voluntarily retracting its policy of Ultramontanism. If circumstances had developed differently, the power of the papacy could have been reduced to a shadow. As it was, the Vatican's moral authority was seen to be undermined at a time when it was more urgently required to take a lead in the interests of humanity-at-large than at any time in its checkered history. The policy and politics of Ultramontanism which it so valued as a means of imposing its iron will on populations throughout the world was now the factor which made it virtually impotent in major matters of moral leadership and led it to place ever increasing emphasis on adherence to doctrine, liturgy and social politics.

However the pope was a very experienced politician. He was well aware that the church's support was far more important to the countries of the Western Alliance than to the Axis powers. It was quite consistent with his self-understanding and with the historical stance of the papacy, that the church should take every opportunity to strengthen its position in relation to earthly states and that their governments should pay for any favours from the church. Thus, behind his very risky decision and his neutral posture Pius XII had served clear notice that there would be some hard bargaining for the church's support from country to country and the quickest way to gain that support was to agree to a concordat. Pius XII was still vigorously pursuing the policy which he had administered as Secretary of State under Pius XI. This highlighted the dual aims behind his encyclical. One was to contribute directly and positively toward the development of a stable peace. The other was to strengthen the position of the Roman Catholic Church in relation to all of its competitors in the salvation business, including the Protestant and Orthodox churches, institutional Judaism, Islam, Communism, Nazism and Fascism, and all the pre-Messianic or, as the church still saw them, heathen religious movements.

Unfortunately the pope's decision also meant that Western leaders would be almost as dependent on religious grandstanding and propaganda to achieve public sympathy through manipulation as they had been during the Great War. As we review the relationships between the Vatican and national governments during and after the war years it is apparent that at least three motives influenced them, viz.: recognition that the Vatican could contribute to reconciliation and the peace process; self-preservation at a domestic level; the need to be aware of, to influence and, at times, to restrain the Vatican in its initiatives. One key Western leader who was especially familiar with religious relationships and manipulation because of his intimate involvement in Middle East affairs before, during and after the Great War was still active and waiting, eagerly, for a more important role. It was Winston Churchill.

Although the situation became extremely fluid until Hitler's determination to act out his parody inevitably forced a change from a phoney to a real war, with alliances and battle lines finally and firmly drawn, only two governments signed concordats while the war was in progress. They were both struggling to maintain their independence against strong pressure to enter the war from Hitler on one hand and the Western Alliance on the other because of the strategic importance of their positions. The first was Portugal, ruled by the semi-Fascist dictatorship of Dr. Salazar, which eventually agreed to allow British air bases in the Azores in 1943. It signed a concordat and a missionary accord in May 1940 in circumstances reminiscent of the country's designation as papal standard bearer to the New World in the bull Romanus Pontifex in 1454.²⁰ (chapter 9) The second was Spain whose vigorously Fascist dictator Franco needed a breathing space free of boat-rocking to be able to consolidate his position and to heal the scars left across the Spanish community by the bloody civil war. Countries on both sides of the battle lines were pressing him to return their favours which had helped him to power while the bitterly frustrated socialist republicans (who had held power briefly) certainly did not want to go to war against Russia which had helped them in their unsuccessful struggle to prevent Franco's military takeover. He accepted his 'convention' with the Vatican, (later converted to a concordat), in June 1941. In addition a number of governments either strengthened or established diplomatic ties with the Vatican. One, of considerable significance, was Finland. We shall come to it very shortly.

ANGLING FOR THE UNITED STATES

However, even though Finland and countries like it were important, it was the United States which really counted if the pope was to secure the Vatican's post-war position and also have an effective input into the peace process and postwar reconstruction. As president of the Protestant-dominated self-styled "New Israel", Franklin Roosevelt led a country which had more at stake than was generally recognized and whose decisions were likely to determine the ultimate course of the war and the postwar balance of power between the competing ideologies and religions. But he also led a nation with a very independent-minded Catholic church and whose governments had consistently refused to accord official diplomatic recognition to the Vatican as a temporal power or to have direct dealings with it since 1868. He was therefore the big fish which the pope was more eager to hook than any other. His New Deal had undoubtedly helped the Roman Catholic community break its ghetto mentality and had reduced bitterness between the Christian denominations but, even so, he was not immune to papal pressure and very soon the pope would play his trump card.

In due course time and actions would soon tell whether the Vatican, with a more dominant role in the total Christian Church than at any time since the Reformation, was equal to the opportunity or whether its blinkers were still too tight. With the echoes of Summi Pontificatus reverberating around them the governments of the Western Alliance were high in their praise of Pius XII. The praise continued as he acted as a channel for communications between some sections of the German and Italian resistance and the Western powers; as he ordered large scale rescue programs and harboured thousands of Jews; and as he channelled an enormous amount of money into relief work. But praise gave way to criticism as the war rolled on; when he insisted on establishing diplomatic relations with Japan; when he opposed lend lease arrangements designed to secure an effective double front against Germany through cooperation between Russia and the West; when impending success in the war made it apparent that the West no longer needed to pander to amazing theological statements in order to secure the advantage of his support; and when his continued opposition to the establishment of the State of Israel became an embarrassment. Thus, although the prestige and political influence of the Vatican reached unexpected heights and the risk of undermining papal ultramontanism receded, the long term effect of Summi Pontificatus was that the Vatican's ability to exercise moral leadership in the things which would matter, plummeted.

Reviewing the pope's role and his silence on Jewish persecution in particular almost a generation after the end of the war, von Aretin said that Pius XII considered Soviet Russia to be the real danger to Europe and he had hopes of bringing about a peace settlement which would save the eastern European nations from Bolshevism. According to von Aretin Pius XII therefore avoided everything which might have caused a breach with Germany on the assumption that the Nazi regime would eventually collapse but that Soviet occupation of central and eastern Europe would be irrevocable. But while Von Aretin then rejected Hochhuth's "primitive and one-sided condemnation" of the pope in The Deputy he said that his attitude was certainly open to the question whether "a course of action so exclusively determined by tactical considerations is appropriate for the representative of Christ on earth, however suitable it may seem for the administrative head of the Catholic Church." He then acknowledged that Pius XII may have failed when he was faced with responsibilities which were beyond the capacity of a single individual, adding:

... the attempts made by the Vatican after 1945 to conceal the truth weigh more heavily against the pope than his understandable human failure. At that time an open explanation of the reasons that lay behind his conduct would have been widely welcomed. But Pius XII never publicly voiced any regret or explanation, acting indeed as though there had never been any collaboration with fascism or any special consideration shown towards the Nazi regime.²¹ (Emphasis added.)

So the situation in 1939 was little different to that when the church set about codifying its selfunderstanding in the third century CE. One error was leading to another and another. Because of its misunderstanding of itself it still failed to understand the modern challenges of Marx, Darwin, Herzl, Barth or Hitler. The consequences of that failure were getting ever more serious and, at least for the time being, the tempo was so fast that no one was able to say "Stop! Let's make a fresh start!"

The diplomats, conspirators and everyone else who might be caught in the firing line were still scrutinizing Summi Pontificatus when, on November 1, Pius XII plucked the trump card from his sleeve and released a special encyclical to the United States. It was a mere three days after Summi Pontificatus had been read to the faithful on the feast of Christ the King. There can be no doubt that the two encyclicals were written in association. The special American encyclical, Sertum Laetitiae, called for special joint efforts for peace by the US and the Vatican so that "attempts with which the enemies secretly banded together seek to pull down the Scepter of Christ (may) be a spur to us to work in union for the establishment and advancement of His reign." But who were the "enemies secretly banded together"? The Soviet Union was certainly one. Could Hitler have been another when he already had a concordat with the Vatican and Pius XII was eager to take advantage of any German territorial expansion? From one point of view that hardly seems credible because Pius XII was doing all he could to take advantage of his concordat with Hitler. But Hitler had made no secret of his intention to harness and then diminish the power of the institutional church, and he had a fantastic agreement with Stalin, the leader of his arch enemy, the Communist Soviet Union, to carve up Catholic Poland – 'protected' by its concordat – at the same time that he expelled the Jews who were equally unwelcome to both the Third Reich and the Catholic Church. Was the pope angling for United States intervention to separate the two? And if so, how and with what consequential aims? There can be little doubt that Pius XII was desperate for some means to separate Germany and the Soviet Union, and to isolate and reduce the influence of Communism while encouraging the socio-economic and political policies of National Socialism in the Third Reich – preferably without both Hitler and the Jews. There is a clearly implied reference to the Jews who had a ‘role’ in the affairs of both powers in the use of a quotation from the preface to the Mass of Christ the King: “No greater fortune can come to individuals, families, and nations than to obey the Author of human salvation, execute His commands, accept His reign, in which we are made free and rich in good works: ‘... a kingdom of truth and of life; a kingdom of holiness and of grace; a kingdom of justice, love and peace.’”

So: in Sertum Laetitiae we find confirmation of one of the reasons for the suppression of Humani Generis Unitas. Pius XII (Pacelli) wanted no criticism of race policies or relations in the United States which would prejudice the bid for closer relations with the United States which he had already set in motion while he was secretary of state. (chapter 20) The bulk of the encyclical was pitched with heavy emphasis on social issues. There were references which could be read as recognition of Roosevelt’s New Deal policies, but there was a very clear message that he should get closer to the church. He was reminded that a “ruinous and critical state of affairs was put right by the celebrated George Washington, famed for his courage and keen intelligence (and) a close friend of the Bishop of Baltimore.” Most noteworthy were calls for the restraint of unions which were to “act in such a manner that in their care for the interests of their class they violate no one’s rights”; the rejection of inter-denominational marriages which “are rarely happy and usually occasion grave loss to the Catholic Church.” It is quite remarkable, and consistent with the parody of Mein Kampf, that in one document (Summi Pontificatus) the pope should proclaim the right of the church to conduct mixed marriages of Catholics and Jews, and in the next document (Sertum Laetitiae) he should attack mixed marriages between people of different branches of the Christian church. His first stand was because Nazi and Fascist laws were undermining the authority of Catholic canon law and inhibiting proselytizing among Jews. His second was because marriages between Protestants and Catholics weakened the effectiveness of that same canon law. Then there was an attack on divorce which would have made both the Nazis and the Communists happy; the rejection of the teaching of evolution [“We raise our voice in strong ... complaint that in many schools ... Christ is often despised or ignored (and) the explanation of the universe and mankind is forced within the narrow limits of materialism or of rationalism”]; and a plug for financial assistance for Catholic charities, schools and universities including “the Pontifical College (in Rome) which receives for their ecclesiastical education students from the United States” to relieve the burden on “the generosity of the faithful upon whom they depend.” There was also another gibe at the Ecumenical Movement with an invitation for the separated brethren whom Mother Church laments to return to “this salutary union of thought and policy” because “power must not be dissipated through disunion but rather strengthened through harmony.”²² [Emphasis added.]

The German Military High Command – and especially the conspirators – would have had an attack of the jitters. Clearly the pope was jockeying for closer ties with the United States and he expected the US to play a higher profile role in future religious affairs as well as in political, economic, social and military affairs. There was a real possibility that the pope was even saying 'join me, and let's use Hitler's Germany as a means of crushing Communism in the Soviet Union.' Many people read his words to mean exactly that. But from their point of view as German military commanders, the US had two main alternatives. On one hand it could act as a genuine peace negotiator and, at the same time, protect its trade links with every belligerent, including Germany which would therefore not be placed at a disadvantage in obtaining strategic supplies. On the other hand it could apply increased pressure on Germany by providing more direct support for the Allies who had then been at war against Germany for less than two months. If the US took the second course and sided with the Allies, Germany's chances of avoiding defeat under Hitler's misguided leadership were very much less. The temptation to remove him by a coup or by assassination before the United States had time to react therefore became greater. But perhaps it was possible that the United States might support a coup to topple Hitler – or even an assassination attempt. Against that, Hitler's prestige and authority were so great that Germany's best chance of negotiating an advantageous settlement, of achieving its war aims, and of continuing its amazing economic development through the industrial ties which Hitler's industrial sponsors had established in the United States lay with backing his leadership which was so openly admired by industrialists and right wing politicians in both Britain and the United States. The conspirators therefore faced real dilemmas. However Roosevelt also had his dilemmas and whether the German generals fully appreciated them is not easy to assess.

Roosevelt's dilemmas were complicated considerably by Sertum Laetitiae because if Russia were simply weakened and isolated by US interference in the treaty relationship between Germany and the Soviet Union, the international situation would certainly not be stabilized. If interference enticed the Soviet Union to join the Allies and thereby make Germany's task near-impossible by opening a second front (in an alliance resembling the French plan which Britain had rejected during pre-war manoeuvring) it would be contrary to the Vatican's wishes as it would strengthen the position of the Marxist government. That would also be unpopular with the American electorate. If Russia was simply left in a weakened, isolated position through interference, it would almost certainly seek an alliance with Japan and that would seriously prejudice Britain's position and threaten Germany. Thus any form of interference introduced a distinct possibility that Hitler may decide on a prompt invasion of Russia. He could be driven to striking first against Russia before the Allies and Russia were able to properly establish a second front, or he could be tempted by the opportunity to invade a weakened Russia to achieve his key territorial ambition of Lebensraum in the East.

On the domestic front Roosevelt had to satisfy an electorate with a very diverse ethnic complexion which was still struggling to recover from its economic depression and which was divided in its affinities with the Allies and Germany. He also had to satisfy the industrial free trade lobby with links on both sides of the European divide, especially with Germany's vigorous economy. His opposition to Hitler's social policies had led him to support the Allies but he was clearly out in front of the mob on such issues and there were well expressed limits beyond which congress and the public did not wish him to go. In the prevailing atmosphere the electorate was more likely to support him if he was seen as acting to restrict international Communism.

At the same time Roosevelt did not want to be beholden to one religious community or another, but he could not afford to rebuff the pope's approach for a complex of reasons. First, he could not afford open opposition from the church to amendments to the Neutrality Act which were at a critical stage of Congressional consideration, or to trading arrangements for the supply of arms to Britain which were also nearing finality. Second, he could not take the risk of negative, contradictory or even antagonistic papal statements circulating to complicate the diverse pressures from European governments, the World Zionist Organization, America's industrialists, its Jewish community and its other ethnic groups as he tried to reach a decision on America's overall role in the war. This led to a third, positive, reason. Closer relations with the Vatican would help to muffle Irish Catholic criticism of his policy of support for Britain, and that was potentially the most important factor because it would influence the first two. However he could not afford to antagonize the Protestant churches which were generally more supportive of his policies by establishing formal diplomatic links with the Vatican. In addition he could not appoint an ambassador without congressional approval; nor could he allocate funds to support such an appointment without congressional approval, and he knew very well that, in the case of an appointment to the Vatican, Congress would oppose both proposals. He responded very carefully but very quickly. He was well able to because the matter had been on his mind for some months. He had been under gradually increasing pressure to re-establish diplomatic relations with the Vatican, so we can briefly review the hooks which had been baited and dangled in front of him before we look at his prompt response.

Ten days after Chamberlain publicly rejected Hitler's peace proposal of May 3, (chapter 22), Pius XII instructed the Apostolic Delegate in Washington, by telegram, to convey to Roosevelt a thinly veiled request that he join him (Pius XII) in another bid for a multi-power conference at a later date. Father Carroll was immediately despatched to talk to Under Secretary of State Sumner Wells, who relayed the message to Roosevelt the same day in rather simplistic terms. His message read, in part:

The Pope desired you to know that because of his belief that the peace of Europe was gravely endangered, he had on May 3 approached the governments of Great Britain, France, Poland, Germany and Italy and had enquired of them whether they believed the peace of Europe to be in imminent danger, and second, whether those governments believed a peace conference to be attended by the representatives of the five powers mentioned to settle outstanding problems would be feasible. The Vatican had been informed as a result of the approaches made that none of the five governments believed the situation to be precarious and that the general impression was that a conference of the type proposed would not at that time be expedient.

In conclusion, the Apostolic Delegate was instructed to let you know that if later on such a conference appeared to be expedient, the Pope would communicate with you before any final steps were taken.²³

No action appears to have been taken in response to that message, the reality of which was that the pope intended to try the same approach again, using the prestige and influence of the US president, when his own initiative and papal involvement were clearly unacceptable. However, ten weeks later, while Craigie and Arita were trying to negotiate general settlement of the crisis between Britain and Japan over territorial rights in China, and while Ribbentrop was wooing Russia's negotiators in a bid for a general settlement of German-Soviet relations, Congressman Celler pressed the administration very hard to establish diplomatic relations with the Vatican. Celler's long letter to Wells, which was promptly passed on to Roosevelt, shows strong evidence of a thorough briefing – perhaps even drafting – in the office of the Apostolic Delegate. It referred to the US Ambassador to Britain, Joseph Kennedy, having represented the US at the coronation of Pius XII and traced the historical relationship between the US and the Vatican. It noted the appointment of a Consul to the Papal Dominions in 1797 and the “somewhat hasty and ill-advised [and] ungenerous” action by Congress which responded to the Papal See's goodwill by refusing to continue funding the mission, thus leaving it “still existing, but without compensation” since 1867. It referred to international legal recognition for the temporal authority of the papacy as a basis for its worldwide diplomatic activity, and to “the great stake which religion must play in the preservation of democracy against the savage and merciless inroads of Fascism, Naziism and Communism ... ideologies [which] exclude the virtues of Christianity – faith, hope and charity, benevolence and brotherly love – those virtues which are the very basis of our moral code.” That was a quite remarkable statement in view of papal rejection of republican democracy in favour of Fascist models and the fact that the Vatican had concordats with the three principal Fascist countries – Italy, Spain and Poland – and Nazi Germany as well. Then there were a couple more out-of-context reference to Vatican policy, notably in relation to the Jews.

The Papacy has always placed a high value on Justice and charity in relations among men and among nations. The first Popes, for example, said nothing about anti-Semitism since they themselves, like their Master Christ, were Jews and subject to all the injustices (sic) heaped upon Jews. As early as the sixth century – in the year 538 – Pope Gregory the Great wrote: “We forbid you to molest the Jews or to lay upon them restrictions not imposed by the established laws; we further permit them to live as Romans and to dispose of their property as they will.”

That is a pathetic touch of fantasy and another incredible lapse of historic perspective in view of Augustine's devastating heresy hunting, the Christianization of Scandinavia, the ‘conversion’ of the Aztecs and the Incas, the slaughter of Jews in the first crusade, the Flagellants and the ghettos, the enforced conversions of the Inquisition, and the incitement to anti-Semitism through the distribution of the Protocols in the wake of the Dreyfus affair, and the articles by Fr. Rosa in La Civiltà Cattolica in September 1938, less than a year before. It did not sit very comfortably alongside Celler's injunction that the United States should grasp the hand of fellowship extended by Pope Pius XII, “a religious man of great erudition, wisdom and tolerance [and] a spiritual plenipotentiary of great influence, though he has none but moral weapons to impress a world at arms” – and establish diplomatic relations with the Holy See because:

A representative of our country residing at the Holy See would do much to bring to the fore the fact that in our country we respect to the full the rights of religious freedom, as we do also those accompanying precious rights of freedom of the press, freedom of speech and freedom of assemblage.

A reinstatement of relations with the Holy See would dramatically serve to recall to the world that intolerance and religious hatred and bigotry cannot flourish here. It would enkindle in our hearts sympathy for the thousands of unfortunates who have been castigated, tortured and ruined because of a dictator's insane hate and venom.²⁴

Then Wells did a strange thing. On August 1 he sent Roosevelt a note with which he enclosed a letter which he had requested from US Ambassador Phillips, in Europe, dated July 19. He referred to an earlier discussion which he had with Hulls and wrote, in part:

Some weeks ago the Secretary and I were speaking of the advantage which might be gained by this Government if we had direct diplomatic relations with the Vatican. I think it is unquestionable that the Vatican has many sources of information, particularly with regard to what is actually going on in Germany, Italy, and Spain, which we do not possess, and it seemed to us that the question of whether it would be desirable for our government to obtain access to this information was of considerable importance.

Then next day, August 2, he sent Roosevelt a copy of Celler's letter and a few days later, on August 6, the president summoned him to discuss the issue. It does not appear that any action was taken as a result of that meeting, and the encouragement kept coming. On October 20 Hull forwarded two items to Roosevelt. One was a copy of a cable from the Vatican Secretariat of State to the Apostolic Delegate, dated October 10, advising that according to an unnamed source, Chinese officials “desire the Holy See to take steps to establish peace between China and Japan.” The second was a memorandum from the Secretariat of State dated October 12, on the general question of mediation between Japan and China. Hull sought the Roosevelt's authority to tell the Apostolic Delegate that the president very much appreciated that the communication had been brought to his attention, and that “it is our constant desire to make such contribution as may seem appropriate and be practicable toward the cause of peace among nations.”²⁵

Thus Roosevelt was well ‘conditioned’ when Sertum Laetitiae, was published on November 1. He knew exactly what was expected of him. He consulted Cardinal Spellman of New York. He did not consult the Apostolic Delegate in Washington. Spellman was Chaplain General to the Roman Catholic forces, with pastoral responsibility for 2,000,000 troops and 2,700 chaplains. But he was also a personal friend and confidant of the new pope. He had worked with him on the Roman Curia for several years and spent holidays with him, and, having accompanied the Pius XII on his month-long tour of the United States when he was still Cardinal Pacelli, Vatican Secretary of State, in 1936, he had arranged for him to lunch privately with Roosevelt at Hyde Park on the day after his landslide reelection as president.²⁶ (Chapter 20) Spellman obligingly relayed a message to the pope, through the Apostolic Delegate in Washington, of course, that Roosevelt would nominate a representative to arrive at the Vatican within a month. The pope's gamble had paid off. First strike to Sertum Laetitiae, or one might say the first fruits of Europe's new war. He had achieved through the back door what the governments which were directly involved in the war had denied him – the opportunity to have direct input into the diplomatic and political manouvring of the war, to make peace initiatives, and to pick up a few more concordats in the process. And Roosevelt could relax a trifle, too. In spite of overwhelming public opposition to loans for Britain and France (assessed at 82 percent of those polled a few weeks later²⁷) which prevented him from introducing long range financing, he was able to sign the amendments to the Neutrality Act on November 4. These authorized the sale of arms to belligerents provided that they were purchased in the US and carried on foreign ships. The British government promptly established an office of the British Purchasing Commission in New York three days later.

But there were those procedural difficulties for Roosevelt to resolve first. The president was unable to make or fund a formal diplomatic appointment against the opposition of "certain diehard Protestants"²⁸ who believed the appointment was a violation of the separation of church and state. How to get around Congress? Perhaps a 'personal representative' might be the answer. Although such a person would not be officially accredited as a United States diplomatic representative he could be regarded as having the status of an ambassador. Roosevelt had to find a person in whom he had personal and political confidence, and who was of sufficient wealth that he was prepared to go to Rome, establish and maintain an office at his own expense and work without salary for the satisfaction (and personal influence) of being the president's personal representative in a highly sensitive position. Quite a task. Roosevelt was not able to announce an appointment within a month.

And in Germany the military conspirators, led by General Ludwig Beck who was working in close collaboration with Hans Oster of the Military Intelligence Office in Berlin, faced their own 'procedural difficulties' as they worked through their dilemma: how to conduct their coup against Hitler without triggering either a civil war in Germany or intervention by Britain and France, with or without the United States, which could seize the opportunity to take advantage of Germany's vulnerability while it was distracted by internal dispute. They did not want to forfeit the benefits of the Munich Agreement because to relinquish them in the political circumstances of the day would certainly lead to turmoil in Germany. From their understanding of Summi Pontificatus, the special American encyclical Sertum Laetitiae and the American response to it, they knew that Pius XII would be "the ideal go-between" for them to contact the Western governments, and several vital links in a chain of intrigue fell quickly and quietly into place. Oster knew the pope from his days as nuncio in Germany. He arranged for a Catholic lawyer in Bavaria who had been drafted into the Abwehr when Poland was invaded, Josef Müller, to contact the disgraced former chairman of the Centre Party, Ludwig Kaas, who was then administrator of St. Peter's Basilica in Rome, to enable Müller to gain direct access to the pope through an intermediary without going through the new secretary of state, Cardinal Maglione. The intermediary was a Jesuit priest who had been a personal assistant to Pius XII since his first appointment as a Vatican diplomat in Bavaria in 1920, Fr. Robert Leiber. The request the conspirators wished him to convey to the pope was that he seek guarantees from Chamberlain (via the British Minister in the Vatican, Osborne, and Lord Halifax) that Britain would agree to “an honourable peace between the democracies and Germany following the coup.” Leiber faithfully conveyed it to Pius XII on November 5. Next day, November 6, shocked at both the request and the prompt response, Leiber conveyed the pope’s agreement to Müller.²⁹

A tantalizing message with quite amazing implications was on its way to the conspirators immediately. It was obvious that if Hitler learned of it before the coup was carried out he would wreak havoc on the conspirators and on anyone associated with it. The Reich concordat would have been abrogated and the Catholic Church hierarchy would have tasted Hitler’s wrath. But in addition Mussolini would have seen it as a breach of neutrality. His relationship with Hitler was such that the Lateran Treaty and the Italian Concordat would have almost certainly gone the same way at the Reich Concordat and the future of the Vatican as a papal city-state would have been in peril – unless Pius XII had a water-tight guarantee of intervention from the Western democracies. It is indeed very problematic whether the Western democracies would have gone to war to rescue the pope and secure the future of the Vatican State, even in the light of Roosevelt’s prompt response to Sertum Laetitiae. Pius XII had made his decision without consulting Maglione, and Leiber faithfully maintained its confidentiality. Pius XII and his conspirators had to act on his decision in perilous isolation and the international situation – the plot of the parody of Mein Kampf – was so complex that every step they took complicated the world situation even further. And although the pope had indicated his agreement to act very promptly he did not act with the same promptness. Perhaps he was having second thoughts. The only solution was for the key players to recognize the parody; to then recognize the trouble in the triangle and the causes of it; and to begin a reassessment of the fundamental theology which was at the centre of it. Quite clearly, even if the pope had begun to doubt the wisdom of his decision, a fundamental reassessment was not about to begin and the parody simply had to be acted out.

MURKY WATERS: MORE PLANS, PLOTS AND PACTS

The complexities of the parody were such that everyone was facing their particular ‘procedural difficulties.’ While the conspirators waited for the pope’s reply, Himmler was facing his, in organizing the complex resettlement programs in the Generalgouvernement region in Poland which Stalin had forced Hitler to accept. It was apparent that the army did not see such programs as part of its responsibility and yet it had primary responsibility for securing the region. Therefore Himmler devised a system which he announced on November 7 as ‘the organization of the Gestapo in the Eastern Territories.’ The State Police were to deal with political affairs alongside the Reich Commissioners and the civil administration, together with the Einsatzgruppen who were to be stationed in permanent garrisons after the combat phase ended to fulfill the security functions of the SD and, together, under the Higher SS and Police Leader (HSSPF), they were to establish concentration camps and exercise all necessary control.³⁰ Hitler was aware – very much aware – of the army’s concerns and the fact that resistance to his policies could lead to attempts on his life, especially if the United States took up the pope’s challenge.

Next morning he told a friend, Frau Troost, who questioned the laxness of his personal security measures that “a man must have faith in Providence.” He always carried a pistol, he said, but even that would be useless. “If my end is decided, only this will protect me.” Then, putting his hand over his heart he said: “One must listen to an inner voice and believe in one’s fate. And I believe very deeply that destiny has selected me for the German nation. So long as I am needed by the people, so long as I am responsible for the life of the Reich, I shall live.” Hitler then pictured himself as another Christ, adding ... “And when I am no longer needed, after my mission is accomplished, then I shall be called away.”³¹ His view of his role as another Christ must have been along the lines of Jewish expectation of a king messiah – a powerful leader ushering in national salvation for his people – but with the church’s view of the fate of the Jews substituted for their communal salvation.

That evening, November 8, the military conspirators in Germany therefore found themselves facing even greater ‘procedural difficulties’ when a totally unrelated assassination attempt failed in Munich in dramatic circumstances. Hitler had not been told that a Swiss astrologer, Karl Ernst Krafft, had warned a few days earlier that he would be in danger of an assassination attempt between November 7 and 10, but his conversation with Frau Troost appears to have triggered a premonition that an attempt was about to be made on his life. He abruptly cut short a speech and left the hall in which he was addressing a rally ahead of schedule. Eight minutes later seven people were killed and 63 were injured when a bomb which had been planted in a festooned pillar on the speaker’s platform at the beginning of the meeting exploded. The officer-conspirators panicked and abandoned their immediate plans while Hitler made very good propaganda use of the incident. Next day, November 9, he blamed a conspiracy between the English, the Jews, Freemasons and his long standing political opponent Otto Strasser.³² He incited more hatred for England, bolstered his personal prestige and popularity, and undermined other resistance groups at the same time. And he was again aided and abetted by the Catholic Church. The Pope, who only two days before had become a party to the coup plot, immediately sent special personal congratulations on his escape. Cardinal Faulhaber who could not have been aware of the pope’s cynical double dealing, sent a telegram and issued instructions that a Te Deum be sung in the cathedral of Munich “to thank Divine Providence in the name of the Archdiocese for the Fuhrer’s fortunate escape,” and the Catholic press throughout the Reich piously declared that Hitler’s narrow escape was the miraculous working of Providence. They were hardly the actions or sentiments of a pope and a church hierarchy which – if one interpretation of Sertum Laetitiae was accepted – regarded Hitler or Germany as one of “the enemies secretly banded together (who) seek to pull down the Scepter of Christ.” They were more the sentiments one would expect from a pope who saw Hitler as “a spur to us to work in union for the establishment and advancement of His reign.”

Those conflicting sentiments must have perplexed and confused the conspirators greatly. If the mission of Imperial Germany had been to exercise world domination as an expression of divine will – and so many senior theologians had declared it to be so – then surely the mission of the Third Reich, inspired by Hitler under divine protection and blessed with a papal concordat and special prayers for his safety, was at least on a par with it. Probably somewhat elevated. Hitler agreed wholeheartedly. While those messages of encouragement were still ringing in Hitler’s ears on November 9, and consistent with his outpouring of abuse against them, about 500 panic stricken Jewish families in the traditional Jewish heartland of the Generalgouvernement, Lublin, were given a few minutes to quit their homes, forfeiting everything they possessed. In like manner, about the same time, some 1,800 persons were rounded up in Chelm, 70 kilometres to the east, and marched towards the Bug River which formed the border with the Russian sector, presumably to be forced across it to Sokal, another centre with a concentration of Jews, in that sector. But the Russian authorities wanted nothing to do with them and turned them back. Many died in the cross fire which followed and only 400 reached Sokal.³³ The ‘resettlement program’ had begun and the Russians had made it perfectly clear that if Hitler wanted vacant Jewish land on which to resettle Aryan Germans from his crowded cities he had to find his own resettlement area. It was not going to be at Russia’s expense and Stalin had already made it clear that he was not interested in a rump independent Poland. He intended to keep the area which he had occupied. Hitler therefore had a real problem. He wanted the Jews of Czechoslovakia, Austria and elsewhere rounded up for transport to the Polish occupied territories and he also wanted the major population centres in that territory left free of Jews. Frank’s deputy, Artur Seyss-Inquart, was therefore instructed to undertake a survey of the Generalgouvernement.

On November 13 Halifax took a different approach to the problem of eliminating Hitler’s influence to both the military conspirators in Germany and the planners in Whitehall. He suggested to Cadogan that Britain should ‘take over Hitler’s Anti-Comintern Pact’ by joining Italy, Japan and Spain in an alliance against Germany. Cadogan was attracted to the idea and referred it to the ambassador in Rome, Sir Percy Loraine, “for development.” During Loraine’s ‘development discussions’, which would have presumably included both the Italian government and the Vatican, the concept was somehow changed to a Japanese-Anglo-Fascist Alliance against the Soviet Union which was more consistent with the intention of the Anti-Comintern Pact. The Vatican supported that idea, of course, because it was fully consistent with Sertum Laetitiae and contact was also made with the British ambassador in Spain, Sir Samuel Hoare.³⁴ Britain could not afford to ignore the Vatican’s advice unless it was prepared to face a deepening of the crisis in Ireland and a back-door entry for Hitler. Strike two to Sertum Laetitiae. But on November 22 Craigie confirmed that there was, in fact, an improvement in Soviet-Japanese relations which might lead to an end to the Sino-Japanese war and that “Japanese foreign policy may fall into the hands of inexperienced extremists.” At the same time diplomatic advice from Moscow suggested that the partition of China was ‘under active consideration in the Kremlin.’³⁵ Probing and intrigue continued as Britain floundered from one crisis to another in Anglo-Chinese, Anglo-Japanese and Anglo-Soviet relations, and the Foreign Office assessment was that although a Soviet-Japanese rapprochement would be disastrous for Britain, as a means of promptly isolating Hitler’s Germany an expanded Anti-Comintern Alliance was a dead issue. However, one hand did not know what the other was doing in Whitehall and on November 24 the Board of Trade abandoned the proposal for an Anglo-Japanese trade agreement.

By this time Seyss-Inquart had completed his survey of the Polish Generalgouvernement and reported that the Lublin area may be suitable for the placement of large numbers of Jews. A plan to the effect that a semi-independent Jewish region or reservation would be established to house all of the Jews from the Greater Reich in the Lublin region was given some press publicity and, on November 25, it was announced that the region would lie between the Vistula and Sans Rivers to the west and the Bug River to the east, big enough to concentrate several million people.³⁶

The basic idea had been current since the Evian conference and there has naturally been speculation about why it was announced at that time. It has been suggested that the area was sufficiently remote and inhospitable, swampy and disease-ridden so that mass extermination programs could be conducted without attracting world attention. That idea is given some credibility by the appointment of an experienced Nazi ‘butcher’ from Austria, Odilo Globocnik, as SSPF to have responsibility for “the systematic organization of all matters pertaining to the Jews of the district of Lublin,”³⁷ and by a note which Hans Frank wrote in his diary about three weeks later. “We cannot shoot 2,500,000 Jews, neither can we poison them. We shall have to take steps, however, designed to extirpate them in some way – and this will be done.”³⁸ In many respects the region was reminiscent of the area proposed 40 years earlier for a Jewish settlement in Uganda, with little immediate prospect for a productive livelihood except through the self-help establishment of large scale housing compounds. However, although oppression, gruesome brutality and large scale murder were the order of the Nazi day and had provided the basis for Zionist negotiations with the governments of the West, planning for systematic extermination did not begin for another year. Neither was it anticipated. If an attempt at extermination, as opposed to intimidation and brutality with the aim of forced removal, had been anticipated, the politics of ‘the Jewish question’ would have previously taken on a different complexion and a different course.

In the circumstances it can therefore be concluded that Hitler had other, or additional, motives. First: he still clung to the hope that he could force Britain and its Allies – plus the United States – to relieve him of the need for any other action in a negotiated peace agreement. The greater the pressure he applied to the Jewish community in the expanded Reich the more likely it was that the Jewish community overall and the Zionist Movement in particular would accept such a plan. Second: while he waited for such a development he could begin to develop his Lebensraum by putting the roundup into effect, thus making space for German resettlement, and also be prepared for mass emigration or deportation. Third: by holding out the prospect of a self-governing region for Jews he might satisfy Britain's demand that he recognize Poland's national interests and "cultural integrity" in an area which he had not annexed, only 'occupied', and which was therefore a potential rump Independent Poland for a peace settlement which enabled him to retain the balance of his territorial advances. Fourth: he would demonstrate that there were options to a Jewish national homeland in Palestine and thereby gain support in both Britain and the Arab countries by offering solutions to their crises. Fifth: by demonstrating his humility and humanity towards the Jews he would generate more sympathy around the world and wider acceptance of the legitimacy of Germany's claims. Sixth: if all else failed, he could certainly use it as a site to gather most of the Jews from the Greater Reich in one convenient area ready for mass slaughter. If Hitler's motives were limited to the first, second, and sixth in that cluster of linked motives, there would have been no point in providing press reports and seeking international publicity. Reporting and publicity only become relevant – indeed vital – when motives three, four and five come into play. This indicates that the prospect of a self-governing region in a rump independent Poland as an alternative to a national Jewish homeland in Palestine was the real issue behind the Lublin plan. That is supported by the fact that the reservation is described in contradictory terms as lying between the rivers Vistula, San, and Bug, which approximates the area of the Palestine mandate, or as an area of 300 to 400 square miles. If there was to be an ultimate population of three million that area would require a population density of between 7,500 and 10,000 per square mile which is that of a major industrial city. It can therefore be assumed that the information released was intended to encourage recognition and support internationally while avoiding a backlash from non-Jews within the region of the Generalgouvernement.

On November 27 Halifax told the War Cabinet that Britain should err on the side of caution and attempt to influence the international situation by agreeing to reopen wider talks with Japan over Tientsin, but without his knowledge the Orders in Council for the seizure of Japanese goods in line with the abandonment of Anglo-Japanese trade negotiations took effect that day! The seriousness with which Japan viewed the seizures was apparent when the Japanese ambassador immediately handed Halifax a vigorous note of protest. Not only had Britain seized Japanese goods worth 1.2 million pounds which were on ships in British ports in transit to Germany, it had also requisitioned machinery in British factories which had been built to fill orders which had been placed before the war and which was due for delivery to Japan. Anglo-Japanese relations plummeted and fears increased of a strengthening of the Soviet-Japanese agreement which would also enable supplies to reach Germany across the Soviet Union. Halifax was only able to restart talks with Japan against strong opposition in cabinet from Churchill when it was learned that the US, less offended at the new regulations than might have been the case, was negotiating with Japan for the reopening of the Yangtse River to commercial traffic.³⁹ It was then Japan's turn to apply strategic pressure. It would only agree to talk relaxation of restrictions on British trade in occupied China in return for relaxation of Britain's restriction of trade with Germany.

Next day, November 28, orders were issued for the establishment of Jewish Councils, the Judenrat, in the Polish Generalgouvernement. In communities of up to 10,000 persons they were to have twelve members, while in larger communities, 24, all elected by the Jewish communities but subject to confirmation or change by the local municipal authorities. They were to be responsible to the German administration to ensure that its orders were carried out throughout the reservation but the clear implication was that they would have some level of self-government. So Hitler waited for Britain to respond and the 'twilight war' dragged on.^{40 41} Because of his swift victory in Poland and the security provided on his eastern front by the treaty with Russia, Hitler believed time was on his side and that he could throw all of his forces against Britain and France on a single western front and either force them to the negotiating table or defeat them and impose his will. Only Britain and France stood between him and the implementation of his final solution – or so he thought. There was an immediate distraction.

FINLAND: A PAWN IN THE POWER GAMES

Whitehall's planners had been well aware that access to the Atlantic via an ice free port – and the in-depth protection for Leningrad from action in the Gulf of Finland which went with it – were even more important to Russia than securing its treaty with Germany by facilitating supplies from the east. Finland was therefore caught in the cross-fire of Germany, Russia and the Western Alliance. It had a strong Protestant base but it took a very independent stance in both religious and secular affairs and, although the government was fearful of Communist influence among its peasantry it was eager to avoid being a pawn in the Great Powers' war games. Then the Soviet Union, knowing very well that Germany could turn against it, having no wish to be hemmed in and wanting to safeguard Leningrad, requested rights to a minor part of Finland's Karelian Isthmus, a naval base at Hanko (Hangö), and some islands in the Gulf of Finland, all within the framework of an existing non-aggression pact between them. But Finland, jealous of its neutrality, rejected the requests. Russia promptly renounced the pact on November 30 and marched in to acquire the facilities for itself.

Britain and Germany had already fought several quite major naval battles with heavy losses on both sides and Germany and Poland had been engaged in a brutal, bloody and destructive military war of major proportions and world wide ramifications. Russia's Finnish military adventure, which began a few days after the announcement of the Lublin Plan, was, by comparison, a minor affair. It was actually a sideshow, or a secondary action triggered by the consequences of the major war between Britain and France, and Germany. However Russia's Finnish adventure brought interesting reactions from every quarter and especially from the Vatican which apparently thought that Hitler's brutal, bloody and destructive invasion of Poland with 60,000 Polish troops and 25,000 civilians killed, hundreds of Jews and a few of its own priests murdered, and 911,000 prisoners taken (694,000 by the Germans and 217,000 by the Russians)⁴² did not count as war. After all, the church had celebrated Hitler's 'great and glorious victory' over the Poles with a week of noon-hour bell ringing at all churches in Poland less than two months earlier in "joyful celebration" and out of "grateful commemoration" of Hitler's victory, (chapter 22), and the Pope had not yet condemned any Fascist or Nazi aggression, even though, for whatever reason, he had secretly agreed to be party to a plot to overthrow him more than three weeks earlier. However Pius XII now vigorously condemned the "unprovoked Soviet aggression" and put pressure on Mussolini to act against Russia. Mussolini there-upon urged Hitler not to abandon his anti-Semitic and anti-Bolshevist banner and not to invade the Western Alliance but to break his ties with Russia and to return to the struggle to demolish Bolshevism. If he did so it would bring into being an expanded version of the modified Anti-Comintern Pact proposal which had been mooted by Halifax, discussed by British diplomats in Italy and Spain and been blessed by the Vatican just two weeks before. How remarkable! How convenient! The British Government came under pressure from church groups which echoed the Vatican line – and many within the London establishment – to declare war on Red Russia which, they said, was the real enemy, not Hitler. And, similarly, the United States cut arms sales to Russia.

The short walk-over engagement which Russia expected did not materialize: not because of the capacity of the Finnish forces but because of aid from Britain, France and Italy. Each of them, acting as if they were in an alliance rather than suffering severely strained relations because of Italy's alliance with Germany, facilitated the movement of 'volunteers' to Helsinki, and Britain and France provided material aid. The Vatican, Western governments, and the very obliging media which had given the Lublin Plan only cursory coverage, took full advantage of a wonderful stream of propaganda material about the unequal struggle between the lovable, gentlemanly Finns and the dastardly, brutal Bolshevik Russians. The Council of the League of Nations was immediately convened to consider the crisis.

In view of the fact that Britain had initiated moves towards an expanded Anti-Comintern Pact in mid-November and that Mussolini made his approach to Hitler in response to pressure from the pope – also without being aware of the pope's agreement to facilitate a coup against Hitler three weeks earlier – it is inconceivable that Mussolini did not mention the pope's approaches to him and convey to Hitler the pope's support for his policies and actions – especially considering all the bell ringing in Warsaw. The two concordat holders shared almost all of their secrets, and this approach was hardly a secret at all. Surely the mask of neutrality had fallen from the papal face and Summi Pontificatus and Sertum Laetitiae could be seen for what they were: instruments of Vatican power politics. But who was in a position to make the exposure? Every government was trying to cover its dirty tracks, to conceal its double-crossing and conflicting treaty negotiations, and to avoid admitting that it was manipulating the religious factor in order to protect its commercial and political interests and influence. Especially Britain and the Vatican.

In fact the pope took the risk that his double dealing and dubious motives would be exposed immediately after Russia's invasion of Finland. On instructions from Pius XII, Kaas met

Osborne for lunch on December 1 to outline, in only very general terms, the conspiracy which was afoot. In return for such potentially world shattering intelligence Osborne gave Kaas only "equally vague encouragement."⁴³ Perhaps Whitehall took a little more encouragement from it, because Britain and then Japan both made some adjustments to their demands on each other during early December, the freeze in relations eased, and Whitehall was moving towards a formal trade agreement – "a beneficial economic deal" – within six months which could provide the basis of a Sino-Japanese peace agreement. On December 4 the War Cabinet decided that a settlement ought be pursued, but it was deemed wise to consult the US first. It was finding its support for the Finns against the Russians quite a help in easing the strain in its relations with Japan and on December 7 Chamberlain announced that Britain was selling 35 fighter aircraft to Finland. France was much more supportive. Its massive aid during the early stage of the campaign included 145 planes, 496 heavy (artillery) guns, 5,000 machine guns, 200,000 hand grenades, 400,000 rifles, and 20 million rounds of ammunition.⁴⁴ As a consequence Russia had to call on much increased force to overcome the bolstered Finnish resistance. In its response to Britain's enquiry about a trade-for-peace deal with Japan the US State Department advised, on December 9, that it saw "no acceptable peace in the near future" and that it was opposed to any concessions to Japan.⁴⁵

The League of Nations began its emergency meeting on the Finnish crisis in Geneva on December 11, and next day, December 12, Morgenthau advised Britain that Roosevelt was not happy with progress towards reopening the Yangtse. He proposed to proceed with the abrogation of its commercial treaty with Japan, and "wished in collaboration with Britain and France to introduce an embargo on the export of strategic ferro-alloys, such as molybdenum and nickel, to Germany, the Soviet Union and Japan."⁴⁶ This meant that if Britain wanted to retain US support for its war in Europe it could no longer pursue reconciliation through a trade agreement with Japan. To do so would put it "seriously out of step with the Americans" at a time when Morgenthau was (on instructions from Roosevelt) assessing Britain's ability to pay for war supplies, and US public opinion was opposed to lending money to either Britain or France. Strike three to Sertum Laetitiae. Next day, December 13, China advised that it was not happy with some aspects of Britain's proposed settlement of the Tientsin dispute, the Foreign Office was thrown "into a state of utter dismay" and Britain had to contemplate taking further restrictive measures against Japan.⁴⁷ The matter had to go to the War Cabinet and negotiations continued at diplomatic level while a brief was prepared for its meeting on January 23, 1940.

In the meantime Hitler was consolidating his authority and overcoming the hostility of his generals. A conference at the Chancellery on November 23, regarded by General Halder as "a day of crisis" because Hitler threatened to annihilate anyone who stood in his way, was a milestone in that process of consolidation, marking Hitler's "final, decisive triumph over the Army which, in the First World War, had shunted Emperor Wilhelm II aside and assumed supreme political as well as military authority in Germany."⁴⁸ Britain's relations with Soviet Russia continued to deteriorate because of its provision of arms for Finland and they reached crisis point when the Soviet Union was expelled from the League of Nations on December 14.

Its ambassador in Moscow reported that “the Soviets were more or less in a state of undeclared war against Britain.”

From Finland all eyes turned to the other Scandinavian countries which were major suppliers of iron ore for Germany, Norway and Sweden. Hitler planned ways to secure supplies while Britain set out to stop them. In a memorandum dated December 16, Churchill urged cabinet to break Norway’s neutrality by mining its coastal waters and to prepare to fight Germany on Norwegian soil in “a major offensive operation of war.” He also proposed the diversion of its iron ore supplies to Britain. He justified his proposed breach of international law on the grounds that the complete stoppage of supplies would be equal to a first class victory in the field and that it might even be “immediately decisive” in the war. He said that if Norway retaliated Britain could bring its entire industry to a standstill by embargoes but he did not expect retaliation because the people could suffer far worse if Germany occupied the country.

CHURCHILL’S JUSTIFICATION

Churchill also set out in his note to cabinet a virtual justification for the war and a blue print for five years of propaganda at home, in the dominions and in neutral countries. While it did not correspond very closely, except in one respect, with the factors which had actually forced Britain to war it cannot be said that Churchill was being inconsistent. He was an imperialist in the strict sense of the word but he aimed for consistency in foreign policy. When he drafted his memo he certainly had in mind the predicament of the Jews, among whom he had many personal friends, and the interests of The Focus which he had pursued quite strongly since the group was established in 1936. He was consistent in his support for the Zionist program and opposed the watering down of the government’s commitment to the Balfour Declaration, and he was trenchantly critical of appeasement and the Munich Agreement. Speaking in debate on the issue after the signing he told the House of Commons that Munich was “a total and unmitigated defeat”, adding: “This is only the beginning of the reckoning. This is only the first sip, the first foretaste of a bitter cup which will be proffered to us year by year unless, by a supreme recovery of moral health and martial vigour, we arise again and take our stand for freedom as in the olden times.”⁴⁹ One can therefore sense the emotion with which he composed his note on Norway for cabinet.

The final tribunal is our own conscience. We are fighting to re-establish the reign of law and to protect the liberties of small countries. Our defeat would mean an age of barbaric violence, and would be fatal not only to ourselves, but to the independent life of every small country in Europe. Acting in the name of the Covenant, and as virtual mandatories of the League and all it stands for, we have a right, and indeed are bound in duty, to abrogate for a space some of the conventions of the very laws we seek to consolidate and reaffirm. Small nations must not tie our hands when we are fighting for their rights and freedom. The letter of the law must not in supreme urgency obstruct those who are charged with its prosecution and enforcement. It would not be right or rational that the Aggressor Power should gain one set *of advantages by tearing up all laws, and another set by sheltering behind the innate respect for law of its opponents. Humanity, rather than legality, must be our guide.*⁵⁰

In view of the situation in Scandinavia, and in a move which was presumably an extension of the initiative suggested by Halifax in mid-November, the Chiefs of Staff were asked on December 22 to prepare a memorandum on the contingencies which might lead to a war with the Soviet Union.⁵¹

THE CATCH

That evening, almost two months after Sertum Laetitiae and with a long delay since he advised the Vatican of his intention, Roosevelt contacted his friend Myron C. Taylor by phone and asked him to act as Special Representative of the President to the Vatican. It was just two days before Pius XII was due to announce the new relationship between the Vatican and the US president in his Christmas address, complete with his five point peace plan, on December 24. Apparently the delay resulted in part from the pope's reluctance to accept a 'personal representative' in place of an ambassador – a position which would have been more consistent with his political aspirations and which would have brought greater prestige for the Vatican. However Taylor, a wealthy, right wing businessman and retired president of US Steel had led the US delegation to the Evian Conference the year before – and he kept an autographed portrait of Mussolini in his office.⁵² Perfect for the job.

About the time that Pius XII delivered his Christmas message, the first of six centres specially designed to satisfy Hitler's mid-October order for the disposal of all "incurable patients" began operating. Naturally it took a while for the operatives to develop the level of efficiency Hitler demanded and in the early stages the victims were shot individually. In due course gas chambers and poison showers were introduced and these were soon adapted and refined for other programs as well. But in this first 'trial program' the total number of ill, criminal and incapacitated persons "processed" in nine months has been estimated at nearly 100,000. The program was simply an extension of the sterilization programs which Hitler had adapted from the United States. The fate of patients in mental hospitals was determined by their doctors who were required to complete questionnaires on those in their care. This was a traumatic responsibility for the doctors concerned, but it was also another direct challenge to the churches. It obliged them to weigh their commitment to Gospel teaching on the care and support of one's fellows against their commitment to support their 'national interest' irrespective of questions of morality.

With the world crisis continuing to deepen, Kaas met Osborne again on January 8, 1940, and, although he refused to divulge the name of the Vatican's contacts, he indicated that the German military coup plot "was still in the air." Then on January 12 Pius XII took the plunge and summoned Osborne for a personal audience. He told the British minister that he had been visited by a representative of certain German army chiefs and that he had "reliable information that a violent offensive was planned by Germany in the west in February" but that "the offensive might not occur if these army chiefs overthrew Hitler.” They could only do this, the pope said, “on the understanding that Britain would guarantee an honourable peace for Germany.” When Osborne expressed scepticism and said that the French would have to be informed, in secret, Pius XII replied that “having thus salved his conscience, he would not even expect any answer.”⁵³ He was no longer showing the near-spontaneous or impulsive want to intervene which he had at the time of Müller’s visit five weeks earlier, suggesting that he had indeed thought through some of the implications of the situation. Osborne seems to have responded in like manner, sending his report to Halifax in writing by diplomatic pouch and not by urgent coded cable, and noting that he found the whole thing “hopelessly vague” and reminiscent of the catastrophic Venloo affair in Holland. He said the pope relayed the communication “purely for information,” not wishing to endorse or recommend it and with the comment that “perhaps, after all, it is not worth proceeding with the matter and he would therefore ask me to regard his communication to me as not having been made.” Osborne also reported that the pope’s “spontaneous offer, after my expressions of scepticism, to cancel his communication to me shows that he does not relish being used as a channel and that he has little expectation of any result.”⁵⁴ There was certainly nothing in the pope’s communication to suggest that he had changed his attitude significantly towards either Hitler’s leadership, his social policies, or his expansionist ambitions, and therefore it confirmed that his only real argument with Hitler was over his manipulation of the church, his failure to adhere to the details of the Reich Concordat, and his oppression of anti-Nazi clergy.

Although Churchill, chafing at the bit for a bigger role in the conduct of the war, was personally ambivalent towards the church he was also playing the religion game along with the best of players. He tried to enthuse cabinet by predicating Britain’s role in the war on the long-established self-understanding that Britain, as the leading proponent of Protestant Christianity, was endowed with all the rights and authorities of the world’s policeman and teacher of morality all rolled into one entity because the other countries of Europe had defaulted on their share of the responsibility. Perhaps he was influenced by the decision of the leaders of the Scandinavian churches to declare in favour of mediation between Britain and Germany as hostile powers, and by Bishop Berggrav’s visit to statesmen in Berlin and London for this purpose.

With the world in such a mess it was bound to help strengthen the scaffold which propped up the amorphous Christian gel to some extent when Pius XII announced his peace proposal, Five Points for Peace, and the new relationship between the Vatican and the United States with his Christmas message, provided that Italy remained neutral. But if Italy entered the war, and especially if the United States also entered and was part of an opposing alliance, both the Lateran Treaty and the scaffold were in real danger. When Taylor arrived in Rome in January to set up his officially unofficial mission, (his assistant, Harold H. Tittman, and his staff were on detached duty from the State Department⁵⁵), he was therefore the channel for communications of far greater importance than the world at large could grasp. Running through Roosevelt’s letter to Pius XII advising of Taylor’s appointment there was a definite assumption that the response to his support for the Vatican would be a papal move away from neutrality towards support for the Western Alliance. He wrote:

*In these present moments no spiritual leader, no civil leader can move forward on a specific plan to terminate destruction and build anew. Yet the time for that will surely come. It is, therefore, my thought that though no given action or given time may now be prophesied, it is well that we encourage a closer association between those in every part of the world, those in religion and those in government who have a common cause.*⁵⁶

However although the pope's address when he formally received Taylor contained words which were publicized by the American Government as an indication that he intended to respond in like manner (quite apart from obvious relief that he had gained a major objective) his comments were actually just as ambiguous as in Summi Pontificatus. He said that the establishment of the US mission was "an exemplary act of fraternal and hearty solidarity between the Old and the New World in defence against the chilling breath of aggressive and deadly godless and anti-Christian tendencies" which threatened to dry up the sources of civilization. He foresaw only a "slight probability of immediate success so long as the present state of the opposing forces remains essentially unchanged" even though he was apparently hopeful for the longer term future.⁵⁷ There was no public debate about the pope's motives at the time, naturally, because of the censorship imposed in Europe and the fact that the feuding parties had not resolved who was playing for Gog and who for Magog, but during the years following the war the matter was debated at length. Was the pope referring to Nazi Germany as having "the chilling breath of aggressive and deadly godless and anti-Christian tendencies" or was he referring to Communist Soviet Russia?

Most books which were published on the subject did no more than throw up a smoke screen behind which the Vatican could avoid damaging disclosures. However, in view of the fact that Germany and Russia were then in alliance against Britain and France, that they were not then opposed to each other, and that the Vatican saw itself as the only force in opposition to Communist Russia, the conclusion already noted, that the Vatican simply wanted the United States to commit itself against Soviet Russia, is impossible to sidestep. If that meant forcing Britain and France to negotiate a settlement with Hitler which would end the war in the west and enable Hitler to thrust eastward, how wonderful it would be! That conclusion is totally consistent with Sertum Laetitia and with the 'conversion' of the Halifax plan under Vatican influence. After all, Hitler's Anti-Comintern Pact had signatories who were also recipients of Vatican Concordats, including his protector state, Italy, which had not yet made its final decision on whether to join Gog or Magog, or either of them for that matter, in spite of its twin alliances with Germany. So, while Roosevelt aimed to prevent the Vatican from rocking the boat, Pius XII aimed to eliminate Communism and to reinforce the scaffold which propped up the amorphous Christian gel in more ways than one. This is what commentators friendly to the Vatican, or who have not explored other implications behind the encyclicals, have referred to ad nauseam as the pope's 'neutrality' throughout World War II. It is better interpreted as 'taking advantage of the war to strengthen the power of the papacy.'

The Roman Catholic Church in the United States enjoyed a degree of independence from the Vatican which few other national Catholic churches had been able to achieve and it was administered through a more broadly based conciliar or collegiate system with the National Catholic Welfare Conference having an important role. There were, therefore, many American Catholics who were no more interested in the establishment of formal links between their government and the Vatican than the Protestant community, even though they wanted a greater say in national policy making for their church.⁵⁸

The growth of independence in the Catholic church in the United States had corresponded with, and been influenced by, the development of the American Protestant Work Ethic. This had led to Leo XIII's condemnation of the "American Heresy" or of the weakening of doctrinal "purity" and contemplation with more emphasis on practical virtues in 1899. That controversy contributed to the decision in 1908 to remove the church in the US from control of the Vatican's Sacred Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples (the Propaganda) in 1908 and it was still raging when Pius X introduced the Oath Against Modernism in 1910. The growth of Catholic missionary enterprises in the US during the next few years was very rapid and the National Catholic War Council was established in 1917 as an advisory and coordinating agency of American bishops for education, communications, immigration, social action, legislation, youth and lay organization. The term "Welfare" was substituted for "War" in its title a few years later, but its responsibilities remained the same and it had many achievements to its credit and significant national influence by the time Pius XII made his bid for closer Vatican links with the governments. [In 1966 the role of America's Catholic bishops was further strengthened in relation to the Vatican by the establishment of the National Conference of Catholic Bishops with pastoral and juridical authority for the church in the US. The N.C.W.C. was renamed the United States Catholic Conference at the same time.]^{59 60}

When Taylor took up his new appointment, Roosevelt gave him a brief to investigate every possibility for an early end of hostilities and to open discussions with the pope on the issues of freedom of religion, reduction of armaments, freedom of trade and freedom of information.⁶¹ The four discussion points could perhaps be paraphrased as "to open negotiations through the pope of the Jewish question, rearrangement of production; how to trade with both warring groups at once; and access to the Vatican's diplomatic and intelligence systems."^{62 63} In any case the Vatican and the White House were soon working as partners in a tacit alliance with the aim of keeping Italy out of the war. And the Taylor mission was doing all it could to "integrate" the efforts of the pope and the president or to line the pope up behind the president and US policy.

However there was little more enthusiasm within the British government for intervention by churches, of whatever hue, than there was within other governments. When Halifax read Osborne's report of his audience with the pope to the war cabinet on January 17 it simply agreed "that the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs should take suitable steps to inform the French Government of the communication which had been made by His Holiness the Pope to Mr. Osborne."⁶⁴ An opportunity of enormous significance had been rejected. If the British government had taken up that opportunity the course of the parody would have been altered dramatically. The war would have continued for a time, no doubt, while the Western democracies and the totalitarian states worked out a more or less acceptable relationship, and the trouble in the triangle would have not been spontaneously resolved. But there would have been an opportunity to at least recognize the basis of the triangle and to move towards understanding it and dismantling it. However the British government's mistrust towards the Vatican, and the Vatican's determination to sustain and expand its system of concordats in association with totalitarian governments ensured that the parody would continue. The governments of the amorphous Christian gel and their churches would continue to take decisions and to pursue policies based on their spurious self-understandings which contradicted the principles and beliefs which they asserted, compounded the problems which they were supposed to be solving, and further undermined human relationships. These things would drag the world deeper and deeper into conflict and expose them to ridicule and retaliation in due course as the trouble in the triangle moved towards its climax.

Some members of the interim World Council of Churches also sought direct intervention by the Council as the peak body for Reformed and Protestant Churches, and the matter was discussed at the meeting of the Administrative Committee near Apeldoorn, Holland, at about that time, late in January. The Scandinavian representatives wished to discuss further steps towards mediation which might be taken by churches. However there was no agreement about whether such intervention in international affairs was a proper aspect of the WCC's role. In fact there was considerable difference of opinion. Some members of the committee believed that the urgent task of the Church was to work for mediation, and that a pronouncement concerning the basic issues at stake in the conflict would jeopardize action for peace. Others believed that a definite statement should be made condemning aggression and the suppression of freedom. A number of draft statements were submitted to the committee and rejected, and it was decided to continue discussion by correspondence. But outside the formal administrative committee meeting, being frustrated at the rejection of their case, Archbishop Temple and the four other British participants drew up and signed a statement concerning the conditions under which, in their opinion, negotiations could be opened. Like the papal peace proposals a few weeks before it, it was published in the British press.

While the tension continued to mount in Europe, the New Year certainly did not lessen Britain's worries in the Far East. Late in December, without waiting for a cabinet decision, the governor of the Straits Settlements had refused export permits for tin from Malaya unless a guarantee was given that the shipments were not for re-export to Germany,⁶⁵ and the crisis deepened dramatically during January when a British naval vessel intercepted a Japanese merchant ship 35 miles from the Japanese coast and arrested 13 German officers and eight technical ratings. They had been stranded in the neutral US and were returning to Germany via Japan and the Trans-Siberian railway. On January 23, 1940, the day the War cabinet was due to consider the crisis, Craigie learned that the Admiralty was planning to intercept another Japanese merchant vessel and, having faced a strong protest from Japan's Vice-Minister for Foreign Affairs only the day before, he sent Whitehall a telegram with a strong warning that another such incident could lead to war.⁶⁶ His warning was heeded, the Admiralty was “restrained from further actions,” and cabinet sat down to consider Britain’s finances and joint advice from the Foreign Office and the Ministry for Economic Warfare.

BRITAIN’S FINANCIAL CRISIS

The brutal fact was that at the planned rate of spending Britain and the entire Sterling area would have an adverse trade balance of 800 million pounds for the first year of the war and that Britain would run out of dollars within two years.⁶⁷ The joint ministries’ advice was that the course of the war could not be foreseen, that Britain was fighting for its life, and “it is clear that the Allies cannot afford to reject any friendly approach from the President of the United States nor fail to examine to the full the potentialities of the joint control of raw materials which Mr. Roosevelt has tentatively outlined.”⁶⁸ Eden said it was unfortunate that the US wanted to take a hard line with Japan just when Britain was moving to improve relations between them, but cabinet agreed to propose a joint British-French delegation to Washington and, as an interim measure, to restrict the sale of strategic ferro-alloys to Japan. *Anglo-Japanese trade relations were thus set on collision course*⁶⁹ with the growing prospect of war while Britain continued its efforts to get a more favourable finance and trade deal in place with the United States for arms and munitions to enable it to continue to fight its existing war with Germany.

At that time Roosevelt was steadily working the nation into an anti-German mode in spite of a number of constraints. These included the papal overture; the Vatican’s pressure for the United States to make an assault on Soviet Communism a higher priority than the defeat of Hitler; the strong pro-German sentiment in some influential sections of the US; and deep divisions within Congress which required him to maintain the appearance of neutrality. It was not strictly a pro-British mode, reflecting its early history, and it was certainly not a show of support for the concept of empire. Its history actually contributed to anti-British feeling and the US was eager to assume the world dominance which the decadent European powers had enjoyed for too long. It was eager to extend its trade, its influence and its control of resources at the expense of Britain and its Imperial Preference trade arrangements, especially in the Middle East. Similarly the anti-German emphasis was not a simple response to Hitler’s social policies and anti-Semitism. It was much more involved than that and, as already noted, Hitler had drawn heavily on legislation and writings from the US in framing his ‘new philosophy.’ It was basically fear that a German victory would isolate the US and weaken its position.

If the war continued and if Germany’s alliance with Japan and its non-aggression pact with Russia both held, the US would be shut out of any role in the Middle East, in other Muslim countries, in East and South East Asia, and in the Pacific. However a victory for the European Allies without United States involvement would tend to strengthen the European Colonial influence in each of these spheres with the same result: no major role for the United States. Furthermore the Jewish authorities were also painfully aware of the situation. They knew that a German victory, with or without Russia, left them with very few options except to find a way into the United States, even recognizing the stringent anti-Semitic migration laws which it still had in place. But a victory for a British-French alliance without American involvement would have much the same effect. In either case the European powers' relations with the Arab countries would mean the end of plans for a Jewish National Home in Palestine. At the same time the British and French Governments knew that if Germany dominated Europe they would be hard pressed to defeat her without either Russian or American involvement, or both.

Thus, unless there was a speedily negotiated peace it was inevitable that the United States would be drawn into the war through a combination of self interest, British and French appeals for help and pressure from the international Jewish community. It was only a matter of time. A negotiated settlement would have required territorial concessions – certainly involving the loss or partial loss of control of the Middle East – and resettlement of the entire Jewish population from German controlled territories into other countries. The combination of domestic resistance in Britain and France, the attitude of the Vatican and the virtual failure of the Evian Conference made it quite clear that such a resettlement plan would not work even if the Jewish community was prepared to accept it, and there would have to be a lot of hard talking to persuade the US to relax its migration restrictions.

However during the few weeks that it took Germany to break the Polish army and to secure most of the country there was an expectation, or a forlorn hope perhaps, in some sections of the British Government that Hitler would be prepared to pause after gaining his Polish prize and that a truce could be arranged on the basis of “another Munich.” This was the thrust of the report which Joseph Kennedy had cabled to Roosevelt on September 11, 1939. Kennedy told Roosevelt that the British Government could not accept any agreement with Hitler “but there may be a point when the President himself may work out a plan for world peace” and be “the savior of the world” and he implied that Britain would have to pay any price to avoid “complete economic, financial and social collapse (from which) nothing will be saved after the war is over.”⁷⁰ (chapter 22) It is reasonable to assume that the Vatican's assessment was very similar. It could see benefits from both Hitler's strengthened position and the weakened position or defeat of the Soviet Union, and very large pickings from the self-interest, vacillation and intervention of the United States as it also sought to take advantage of the complex situations in each of Europe, the Middle East and the Far East.

Then in February the Vatican's diplomats, like those of other governments, were hard pressed to keep abreast of all the hurried negotiations in Europe and in Asia as the principal powers jockeyed for position. As the military encounter between Finland and the Soviet Union ran into its third month the Soviet negotiators were especially busy. Finland gradually succumbed to a mauling and opened negotiations towards a peace treaty while the Soviet Union was also engaged in trade talks with Germany which were designed to strengthen its position and hold the Germans at bay. Russia's main demand on Finland was for an area of Karelian to allow it access to ports on both the Baltic and the Barents seas. Without that access to ice-free harbours, as British and American “intervention” had shown when Russia was trying to opt out of the Great War, Russia's position in relation to the other power blocks was substantially weakened. The Soviet Union did not want a repeat of the 1918 "intervention", but in view of the attitude of the Vatican and the British, the pressure which was being applied to the United States, and the uncertainty of its alliance with Germany, it had to prepare for it.

As those negotiations were getting under way, and in spite of having been firmly rebuffed by Britain after his meeting with Osborne just a month before, Pius XII summoned Osborne for an urgent audience on February 7 in circumstances of penny-spy-thriller intrigue. He sent an under-cover agent in the dead of night to tell the British minister that he should arrive at noon, not dress formally, and tell no one that he was going to see the pope. Osborne was able to report to Halifax the same day that the pope had been approached again by the German military conspirators who he refused to name, saying only that one was a well known general; that Hitler's offensive in the west which had been planned for February had been postponed due to inclement weather; that the organizers sought an undertaking that following a coup Germany would not be dismembered in the event of a British-French invasion and an armistice; and that they gave an undertaking that Germany would be established as a democratic, conservative, moderate, decentralized and federalized nation within the Munich frontiers.⁷¹ Nine days later, on February 16, Osborne took Lord Halifax's wife and son to meet the pope and in his report he told Halifax that Pius XII had drawn him aside to say that the conspirators had confirmed their intention to change the government. He noted that his own reply had been to the effect that if they wanted a change they should get on with it, but even with a change of government he didn't see how Britain could make peace "so long as the German military machine remained intact."⁷² That report crossed in the mail with a three page reply from Halifax, dated February 17, in which the sentiments were essentially the same as in the government's response on January 23. If any progress was to be made the British government must first broach the subject with the French government and this could only be done on the basis of a definite program submitted and authoritatively vouched for. In other words names were required and not just "ideas emanating from undisclosed sources."⁷³ Müller shuttled between Rome and Berlin; the conspirators waited for Britain's guarantee; Britain waited to learn who they were; rumours circulated that Kaas was a Nazi spy planted in the Vatican; and Halifax learned that King George VI had already been alerted to a plot to dispose of Hitler.⁷⁴ The mistrust and intrigue continued. Nothing had changed.

While Britain procrastinated the Soviet Union was strengthening its position in the west, but at the expense of its improved relations with Japan. Rumours reached London that Japan was about to propose an anti-Soviet joint front with Britain and France in Asia – a counterpart for the expanded Anti-Comintern Pact which Britain had proposed in November – and Craigie advised Whitehall that Japan would be a natural ally because of its concern with Soviet expansion. This was in spite of the fact that a new German-Soviet trade agreement had been signed on February 16, that Germany was building an extensive network of suppliers in East Asia, including Japan, and that vital commodities would be transported via the Trans-Siberian Railway.

Since the start of the war, and especially as a consequence of Britain's machinations in the Far East during the early part of the northern winter, officials in Washington had become even more conscious of the fact that US and British interests in the Far East did not correspond, in much the manner that the joint ministries report to the British cabinet had shown on January 23. It was therefore decided to establish a special naval intelligence unit to intercept Japanese government communications and special arrangements were made for selected military and diplomatic intelligence to be channelled directly, and secretly, to Roosevelt. Key persons in the new system were Lt. Commander Arthur McCollum who was appointed head of the Far East desk of naval intelligence with responsibility to personally convey urgent items to the president, and Lt. Commander Joseph Rochefort who became head of Station H (HYPO) at Pearl Harbour. The first of those urgent items were delivered to Roosevelt by seaplane on February 23 while he was on an eighteen-day fishing trip aboard the cruiser USS Tuscaloosa off the Pacific coast of Panama. They showed that Japan was applying diplomatic pressure to obtain oil export rights in Portuguese Timor, portion of an island in the Dutch East Indies, and that military advisers were being sent to Bolivia which had vast reserves of tin which Japan needed for its military-industrial complex. That new system became vital to the US administration's ability to monitor Japan's response to the mass of international manipulation targeted at it and to join the manipulation game.⁷⁵

During the Finnish-Russian negotiations for an armistice the pope called for reparations for the states whose equality of rights had been destroyed, attacked or threatened. It was a typically vague diplomatic call which could be interpreted in any number of ways. Was "reparations" to be read as restoration of pre-conflict status; as payments to governments or individuals for losses and injuries suffered but with recognition of the new political situation assumed; or as some sort of negotiations through third parties whose interests were also involved, such as Britain or the Vatican, to ensure continuity of commercial or ecclesiastical interests such as concordats? Church historians are generally just as vague on that point as the pope's call had been. Clearly he was preoccupied with the future of the Roman Catholic church in Poland ⁷⁶ but the Vatican had concordats with each of Austria and Czechoslovakia which had already been absorbed by Germany, and also with Lithuania and Latvia which had been forced into mutual defence agreements with Russia by Hitler's deal with Stalin. Therefore because both Estonia, (with its three-way mix of Protestant, Orthodox and Catholic communities), and Finland had been forced into much the same situation as Latvia and Lithuania, any talk of reparations would have to apply equally to them.

Of course talk of reparations would certainly not apply to any displaced Jews. In fact quite the reverse. Britain, having snubbed German overtures about the Lublin Jewish Reservation plan, was still having to placate the Arabs in Palestine so that the crisis in the Middle East did not flare up to complicate its troubles even more, and in February additional restrictions on land transfers in Palestine were announced in accordance with the White Paper. These things naturally combined to further stimulated Zionist activity in the US and pressure on Roosevelt to intervene directly against Germany. But to do so was inconsistent with the implications of Sertum Laetitiae, with the pope's 'encouragement' for Mussolini to support Hitler and to oppose Russia, and with Mussolini's subsequent urging for Hitler to continue his anti-Semitic policies and to turn against Russia. Roosevelt therefore had many issues to consider in his balancing-act decisions.

Russia, having gained the concessions which it had demanded in negotiations with Finland, was on the brink of having secure and unrestricted access between the Atlantic to its west and the Pacific and Japan to its east. Security of supplies for Germany, Russia and Japan from anywhere in the world was therefore virtually assured and, if the alliance between the three nations recovered and blossomed, and if the United States did not intervene, Britain and France were in very deep trouble indeed. The Chiefs of Staff assessment, provided for cabinet on March 8, was that Russia's most likely move would be to threaten Britain's grip on India by an advance into Afghanistan. In that event, they said, "the extent to which Japanese action might cause us embarrassment would depend on the attitude of the United States" although, on the other hand, Japan, being disturbed by Russia's invasion of Finland, might try to strengthen its position in relation to Russia by a compromise arrangement with Britain, and there had been some Japanese diplomatic approaches to the effect that "Britain and Japan had a common enemy in Russia."⁷⁷

THE VATICAN'S TARGET: COMMUNISM

In fact by that date Craigie was already urging the government to use the Russian factor as a means of developing "more fruitful Anglo-Japanese collaboration" and units of Whitehall were working on a plan for the joint Anglo-French bombing of the Baku oil field to cripple the Russian economy and reduce oil sales to Germany. That would have required Japanese cooperation in full scale war against Russia and some Foreign Office officials feared that Japan's price for such cooperation would be the end of British support for China, that this would have disastrous consequences for Britain's relations with the United States, and that "the issue could not be properly addressed until war had actually broken out between Britain and Russia."⁷⁸ There was an implied assumption that this would happen and that it was necessary to broaden the war in that way in order to draw other nations in and, in so doing, improve Britain's chances of survival. Clearly there was confusion in Whitehall, but there was also a lack of honesty, openness and trust between each of the Western Powers, including the Vatican, in discussing their motives with each other and with their publics. Intrigue was the standard practice of the day and the world would have to suffer as a consequence.

But regardless of the attitude of the US administration to Britain's relations with Japan and China, was it possible for the US to continue to scout around the fringes of the play? The existence of a power block of such enormity as Germany-Russia-Japan placed its own economic and political security at risk. The simplest way to prevent the alliance from blossoming was, according to the Vatican, to pluck Russia out from between the other two. But how? The Vatican's aim was to destroy the Soviet Union and Communism. On March 11

Ribbentrop visited Mussolini in a bid to draw Italy into the war immediately and while he was in Rome he also called on Pius XII. He avoided any discussion about peace initiatives; countered the pope's criticism of Nazi attacks on Catholics and church property with claims that "the clergy has not yet understood that it is not their business to meddle in politics;" deflected a request that he sanction a Vatican envoy to Poland; sought to dissuade the pope from criticizing the Nazi regime; and was more frank than many Western leaders when, in response to a question from Pius XII, he said he believed in God but he was "not addicted to any church."⁷⁹

Certainly the Vatican was not at all interested in a move to befriend Russia at the expense of Hitler's Germany and it was therefore very concerned when the Finnish-Russian Treaty of Moscow was signed on March 12 and Russia's position was strengthened enormously. Finland ceded ten percent of its territory which it might have retained if it had agreed to Russia's demands for 'rights' in November: the Karelian Peninsula with access to the Barents Sea, and a wedge in the southeast on the Gulf of Finland including the city of Vyborg. It also leased the peninsula of Hanko to the Soviet Union for 30 years. Roosevelt was equally concerned and, with Britain pressing for a relaxation of US Neutrality restrictions on the supply of military and other supplies, he had a showdown at the White House with senior generals in the War Department over their resistance to cooperate in his aid program. He was irritated because Congress would not agree to appropriate massive funds to boost military production and preparedness but he also faced deliberate obstruction. In one incident the head of the Army Air Force, General Arnold, supported by the Assistant Secretary for War, Louis Johnson, refused to release classified data on aircraft engines and superchargers. Roosevelt, in very angry mood, ordered Arnold to "toe the line or resign" and instructed Johnson to announce publicly his support for the British aid Liaison Committee.

Two days later, on March 14, the British cabinet adopted a recommendation from the MEW (subject to French agreement) that a total blockade of Russia's Pacific port of Vladivostok should be imposed by the Royal Navy in cooperation with Japan and the United States. Japan would be coerced into cooperation by temporarily rationing its supplies of imperial raw materials with a promise of advantageous quotas "if it complied with British economic warfare policy." It was a dramatic turning point in world affairs. It was to be one of those beacons around which the ships of state must wallow in a storm before heading off on another bearing into uncharted waters. Up until this point the British government had still clung to the belief that it could represent Europe and the Far East as two separate situations which could be treated in grand isolation, with the Middle East as a third which, while it desperately sought to camouflage the fact, complicated each of the others. However there was no longer any prospect of that. All three were intimately and inextricably entwined. They could not possibly be disentangled. But few people understood that there had been a change of bearing and still no one was prepared to recognize that the situation had its roots in the history and self-understanding of the amorphous Christian gel. The chain which held the beacon in place was the Vatican's pressure for the United States to become involved in the war in Europe in order to destroy Soviet Communism as a political and economic force and a challenge to its authority and self-understanding: Sertum Laetitia. Another one would be added within a few months.

Hitler could see that the Western Powers were battering down the hatches for a long haul and that brute force, not negotiation, was going to determine the outcome of his war with Britain and its Allies. He or Himmler had decided that the plan for a self-governing Jewish region based on Lublin was going to serve no purpose. Reports of brutality in the region were getting more space in the foreign press than the plan itself and it was obvious that a self governing Jewish region in a rump independent Poland could not compete with Zionist ambition to have a national homeland in Palestine for the attention of Western governments. On March 23, with Himmler's support, Goering directed that it be cancelled. There would be no distinction between the treatment of Jews in Lublin or anywhere else. Their lives would simply get tougher and tougher while the search continued for alternatives to neutralize the impact of Jews within Europe.⁸⁰

On March 28, with the US not yet consulted but with Japan quite eager for trade talks, the Anglo-French Supreme War Council agreed to the plan with some adjustments to Japan's benefit. However it was not implemented. Treasury found that the changing trade balances would actually depress the value of Sterling and make the purchase of arms from the US even more difficult and this was more critical than blocking supplies to Russia and Germany.⁸¹ But perhaps the United States had an alternative to propping Britain up with one hand and trying to pluck Russia out of its alliance with the other. If Britain could talk to Japan, why couldn't the United States do so? Secretary of State Hull had actually opened discussions with Japan's Ambassador Nomura while those British plans were being hatched, and Britain was not advised.⁸² And some people thought Britain was doing too much talking. On March 30 Pius XII again spoke to Osborne about the conspiracy to topple Hitler which seemed to be running out of steam because of the mutual lack of trust and foresight between the parties. He was upset by having learned that Britain was fielding peace feelers from other sources also, and apparently took Osborne to task about the "leakiness" of the British system which had helped to place the Holy See "in fruitless jeopardy."⁸³

Early in April, about the same time that Generalgouvernement district commanders were officially told of Goering's direction that the Lublin Reservation Plan had been rescinded, the General Secretary of the WCC submitted a new proposal for international mediation to members of its Administrative Committee. But just then, following Roosevelt's confrontation with his military planners, the US signed extensive new aircraft contracts with Britain and France which brought their total cash commitment to the US to about a thousand million dollars. This meant that Britain lurched towards a far bigger trade deficit than Treasury had anticipated in January but, as a consequence and after several months of delay, the British Cabinet was able to authorize a blockade of the Norwegian iron ore port of Narvik. Mine laying began on April 8 and by the time WCC members were able to respond to the mediation proposal 'the real war' had erupted well and truly. A completely different situation faced the council. It had real difficulty maintaining contact and operations through its normal cross-border committees. It was in no position to propose international mediation or much else at all. The churches, other than the politically powerful Vatican, had been sidelined. Any proposals they might make were virtually meaningless. WCC staff had to be retrenched, plans for a first assembly in 1941 had to be cancelled, and the Protestant churches faced the prospect that their council may disintegrate completely.⁸⁴ The Council's crisis was, of course, simply an indicator of far greater crisis which it was then increasingly difficult for the world to avoid.

If Britain's intention in imposing the blockade was to prevent massive escalation of the war it had left its decision too late. German land occupation of Denmark was accomplished in just one day, April 9, and the naval invasion of Norway began the same day. Britain lost the initiative because the ease with which Germany overwhelmed Denmark tended to exaggerate Germany's military capacity and this had repercussions on both sides of the battle line, in neutral countries as well as belligerents. Hitler's prestige and the morale of the German people rose again as they had after, firstly, the Austrian Anschluss and, secondly, the piecemeal incorporation of Czechoslovakia after Munich. The British public began to realize just how parlous their defences were. Broken international relationships could no longer be mended by a bit of tinkering at the edges or political manipulation. The neutral countries of Europe became even more amenable to the idea of negotiated agreements with Germany in preference to a brutal mauling; and across the Atlantic Roosevelt faced an even stronger anti-credit isolationist lobby as he frantically searched for ways to help Britain.

The fall of Denmark also served to convince many people in the US that increased support for Britain amounted to throwing good money after bad, and, with the British government reluctant to run down its dollar and gold reserves, Roosevelt personally raised the suggestion that British holdings in Latin America, including the Argentine railways, should be sold to American interests to raise funds for arms. Then, later in April, a senior administration official, Breckinridge Long, concluded that credit would have to be extended to Britain by the next session of Congress, if not sooner, and in the American White Paper (which was thought to reflect administration thinking) the authors Alsop and Kintner wrote that Britain would have no dollars or convertible assets left within two and a half years. At that time, they said, the United States "would have to choose between credit, gifts of supplies, or a German victory."⁸⁵

However it was not only European and American governments which took an interest in the ease with which Germany had overwhelmed Denmark and moved against Norway. In Japan it was assumed that Holland would be the next country to fall to Germany and this raised questions about the status and the future of the Dutch East Indies. It also accentuated the competition between the United States and Japan for economic and political dominance in the region. Thus, on April 17, the US administration declared that any change in the status of the Dutch colonies would endanger stability in the Pacific region.⁸⁶

By this time Whitehall had ditched the proposal for an Anglo-Japanese anti-Soviet alliance as unworkable; the start of the Norwegian campaign led to a shortage of heavy bombers in the Middle East and forced the postponement of the Anglo-French attack on Baku – meaning a decision for war against Russia was deferred; on April 24 the War Office rejected a plan for a lower level of Anglo-Japanese technical and intelligence cooperation; the option of using joint action against Russia as a means to overcome Anglo-Japanese antagonism was thus blocked, and Britain stumbled on with the existing trade curbs which Japan bitterly resented. That situation threatened the strategic balance in the Western Pacific and in the East Asia/South East Asia regions, and alarm bells began to ring in Washington where the administration was eager that nothing should weaken the capacity of the United States to move into those regions before the Japanese in the event of the continued weakening of the British presence. The decision was taken to strengthen the mid-Pacific US naval presence at the expense of the principal fleet, CINCUS, which was divided between bases on the US West and East Coasts, but, because that decision was contrary to the advice of the Commander-in-Chief US Fleet, Admiral Richardson, it had to be put into effect surreptitiously. The major part of the West Coast Fleet was then on exercises in mid-Pacific with the small Hawaiian Detachment and its return to the West Coast was deferred temporarily. Secretary of State Welles simply told Richardson he expected a "diplomatic disaster" if the fleet returned to the US East Coast.⁸⁷

Three weeks after the Nazi occupation of Denmark the battle of Norway was virtually over. King Haakon VII and his cabinet were evacuated on April 29, and the leader of the Norwegian Fascist Party, Vidkun Quisling, assumed control of a puppet government. In the public mind, the intensity of the action in Scandinavia overshadowed other events for a time but during those critical few months the British Expeditionary Force (BEF) in France had been progressively strengthened to ten divisions. Russia and Germany had signed a trade pact and, as a consequence of that, Germany also secured a commercial treaty with Iran under which oil was to be supplied via Russia to circumvent the partial British blockade of German ports.

About that time German plans to establish a major reservation to house tens of thousands of Jews in pathetic labour camp conditions in the Lublin district were officially shelved and a hunt began for an alternative plan to export them. In Poland the two million Jews in the German occupied zone were required to wear a yellow Star of David as a badge of shame and a special level of food rations was introduced for them. In a classic grading of human worth they were to get about one half of the allocation for a Polish Christian or one quarter of that for a Teuton. In introducing such a grading system Hitler and his Nazi colleagues were doing no more than aping the great Christian colonial powers yet again. They had organized the peoples of their colonies according to such grading systems many times before. Why should Germany under Hitler do any different? Hand in hand with these measures there was, of course, bestiality, brutality and local outbreaks of butchery on a frightening scale.⁸⁸ Still no different. It was simply a repeat of the well-tried systems of the Inquisition, the Flagellants, the Crusades and the pogroms of more recent generations. Hitler was confident that no one would object. The West didn't remember much about the Armenian Massacres, but he remembered the failure of Evian, the voyage of the St. Louis, and Britain's continuing efforts to keep Europe's Jews out of Palestine. He had no reason to fear that they would generate any more support now.

A CHANGE OF LEADERSHIP

By the beginning of May the debacle in Norway, with Hitler expelling the last of the British forces, and having 136 divisions of German troops massed along the frontiers with Holland, Belgium and France, led to demands for a full debate on the conduct of the war in the House of Commons. The debate was set for May 7 at a time when the government was very conscious of the Vatican's role in the war and may have begun to regret that it had rebuffed the pope's advice about a coup conspiracy. Four days before the debate, on May 3, Pius XII learned from Müller that Germany was about to invade Holland and Belgium. He immediately advised London through Osborne, Paris through the French ambassador, and the papal nuncios in The Hague and Brussels by cipher. Those messages were intercepted by Italian intelligence so that when Pius XII also told Prince Umberto of Hitler's plans on May 6 the government already knew, and because the Vatican had been the source of the critical leak its credibility with Mussolini was in tatters. Some observers say that action left Mussolini no option but to enter the war in alliance with Hitler.⁸⁹ Should it, perhaps, have restored the British government's confidence in its dealings with the Vatican to some extent? It certainly added to the confusion over the role and the intentions of the Vatican, especially as the debate coincided with another significant development: the signing of a new concordat, linked with a new missionary accord, between the Vatican and Portugal. These superseded the conventions which had been signed in 1928 and ensured that Portugal, Spain, Italy, Germany and the remnant of Poland were all on the same politico-religious wavelength with the Vatican eager to strengthen the ties that bind. France was the missing link which would provide a continuous chain of like-minded governments straight through the heart of Europe.

The start of the Commons debate on May 7 coincided with a meeting at which the Undersecretary for Foreign Affairs formally advised the Japanese Ambassador that Britain was ready to begin contraband control negotiations to block the Pacific trade approach to Russia and Germany. Then in Washington that afternoon Richardson was ordered to issue a press release stating that he had asked that the US fleet remain in Hawaii. The fact was that he had objected to holding it there for five reasons: lack of fundamental training facilities, large-scale ammunition and fuel supplies, and support craft such as tugs and repair ships; problems of morale when men were to be kept away from their families; and lack of overhaul facilities including dry docks and machine shops. In short, Pearl Harbour was designed only for a detachment and not a major fleet.⁹⁰ However those matters were hardly noticed as the debate soon developed into a bitter censure motion for which the vote was to be taken next day, May 8. The government survived, but with so many defections and abstentions that its defeat was only a matter of time.

For three days the wheels of British Government ground exceedingly slow while Chamberlain waited for the German invasion of the low countries and consulted his colleagues on whether to remain in office. At the same time Hitler consulted his High Command on when to strike. He had already postponed the invasion on successive days from May 5 to 8 and he finally set an absolute deadline, irrespective of the weather, for May 10. The same day had also been set for the first stage of the Anglo-Japanese trade talks at which Britain was to provide an aide-memoire as the basis of contraband control discussions set for May 14. It proved a momentous day indeed. The world woke to the news that Hitler had invaded the low countries at dawn. By the end of the day Britons had a new Prime Minister, while Hitler had an opponent whose sense of destiny was no less strong than his own. Winston Churchill, the overwhelming choice of the British people but certainly not the first choice of either his predecessor or his king, was commissioned to form a government at six o'clock that evening. Immediate pressure had been applied to persuade Pius XII to issue a condemnation of "this violent breach of international law" and to use his influence to prevent Italy from entering the war, and Tardini drafted a papal note. But the pope refused to sign it on the grounds that it might aggravate the Germans. Instead he sent cables of sympathy and affection to the sovereigns of Holland, Belgium and Luxemburg which satisfied no one, drew criticism from London and Paris and incurred the wrath of Berlin and Rome to the extent that a mob of Fascist youth attacked his car screaming "Death to the Pope." He thereupon closed the summer palace at Castel Gandolfo and did not venture onto the streets again until the overthrow of Mussolini. He was also severely criticized in some quarters for action inconsistent with the prayers of the church in Germany.⁹¹

Churchill was under no illusions about the gravity of his responsibility. Immediately before going to the palace he had talked with ministers of the Dutch Government who had flown from Amsterdam that afternoon, shocked that their country's neutrality had been brushed aside, to appeal for British assistance. After making key appointments to his government that night he went to bed at 3 AM next morning conscious of a profound sense of relief. "At last I had the authority to give directions over the whole scene," he wrote later. "I felt as if I was walking with destiny, and that all my past life had been but a preparation for this hour and for this trial. Ten years in the political wilderness had freed me from ordinary party antagonisms. My warnings over the last six years had been so numerous, so detailed, and were now so terribly vindicated, that no one could gainsay me. I could not be reproached either for making the war or with want of preparation for it."^{92 93 94}

As Prime Minister, Churchill wasted no time in consolidating and exercising his new authority. He did not appoint a separate Defence Minister. He held the post himself. He excluded the three service ministers, the First Lord of the Admiralty and the Secretaries of State for War and Air, from the War Cabinet. He took personal responsibility for "supervision and direction of the Chiefs of Staff Committee", and he formed a War Cabinet of himself plus the Labour Leader, Clement Attlee, and the leaders of the former government, Chamberlain and Halifax, whose authority was greatly weakened and very much a matter of his inclination, and a Minister without Portfolio, Arthur Greenwood. The War Cabinet was to make "the major decisions", except that "in larger questions or if there were any differences of view" Churchill called a meeting of his War Cabinet Defence Committee in which the three service ministers replaced Halifax and Greenwood, and the Chiefs of Staff attended.⁹⁵

By these measures, and by calling Cabinet Defence Committee meetings less and less frequently, Churchill assumed personal authority only marginally less than his arch enemy, Hitler. The Commons could call him to task – if it dared – and he had no statutory power to over-rule the Chiefs of Staff Committee on matters of strategic advice,⁹⁶ except that he was, (wearing his defence hat), also supervising and directing them. Armed with that level of authority, on his first day as Prime Minister, May 11, he ordered the occupation of the Danish dependency of Iceland to prevent the Germans from taking advantage of the strategically important base. For that decision he did not even call a War Cabinet meeting. In fact he sent a message to Chamberlain that: “I do not think there is any necessity for a Cabinet today ...I should be very glad however if you and Edward [Halifax] would come to the Admiralty War Room at 12.30 p.m., so that we could look at the maps and talk things over.” He added a series of ‘things’ relating to the battles raging in Europe, but he made no mention of Iceland. Apparently he did not consider the occupation of another country to be ‘a major decision’ and certainly not ‘a larger question or subject to any differences of view.’

A MATTER OF PRIVILEGE

Winston Churchill enjoyed all the privileges of the British aristocracy, being the elder son of Lord Randolph and an eighth generation descendant of the first Duke of Marlborough who received both his title and the gift of Blenheim Palace, where Winston was born, in recognition of his military services for Britain. Born on November 30, 1874, he was Hitler’s elder by 15 years. He was educated at Harrow, one of England’s best known public schools, where his rather precocious and arrogant responses to both students and masters demonstrated his belief that he was born to rule and did not win him many school friends. Although he had a remarkable memory, a clear mind and a gift for the use of language he was not regarded as a brilliant student. From Harrow he “scraped into” the Royal Military College, Sandhurst, at the third attempt as a cavalry cadet and was commissioned at the age of 21.⁹⁷ He first observed active operations in Cuba in 1895 while on leave from his regiment when the Spanish army sought to put down guerrillas. Then followed seven months of rather undistinguished service in punitive actions on the North West Frontier in India during the anti- British uprisings of 1897 and, after some string-pulling to gain a posting against the wishes of the commander, a time in the Sudan.

Churchill resigned his commission to enter politics and succeeded at the second attempt – via the adventurous life of a war correspondent for the London Morning Post. He sailed for South Africa with the forces which were to break Pretoria’s ultimatum to the British Government. Contrary to War Office directions that serving officers were not to act as war correspondents, he rejoined the army as an unpaid officer, continued to write, risked a court martial by cycling in plain clothes behind the Boer lines in Johannesburg, was taken prisoner by the Boers and escaped! On returning to England in 1900 he stood again as a Conservative candidate and was elected to the House of Commons but changed his allegiance to the Liberal Party in 1904 because of disagreement with government tariff and immigration policy.

Churchill's first parliamentary office was Under-Secretary of State for the Colonies to which he was appointed in 1905 at the age of 31. Then from 1908 he served in succession as President of the Board of Trade, Home Secretary and First Lord of the Admiralty. During his term at the Admiralty, which was controversial from the start, he directed that the navy convert to oil power and thus made the Middle East even more critical than it had been in Britain's affairs but it was his sponsorship of the abortive Gallipoli campaign in a bid to end Germany's Berlin to Baghdad plans which led to him being dropped from cabinet when a wartime coalition was formed in 1915. In very controversial circumstances (again) he insisted on returning to active service with the army and fought in France until late 1916 when he resumed his parliamentary duties and was appointed Minister for Munitions in July 1917. Then, as Secretary of State for War from January 1919, he actively promoted Britain's anti-Bolshevik adventures in Russia, going to Paris in February that year to demand of a meeting of Foreign Ministers – on his own initiative – that all the Allies intervene immediately! In his next post, a second spell as Under-Secretary for the Colonies, he precipitated a crisis in Britain's relations with both Turkey and the dominions by very indiscreet handling of the Turkish-Greek conflict.⁹⁸ But he played a leading part in disentangling the web of intrigue and distrust which Britain's conflicting promises and treaties had left in the Middle East, although the arrangements which he put in place became ingredients for later stages of the trouble in the triangle, and he was also involved in the establishment of the Irish Free State.

After being defeated in the 1922 elections Churchill changed parties again, campaigning unsuccessfully as an independent anti-socialist or Constitutionalist in March 1924 before being invited to rejoin the Conservative Party for the elections in October. Much to the irritation of some senior ministers he was immediately appointed Chancellor of the Exchequer. He remained head of treasury until the Conservative government was defeated in 1929 but when the party returned to power in 1931 he had to carry much of the blame for Britain's plight because of his decision to reintroduce the 1914 gold standard and he was left on the backbench. He was not recalled to cabinet until Chamberlain very reluctantly offered him the Admiralty again on the outbreak of war.

It was during his years in the wilderness that Churchill's personal friendship with a number of Jewish colleagues and financiers developed into an intimate working relationship through The Focus or the Anti-Nazi Council.⁹⁹ It was also during that period that his personal friendship with a number of prominent Jewish families and his commitment to Zionism, which his conduct from the beginning of his political career through World War I and the 1920s had shown was already strong and consistent, became even deeper. In 1904, aged 29 a very young MP, he attacked the Aliens Bill, warning of its danger in the hands of an intolerant or anti-Semitic Home Secretary and saying that it would appeal to "insular prejudice against foreigners, to racial prejudice against Jews, and to labour prejudice against competition."¹⁰⁰ Two years later, while on holiday in the Moravian province of Austria-Hungary (later Czechoslovakia) all three of his hosts were prominent Jewish families, Cassel, Rothschild and de Forest, which, according to Gilbert, revived a jibe which had been made against his father that 'he only had Jewish friends.'¹⁰¹ Then in an article in the Illustrated Sunday Herald early in 1920 Churchill described Zionism as "an inspiring movement." However when he set down his personal view of the Balfour Declaration which shows quite clearly that he did not understand the relationship between the three Messianic faiths any better than Balfour or other members of the British Government. He wrote: "If, as may well happen there should be created in our own lifetime, by the banks of the Jordan, a Jewish State under the protection of the British Crown, which might comprise three or four millions of Jews, an event will have occurred in the history of the world which would from every point of view be beneficial; and would be especially in harmony with the truest interests of the British Empire."

Within a year, in his role as Colonial secretary, he had taken steps to set up the Kingdoms of Transjordan and Iraq, to buy the support of Transjordan with grants "to guarantee that there would be no anti-Zionist disturbances, and to ride slipshod over the opposition of the Arabs in Palestine in his bid to establish a National Home for Jews in the area. He refused the various requests of an Arab delegation, including that an elected Palestinian Government be set up, and expounded the standard Zionist claim to Palestine on the basis that the Jews had been intimately and profoundly associated with it for more than three thousand years. He then met a Jewish deputation and wished it success in overcoming the serious difficulties in its path. He told them that: "If I did not believe that you were animated by the very highest spirit of justice and idealism, and that your work would in fact confer blessings on the whole country, I should not have the high hopes I have that eventually your work will be accomplished."¹⁰²

Churchill was introduced to the British counterpart of the Anti-Nazi Council (ANC) at a luncheon in his honour in London on May 19, 1936, a few weeks after Rex Leeper called on him at Chartwell on Vansittart's initiative. (chapter 25) The ANC had evolved in New York from the work of a number of Jewish civic and business leaders as a response to Hitler's anti-Semitic policies during 1933 and 1934. By 1936 the group in London had informally adopted the name 'The Focus' and Churchill had become its key 'asset' around whom many of its activities revolved. Although it has only become generally known in recent years, his relationship with The Focus was clearly an important factor in the development of Churchill's policies and decisions during the years remaining before the war and on his direction of the war.

Another consistent theme ran through Churchill's speeches, writing and decisions during his terms of office in both trade and colonial affairs. It was his unrelenting belief in Britain's rights as an imperial power. While he conceded that some improvements should be made in the lot of the masses, he insisted that the government should not throw away the nation's conquests and inheritance with both hands by granting self government or independence, and that it had every right to control the administration and resources of the colonies and to operate an imperial trade preference system. This attitude to the colonies carried through his views on race relations as well, and was not consistent with his attitude towards Jews and Zionism. He was opposed to Indian sailors joining the British navy and argued that “theoretical” racial equality would cause great inconvenience in practice.¹⁰⁴ His attitude to the colonies and colored communities is very well illustrated by his infamous remarks during the Round Table Conference on the future of India in London in 1931. The first session had taken place with representatives of all of the major religious and ethnic groups except the Indian National Congress which had boycotted it because of the imprisonment of its leaders. In adjourning the first session Prime Minister MacDonald ordered the release of political prisoners in India and instructed the Viceroy to enter into new conversations with Mahatma Gandhi. Churchill, on the Opposition benches, said he was “nauseated to see Mr. Gandhi, an Inner Temple lawyer, now become a seditious fakir of a type well known in the East, striding half-naked up the steps of the viceregal palace while he was still organizing and conducting a defiant campaign of civil disobedience, to parley on equal terms with the representatives of the King-Emperor.”

However, perhaps the clearest illustration of his cynical manipulation of religious communities and their beliefs comes from the cabinet records of February 1940, well into the war and only weeks before he became Prime Minister, when he opposed any attempt at religious reconciliation in India. He told cabinet that he “regarded the Hindu-Muslim feud as the bulwark of British rule in India.” By refusing to consider constitutional change in India on the basis that it must be “to the detriment of matters touching the final life and safety of the State” if such an immense issue as India were put to cabinet at that time, he killed any prospect for reconciliation and guaranteed that the eventual settlement would be shaped by great violence.

Churchill’s personal philosophy was neither Christian nor mainstream monotheist. He held that there was a place for institutional religion as the basis for community ethics [or for subjugation and violence] but, as C.E.M. Joad puts it, he treated religion “not as a channel of man’s communication with another order of reality, but as a form of institution within a society designed to justify the society’s proceedings to its members.”¹⁰⁵ This may be interpreted as a rejection of theism, but that interpretation would not be consistent with his profound sense of personal destiny. His acceptance of the concept of predestination clearly implies his recognition of a power bringing influence to bear on ‘destiny’ and in speeches and letters he invoked the name of God on numerous occasions. He was an enigma. A manipulative enigma. While he rejected the church’s self-understanding as a representative of God or an intermediary between humanity and God, he played on the possible fate of the church to very good effect and as if he was a deeply committed believer. And his experience of inter-faith manipulation and the conduct of the Vatican during World War I show through a somewhat cynical statement in his essay ‘Shall we commit suicide?’ that “Religion, having discreetly avoided conflict on the fundamental issues, offered its encouragement and consolations through all its forms impartially to all its combatants.”

When the task of drafting the terms of the British mandate in Palestine fell to Churchill his fundamental philosophy, his attitude to the church, his very wide travels and experience, and his knowledge of history – generally from a European perspective – interacted so that he readily embraced the thrust of the Balfour Declaration and contemporary Zionism. However, as in his dealings with India, his tolerance and understanding deserted him badly in his dealings with the Arab communities during the critical 1930's. Testifying before the Peel Commission in 1937 he called for all of Palestine to be turned over to the Jews, denied that this would involve injustice to the Arabs and said the injustice was committed by those who "live in the country (and) leave it to be desert for thousands of years." Commenting on Moorish achievements in Spain he said he was glad they were thrown out. All Arabs were "wastrels and inferior" and he looked forward to the day when Britain had no further duties to the Arab minority in Palestine. All that from the architect of the modern kingdoms of the Arabian Peninsula! However after some reflection he regretted his words and asked that the Commissioners strike them from the official record.¹⁰⁶

Immovable support for the person of the monarch went hand in hand with Churchill's fundamental imperialism and the abdication crisis of 1936 added greatly to his woes. The evidence of King Edward VIII's sympathy for Germany, including MI5 telephone taps of his conversations with the German Embassy,¹⁰⁷ which the government did not wish to discuss publicly made it imperative, in its view, that he should be forced to abdicate and the issue of his planned marriage to a divorcee made the resolution of the matter very simple. However Churchill didn't see it that way. He was certainly against divorce, saying simply that it shouldn't be allowed. This illustrated the contradiction in his attitude to religious matters. He could recognize the role of the church as the instrument for the determination of community conduct and morals while rejecting its theology. But his personal friendship with Edward and his insistence that the person of the monarch was paramount took precedence over the issue of divorce and the moral authority of the church. He urged the king to fight the government's decision to force him out. He fought it personally with great emotion in the House of Commons and he helped the deposed king draft his abdication speech.¹⁰⁸ In doing so he temporarily lost the support of both the general public (which was not aware of the politics behind the government's action and its manipulation of the church and which therefore saw it as a simple issue of morality) and the majority of MPs. The impact was such that Churchill and his advisers thought it unlikely that he would ever be offered another post.

Also at a personal level, Churchill played the American stock exchange, relying largely on the advice of his well-placed friends which did not save him from major losses either in the stock market crash of 1929 or in 1938. He saw nothing wrong in accepting substantial fees for handling an oil company's dealings with the government and he also accepted substantial benefits from other corporations as well as from The Focus for making sponsored lecture tours in the United States.¹⁰⁹ But perhaps the most questionable financial arrangement he entered into was that with Sir Henry Strakosch in March 1938 under which Sir Henry covered his massive stock crash debt and enabled him to avoid the sale of Chartwell and to stay in politics at the peak of the appeasement crisis, immediately after Hitler walked into Czechoslovakia and imprisoned both Chancellor Schuschnigg and Baron Louis de Rothschild. (chapter 21) In this respect he appears to have placed himself in an even more questionable position than Sir Samuel Hoare when he accepted the financial support from Lord Beaverbrook which enabled him to stay in parliament and support Chamberlain in his appeasement policy. However it appears that neither legal nor political action was initiated against either of them, although a generation later any of those conflicts of interest would have been sufficient to justify legal action or for a minister to be stripped of his portfolio.

Thus Churchill sat on the back benches, biding his time while Britain and Europe floundered around, dragging the whole world towards it war. And when Britain finally called for a new leader to guide it through the enormous challenge which lay ahead he was ready to respond. He was of aristocratic heritage but he had not assumed his high office as a right of birth. He had faced the people and been elected. He was experienced in both domestic and colonial affairs, in economic management and in military affairs. He had made mistakes, accepted the consequences and, with the aid of a few powerful friends, regained the confidence of the nation at large. He was a dedicated royalist and a committed imperialist but he had the common touch. He was a professional soldier whose bravery was beyond question. He certainly had his share of blemishes but he also had enormous strength of personal character and he was not a lackey of the church. He was the communicator par excellence. In other words he was the archetype of British leaders and he had come along at the right time to lead Britain and its empire in their time of crisis. He understood the pride, the aspirations – and the fears – of the British people very well indeed.

Churchill captured and harnessed the mood of the nation exceptionally well when he asked the House of Commons for a vote of confidence on Monday, May 13, 1940. And he didn't gild the lily. He was extremely frank in telling parliament and the people what his aim was: to maintain the empire. He played up the personal danger and invoked the name of God for a war against "a monstrous tyranny, never surpassed in the dark, lamentable catalogue of human crime." That was actually quite an exaggeration because up to that time, before the 'final solution' decrees were put into effect – Hitler's crimes had certainly been no worse than the 'purifying' efforts of the Holy Roman Empire carried out in the name of its Messiah-God, or even the excesses of Tsarist Russia. Then he turned directly to the aim of the war.

You ask, What is our aim? I can answer in one word: Victory – victory at all costs, victory in spite of all terror; victory however hard and long the road may be; for without victory there is no survival. Let that be realized: no survival for the British Empire; no survival for all that the British Empire has stood for, no survival for the urge and impulse of the ages, that mankind will move forward towards its goal.¹¹⁰

They were powerfully emotive words. In fact much of mankind was perfectly happy to "move forward towards its goal" without Britain riding on its shoulders. But with a unanimous vote of confidence from the House of Commons and being supremely confident of his ability to do so, Churchill was ready, willing and able to lead Magog in its battle against Gog. Or was it the other way around? It did not really matter. However it did matter that central to the conduct of that war was the fact that 'the Jewish Question' was a determining factor in the understanding and policies of the paramount leader of each of the two opposing camps. Both were Christian in their upbringing and religious affiliations. But one was a rabid anti-Semite and the other was a firmly committed Zionist. The paramount leaders of the two great powers which were scouting around the fringes but had not yet fallen into either camp, the United States and the Soviet Union, were both opposed to the aims of the Zionists but they were not anti-Jewish. They each had their own agenda for the 'Jewish Question.' One was an avowed atheist who had made provision for an autonomous Jewish region. The other maintained his Christian links but insisted on freedom of religion and, in due course, proclaimed it to be one of four fundamental human freedoms. And like the leaders of the two 'camps' they both took full advantage of the church when it suited their political purposes.

Then there was the leader of the third power which, while not directly involved in the conflict in Europe, was intimately interested in its outcome and was being jockeyed into position by its military leaders to take advantage of the conflict to begin the process of decolonization in Asia: His Imperial Majesty the Emperor Hirohito. Widely travelled, a marine biologist by profession, Emperor Hirohito was regarded by the devout followers of Shinto Buddhism as Heaven-descended, divine and sacred, and pre-eminent above all his subjects in accordance with the teachings which had been developed upon the establishment of the Meiji Constitution about 70 years before in the wake of the humiliation of Japan by the Western powers. He held supreme authority under that constitution but in practice his authority was approximately the same as that of the constitutional British monarch and the exercise of real power was a matter of contest between the prime minister of the day, Admiral Mitsumasa Yonai, and Japan's military leaders. While Churchill sought to consolidate his power in Britain, Japan's military leaders were gradually wresting power from Prime Minister Yonai and concealing the fact behind a cloak of Imperial authority.

CHURCHILL'S APPEAL FOR HELP

The Allies had misjudged Germany's strategic plan for the invasion of Western Europe and Britain and the German forces broke through or moved around the allied lines with amazing speed. Between Chamberlain's decision to resign on the morning of Friday, May 10, after German forces launched their simultaneous dawn invasions of France and the two neutral states, Holland and Belgium, and Churchill's vote of confidence speech on the morning of Monday, May 13, much of Holland and Belgium had been overrun, Queen Wilhemina of the Netherlands had personally phoned King George VI to appeal for British air support and had then been evacuated by British destroyer to England. The world assumed that the surrender of Holland was imminent, that Dutch control of its colonies would be virtually void, and that the future of the wealth-producing Dutch East Indies would be a matter of negotiation – or dispute.

The atmosphere was therefore rather sensitive when British and Japanese negotiators met in London next day, May 14, to discuss Britain's proposal for an economic agreement with Japan and the aide memoire which was to provide the basis of a "contraband" embargo against Russia. The Japanese provided a list of raw materials which they wished to continue importing from the British Empire and the friendly atmosphere encouraged the British to think that Anglo-Japanese relations may be turning for the better. However next day, May 15, when Holland was totally overrun, there was a surge of belief in Japan that alignment with Germany was the way forward, that the government should seek to take advantage of the power vacuum which was developing in South East Asia, and that the terms for Japan's cooperation in any contraband embargo against Russia should be much more favourable. That belief was strengthened by Mussolini's declaration, not linked to a date, that he intended to take up arms on the side of Hitler and which triggered a great burst of activity – and apprehension. Diplomats accredited to the Vatican by countries “unfriendly to Italy” began to move inside the city-state boundaries; the Vatican made arrangements to transfer gold bars worth $US7,665,000 to the United States so that it would have cash available in case Italy blockaded it; and L'Osservatore Romano agreed to publish only official war communiqués without comment to avoid a ban on sales outside the Vatican.¹¹¹

That afternoon, prior to Holland's formal surrender that evening but anticipating the early occupation of all of western Europe, Churchill wrote to Roosevelt. He told the president that Britain expected to be attacked “in the near future” because “the small countries are simply smashed up, one by one, like matchwood” and that “if necessary, we shall continue the war alone” It had thus come to Churchill's turn to appeal directly to a foreign power for military intervention and, in that letter, the first written to Roosevelt in his capacity as prime minister, he asked for immediate assistance on a grand scale. He sought: the loan of “forty of fifty of your old destroyers”; several hundred of the latest types of aircraft; anti-aircraft equipment and ammunition; approval to purchase steel and other materials in the United States; the visit of a United States naval squadron to Irish ports [to prevent Hitler from establishing a base in collaboration with Irish dissidents]; and assistance “to keep the Japanese quiet in the Pacific, using Singapore in any way convenient.”¹¹² The Americans, including Secretary of State Cordell Hull, still believed that Britain's imperial reserves were not at serious risk and it could pay cash for everything, and the British believed that America was using the wartime situation to challenge their overseas trading position, so it had become necessary for increasingly frank discussions between senior officials in both governments for several months. But the point had now been reached that there was no purpose to be served by trying to camouflage Britain's inability to finance a major war. Churchill therefore threw in one very telling sentence. “We shall go on paying dollars for as long as we can, but I should like to feel reasonably sure that when we can pay no more, you will give us the stuff all the same,” he wrote.¹¹³ That was hardly a request that would encourage Roosevelt to believe that Britain had a lasting grip on the Far East and he immediately ordered that the fleet remain in Hawaiian waters.¹¹⁴

Next day, May 16, Churchill wrote to Mussolini in an effort to persuade him not to act on his Pact of Steel with Hitler, to remain neutral, and to consider the likely intervention of the United States. He tried to gloss over and distance himself from the British government's very recent efforts to restrict Italy's influence in the Mediterranean, with which the British Chiefs of Staff were vitally concerned, and its grab for colonies within reach of home in the North African region. Notwithstanding his own attitude to the church's theology, and like many national leaders before him, he also sought to take advantage of the European 'Christian club' concept, or the political implications of the Vatican's world wide reach. He would have known that this could be a dangerous ploy because Mussolini had been a vigorous opponent of the church's theology and the Vatican's power – until it suited him to take advantage of it in his negotiations for its political support through the Lateran Treaty and Roman Concordat. Churchill wrote, in part:

*Is it too late to stop a river of blood from flowing between the British and the Italian peoples? We can no doubt inflict grievous injuries upon one another and maul each other cruelly, and darken the Mediterranean with our strife. If you so decree, it must be so; but I declare that I have never been the enemy of Italian greatness, nor ever at heart the foe of the Italian lawgiver. [and] ... I believe with some assurance that we shall be aided in increasing measure by the United States, and indeed by all the Americas. ... Down the ages and above all other calls comes the cry that the joint heirs of Latin and Christian civilization must not be ranged against one another in mortal strife.*¹¹⁵

Unknown to Churchill, in view of the impending defeat of France Mussolini had already decided three days earlier to declare war on both France and Britain within a month and in his reply to the British PM on May 18, Mussolini was somewhat more frank than Churchill. He told him: "... you are certainly aware of grave reasons of an historical and contingent character which have ranged our two countries in opposite camps" and reminded him of the sanctions organized by Britain against Italy in 1935 when it was "engaged in securing for herself a small space in the African sun without causing the slightest injury to your interests and territories or those of others."

Given that their personal resistance to the theology and authority of the church ran in parallel, the similarity between Mussolini's and Churchill's adherence to the European 'Christian club' concept and the belief in Christian Europe's right to possess and exploit the rest of the world which that note indicates is quite remarkable. It illustrates again how deeply ingrained the self-understanding of the church had become throughout the communities which it dominated, in spite of people's doubts about its theology. The amorphous gel of Western Christianity could not be easily unscrambled into its components, especially after the "new relationship" between the Vatican and the United States which had been sealed with the arrival of the President's personal representative only a few months earlier and which antagonized the Duce greatly. Mussolini went on to remind Churchill of the "real and actual state of servitude in which Italy finds herself in her own sea" and closed with the blunt warning that "If it was to honour your signature that your government declared war on Germany, you will understand that the same sense of honour and respect for engagements assumed in the Italian-German Treaty guides Italian policy today and tomorrow in the face of any event whatsoever."¹¹⁶

Churchill also received Roosevelt's reply that day. The news was very mixed. He was personally very supportive of Churchill and his policy. He would facilitate 'to the utmost' the requests for material purchases, but there could be no destroyers without Congress approval, and on the question of discouraging Japan he could only refer to the concentration of US naval force in Pearl Harbour.

A DIFFERENT KIND OF PAUSE

During the few days of hectic politicking following the capitulation of Holland, the German forces had pushed on relentlessly. The widespread expectation in the United States was that Germany would sweep through the balance of Western Europe very quickly and that Britain could not hold out for more than a few weeks. Roosevelt therefore sought an assurance from Britain, in discussion with Lord Lothian that in the event of a British defeat, or negotiated peace, the fleet would be kept out of Hitler's reach by sending it to the United States. At about the same time, on the afternoon of May 19, the possibility that it would be necessary to evacuate the entire BEF from France and Belgium was raised by Lord Gort with the War Office but the Chief of the Imperial General Staff, Field Marshall Lord Ironside, disagreed with his assessment and Gort was ordered to adhere to the existing plan to push south.

That evening, at the suggestion of Chamberlain,¹¹⁷ Churchill broadcast to the nation for the first time as prime minister. Drawing on all his powers of persuasion and rhetoric he distracted people from those aspects of Hitler's policies which many had accepted and even admired; swept away the atmosphere of depression which had engulfed the nation; lifted the national morale to new heights; and inspired people throughout the Commonwealth and the United States with a vision of the purpose of the war which no one had anticipated. After referring to the present time as one of the most awe-striking periods in their history and "beyond doubt the most sublime," he said the British and French, together, "have advanced to rescue not only Europe but mankind from the foulest and most soul destroying tyranny which has ever darkened and stained the pages of history." Gathered behind their armies and fleets were "a group of shattered states and bludgeoned races: the Czechs, the Poles, the Norwegians, the Danes, the Dutch, the Belgians – upon all of whom the long night of barbarism will descend, unbroken even by a star of hope, unless we conquer, as conquer we must; as conquer we shall."¹¹⁸

With this broadcast, coming only six days after his vote of confidence speech in the Commons in which he had set a similar tone, Churchill changed the international perception of Hitler substantially. The Fuhrer was no longer the most dynamic leader in Europe with the most effective economic and social policies, putting into effect what the church had failed to do, lifting his country out of humiliation and degradation by the bootstraps, and just somewhat over-ambitious in correcting the evils of the Treaty of Versailles. He was barbarism personified, he was the foulest tyrant in history and he would drag the whole world to the depths of degradation if he was not stopped. It did not seem to matter that Churchill's flamboyant, exaggerated description did not sit comfortably with history; that his representation of history was just as flawed as the popes'; and that the papacy, in consort with its Western Christian power brokers, had perpetrated dastardly abuses of humanity on a far greater scale than had Hitler, at that stage. His listeners did not know, nor could they know, that their own governments had deliberately concealed or suppressed details of many of the crimes against humanity which he had been responsible for. Nor could they understand that the policies and actions of their own governments – and the fact that they refused to change those policies and practices – had provided both the provocation and the pattern for those which he had implemented. All that mattered was that the new British Prime Minister had given them the justification for their war and it was their moral responsibility to put their backs into it for the benefit of humanity. Even those who were opposed to his policies were inspired. It was a part of the parody which had to be worked through that, very soon – because of the Western Christian World’s refusal to rethink its attitudes, policies and practices, and because they had agreed to put their backs into the war for the benefit of humanity – Hitler would conform to the description of him which Churchill had etched in their minds.

Churchill’s reference to ‘the Fleet’ in his broadcast was especially significant. He had received Lothian’s report prior to his broadcast in the evening and Roosevelt was clearly intended to get a message as well as the British public. Then, in a note transmitted on May 20 which the War Cabinet “pondered over” but did not amend, Churchill declined to give the assurance Roosevelt had sought. He said that his government intended “to fight on to the end in this island ... (and) ... in no conceivable circumstances will we consent to surrender.” But he went on to say, very bluntly, that if his government fell in the process “and others came in to parley amid the ruins, you must not be blind to the fact that the sole remaining bargaining counter with Germany would be the Fleet, and *if this country was left by the United States to its fate no one would have the right to blame those then responsible if they made the best terms they could for the surviving inhabitants. ... Evidently I could not answer for my successors, who in utter despair and helplessness might well have to accommodate themselves to the German will.” He closed a very sobering note saying: “However, there is happily no need at present to dwell upon such ideas.”¹¹⁹ [*Emphasis added.]

The broadcast also had another effect in America. It enabled elements in the administration who were favourably disposed to Britain to capitalize on American fear and self-interest in order to marshal public opinion by promoting a Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies.¹²⁰ However, Churchill’s rhetoric didn’t slow the German armies, and with the situation continuing to deteriorate and the prospect of a massive military defeat, the matter of evacuation was discussed by the British War Cabinet for the first time on May 20, and precautionary planning was authorized.¹²¹ Then, on May 21 the German spearhead reached the estuary of the River Somme on the English Channel about 100 kilometres south of the Franco-Belgian border, and the French, Belgium and British forces were split in two. Hitler celebrated the rapid German advance with his generals at the estuary of the Somme that day with the announcement that “the British can have their peace as soon as they return our colonies to us,” and at the same time he approved a temporary pause in the south while the German forces there regrouped.¹²² About 400,000 Allied troops were caught in a wedge straddling northern France, coastal Belgium and a sliver of southern Holland, about 50 kilometres wide and 200 kilometres long but the German command was not aware of the enormity of the prize within their grasp because their intelligence reports estimated the number of trapped Allied troops at about 100,000.¹²³ The strategy was that the German offensive in that theatre would be concentrated towards Paris while the armies to the north would crush the Allied forces along the coast. By then cabinet had accepted the assessment that the prospects for a breakout were bleak and the Allied situation was so very critical that at 10 o'clock on the evening of May 23 Churchill called on the king and advised him that if the French-authored plan for a break-out towards Paris did not succeed it would be necessary that the BEF be ordered back to England.¹²⁴ Then, quite unexpectedly, on May 24, when the Belgian front was near the point of collapse and ten French divisions and nine British divisions were caught between that failing front and German panzer divisions in the south – facing the prospect of being pummeled into total defeat – Hitler ordered a halt to the panzer push from the south.

The transmission of that order was intercepted by British intelligence, and commanders, doubting at first that it was genuine, could not believe their good fortune. Next day, May 25, Lord Gort, commanding the BEF, concluded that a break-out was not achievable and took the decision to withdraw from the existing French-authored plan to push south, against the panzers. He decided to plug the gaps in the northern perimeter and to secure an area at the coast to facilitate an attempt at mass evacuation. Preparation began immediately. At the same time the British and French governments jointly contacted Roosevelt with an appeal for him to intervene personally with Mussolini in a bid to avoid Italy joining Germany in the war at that critical stage. They asked the president to tell Mussolini that they both understood Italy to have territorial grievances against them in the Mediterranean; they were “disposed to consider at once any reasonable claims”; the Allies would admit Italy to the Peace Conference with status equal to that of any belligerent; and that Roosevelt had been invited to see that any agreement reached was carried out. Roosevelt transmitted their message immediately and was promptly “repulsed ... in the most abrupt manner.”

Next day, May 26, Gort's decision was confirmed by the War Office and the gathering of an armada began immediately with the aim of evacuating the trapped BEF, the French forces and some others through a beach head at Dunkirk. At the same time, at a meeting in London, French Premier Reynaud suggested that concessions on Gibraltar and Suez be offered by Britain to Italy immediately, saying France was prepared to make “similar concessions about Tunis.” The pace of the game ‘beggar my neighbour’, otherwise called ‘give away other people and their resources,’ had not slackened. Neither had the rules changed. It was simply France's move. It was now suggesting that Britain should be the one whose territory was given away preferentially. Churchill flatly rejected the move. Gibraltar and Suez were both of absolute strategic importance to Britain's ability to hold its empire together and they were not negotiable. But he was still not prepared to admit their importance or the fragility of Britain's position. He said the government's inability to “show any favour to these ideas ... was not because it was wrong to examine them or because it did not seem worth while at (that) moment to pay a heavy price to keep Italy out of the war ... (and) ... one cannot easily make a bargain at the last gasp.”

Britain could not offer anything “which Mussolini could not take for himself or be given by Hitler if we were defeated.”¹²⁵

At that stage, “at the darkest moment before the Dunkirk Deliverance,” Churchill sought a report from the Chiefs of Staff on whether Britain could hold out against a German invasion in the event of a French withdrawal to neutrality and Belgian capitulation “after assisting the BEF to reach the coast.” The final paragraph of the COS report stated: “... our conclusion is that prima facie Germany has most of the cards; but the real test is whether the morale of our fighting personnel and civil population will counterbalance the numerical and material advantages which Germany enjoys. We believe it will.” Churchill used that report to obtain agreement for the course which he was determined on – the evacuation of the BEF and continuation of the war without negotiations – from the four members of his War Cabinet “and the few other ministers who saw it.” He did not convene a meeting of the full cabinet.¹²⁶ The evacuation was therefore pursued immediately.

When Hitler realized, on May 26, that a mass evacuation was being attempted and that Churchill was not about to seek an armistice he ordered that the panzer assault recommence, that the artillery barrage be intensified, and that every effort be concentrated on preventing the evacuation. However those days of quiet had been critical and the BEF was able to keep a sufficient gap open to enable the mass march of troops to the coast. Boarding began on May 27 using a total of 861 vessels of all types from cruisers to tugs and fishing vessels. From that day, the push towards Paris took second place. Action on the Somme River front was put on hold, and the ground advance towards Paris did not recommence until after the Dunkirk evacuation had been completed. The position of the encircled British and French forces became even more critical on the morning of the May 28 when the Belgian army surrendered, releasing more German forces to concentrate on the fleeing allies. But, with the Germans unable to halt the evacuation and with little purpose in further aerial bombardment of Dunkirk, Hitler’s attention returned to Paris. Air bombardment began on June 3 and Hitler gave the order to advance towards the French capital next day, June 4, the day on which the evacuation was completed.

Churchill addressed parliament that afternoon. He gloried in the success of the evacuation, relating the impact of the air force to a victory; he implied some form of divine intervention by using expressions such as “this deliverance”, but he did not gloat. “Wars are not won by evacuations” he said. He knew that there was still dissent among his ministers in spite of the fact that he had gained approval from his War Cabinet for his decisions, and he knew that the majority of the population would have welcomed a negotiated settlement. He therefore used the occasion to steel the national will. After outlining the evacuation operation, the role of the air force, Hitler’s reputed plan for the invasion of Britain, and the need for well organized home defence to relieve the ‘Expeditionary Force’ he turned to the broad international picture and appealed directly, but very subtly, to the people of the United States. A key passage read:

Even though large tracts of Europe and many old and famous States have fallen or may fall into the grip of the Gestapo and all the odious apparatus of Nazi rule, we shall not flag or fail. We shall go on to the end. We shall fight in France, we shall fight in the seas and oceans, *we shall fight with growing confidence and growing strength in the air; we shall defend our Island, whatever the cost may be. We shall fight on the beaches, we shall fight on the landing-grounds, we shall fight in the fields and in the streets, we shall fight in the hills; we shall never surrender; and even if, which I do not for a moment believe, this Island or a large part of it were subjugated and starving, then our Empire beyond the seas, armed and guarded by the British Fleet, would carry on the struggle, until, in God's good time, the New World, with all its power and might, steps forth to the rescue and the liberation of the Old.*¹²⁷

It was a masterly performance. A touch of history, an emotional tug for a bit of human rights sympathy, a play on the American religious self-understanding, and a play on fear of real isolation. It came just at the right time to influence public opinion in favor of continued support for Britain and to offset the stream of contrary advice which Roosevelt was receiving from key officials in the administration. The President had already used devious means, such as having the United States Steel Corporation buy 'surplus' equipment from the US Army which, Congress had said, could be sold only for the defence of the Western Hemisphere (or the continents of the Americas) and re-sell it to Britain at the same price.¹²⁸

Belgium formally capitulated next morning, June 5, as some 143 divisions of German ground forces pushed southward from the Somme along a front 140 miles wide, (225 kilometre), towards Paris. The push proceeded relentlessly and their armed superiority was such that it seemed to matter little that they faced 103 divisions of French and British troops.

Mussolini formally declared Italy to be at war in alliance with Germany on June 10, and in doing so he evoked an immediate response from Roosevelt. That evening, at a graduation function at the University of Virginia, the president publicly confronted the pro-German and pro-Italian groups who were backing the isolationists for the first time. He attacked Mussolini's decision and firmly committed the United States to a program of aid to the Allies. He said those who believed that the US could survive as "a lone island in a world dominated by the philosophy of force" were deluded. He condemned the 'jackal-like' attack on France by Mussolini saying: "the hand that held the dagger has stuck it into the back of his neighbour." He said, without naming 'the opponents': "We will extend to the opponents of force the material resources of this nation." This is taken as an oblique reference to an appeal which he had received from Australia's Prime Minister, Robert Menzies, that America's financial and material resources be made available to Britain and France, to which he had already relied favourably. He closed by saying that America's own defences would be prepared with full speed ahead.¹²⁹ In view of the ethnic composition of the American population Roosevelt's action had involved a definite political risk. This illustrates that he had reached the point at which he assessed the prospects for an Axis victory and the threats to the economic and political interests of the United States as justifying such a risk. However he was not prepared to move too far out in front of the pack. Next day he denied that his speech meant any change to the 'cash and carry' arms sales policy or the introduction of large scale credit.

Roosevelt's caution was justified by the stream of gratuitous advice which he and Churchill had received during the previous few days. The chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, Senator Key Pittman, publicly advised Churchill to abandon the British Isles because its forces “obviously were unable to defend them and American aid would be wasted.” Breckinridge Long said that Hitler would win within weeks and it would be “foolhardy to antagonize the Germans until the United States was in a position to resist their military power.” Admiral Stark and General Marshall, who had authorized a massive transfer of ‘redundant stock’ in line with Roosevelt’s policy on the day of Churchill’s broadcast, both advised the president that he should make “no further commitments for furnishing materials to the Allies” since their planners also believed Britain would be defeated within weeks.

Next day, June 11, Churchill flew to France to talk with the French government which had left Paris to set up headquarters at Tours, while Italy’s first battle strike extended the war into Africa. From bases in Libya and Eritrea Italian bombing raids were carried out on Suez (Egypt) and Port Sudan. In a bid to show its own public and the world that it was not down and out and that it was a power to be reckoned with, the British government retaliated the same day with pre-planned bombing raids from Kenya against a base in Eritrea and from England, across France, to Genoa and Turin. The prompt retaliation may have boosted morale in the West to some extent but it had little impact in Tokyo. Craigie was summoned to the Foreign Ministry immediately to be told that in view of Italy’s entry into the war, Britain should withdraw its remaining gun boats and troops from China in order to avoid any clash with the Italian garrison in Shanghai. Whitehall treated the matter with disdain.¹³⁰

On June 12 the French suffered heavy losses and advised the German command that in order to avoid the destruction of Paris its army would vacate the city and permit the German army unimpeded entry. Such news reaching Tokyo strengthened the determination of the Japanese government to extract more trade and territorial concessions from both France and Britain if it was to cooperate in the embargo against Russia. Having already forced France to block supplies of military goods to China through French Indo-China, Japan now concluded a treaty with Thailand, only two days after Italy entered the war, and it was in a position to insist on access to Vichy-French controlled facilities in Northern Indo-China. Similarly, the Craigie-Arita Agreement, under which Britain had acknowledged Japan’s position in China the year before, had done little except indicate Britain’s military impotence in the East. It did not offset the damage done by its note of January 1939 linking it to US opposition to any Japanese expansion. Japan had continued to campaign under the slogan that “unless Japan peels off the thick skin of the British for all Orientals to see, eternal peace will not dawn in Eastern Asia.”¹³¹ One of its peeling mechanisms had been to restrict the divisive activities of the churches and their missions through requiring the amalgamation of all of the Protestant bodies, and those churches which refused to merge, including the Anglican Church, were dissolved.

Although the British negotiators were hamstrung by the American insistence that ferro-alloys were not to be supplied to Japan, and in spite of the demand to remove Britain’s forces only two days earlier, Undersecretary Butler was still optimistic that an agreement could be achieved. However the mood in Whitehall changed on June 13 when the MEW received advice from

Tokyo that their demands were far too wide and there was “no hope” that the embargo would be discussed.¹³²

Churchill was in touch with Reynaud again that day in a bid to persuade the French government, by then near the end of organized resistance, not to “enter into a separate peace with Germany.” The government was deeply divided but Reynaud agreed to make a direct appeal to Roosevelt “to declare war if you can, but in any event to send us every form of help short of an expeditionary force.”¹³³ Roosevelt’s response was, in effect, a rejection of the appeal but he instructed his military planners to assume that Britain would still be actively resisting Germany in six months time with neither the United States nor the Soviet Union having entered the war,¹³⁴ and he advised the British and French that the US government was doing “everything in its power to make available to the Allied governments the material they so urgently require, and our efforts to do still more are being redoubled.”¹³⁵ Cordell Hull refused to allow the statement to be published from fear of a political backlash in the US. One of the things the administration had agreed upon was a system of joint financing of military plant expansion under which the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (RFC) could advance the money required for factories to be built to supply the equipment which each of the United States, Britain and France needed and that the Allies would only pay back to the RFC in proportion to the goods produced which they actually purchased.¹³⁶ Although it fell well short of what Britain and France hoped for, it was, in fact, a major step for the president to approve as leader of a non-belligerent power, especially in view of US Neutrality Laws.

AN ANGLO-FRENCH UNION?

German troops entered Paris on June 14 and, in the absence of an undertaking from the United States that it would intervene, the Deputy Prime Minister of France, Marshall Petain, threatened to resign if the French Government did not seek a separate peace to prevent the total occupation of France. The British Government then made a desperation bid to keep France in the war with an offer of a complete Anglo-French political and economic merger with “the indissoluble union of our two peoples and of our two empires.” Sir Alexander Cadogan noted in his diary that it was Neville Chamberlain, the former Prime Minister, who “brought up” the proposal “which he [Chamberlain] didn’t think much of”¹³⁷ and although Churchill was at pains in his memoirs to disclaim responsibility for originating the idea and to show that his first reaction was unfavourable, some authors credit the pursuit of the proposal primarily to him.

Churchill later wrote that on June 14 a group of British and French officials (whose names he listed) had “evolved the outline of a declaration for a Franco-British Union with the object ... of giving M. Reynaud some new fact of a vivid and stimulating nature with which to carry the majority of his cabinet into the move to Africa and the continuance of the war.” Having noted “the overpowering importance of making sure of the French fleet” he wrote that he first heard of “a definite plan” at a luncheon on June 15 with Lord Halifax, the French Ambassador M. Charles Corbin, Sir Robert Vansittart “and one or two others.” Such wording does not exclude the possibility that he had instructed the officials to develop a proposal or that he was at least aware of earlier discussions. It may be, therefore, that Chamberlain raised the matter in cabinet either at the request of Churchill, or prompted by a submission which he was aware of, or on his own initiative. In any case there was minimal discussion of the proposal in cabinet and although it was approved it was deeply divisive. When Churchill transmitted the declaration next day he attached a simple note that he was writing "in accordance with cabinet's wishes," but he then pursued the matter with vigour. He told the French Government: "We cannot measure the various forms of tribulation which will fall upon our peoples in the near future. We are sure that the ordeal by fire will only fuse them together into one unconquerable whole." The British cabinet had agreed that under the Franco-British Union there would be a single War Cabinet, joint organs of defence, foreign, financial and economic policies, and dual citizenship. Reynaud supported the proposal but the debate in his cabinet was so acrimonious that it was not put to the vote. He resigned and Marshall Petain formed a government.

The fact that Churchill, the archetypal British Imperialist whose every move, whether personal or political, was aimed at maintaining and strengthening the British Empire, could offer to sacrifice imperial independence, basically in order to secure the French fleet in an effort to maintain some level of shared imperial operations and benefits, illustrates that Britain's plight was desperate indeed. However he went on to write: "We shall never turn from the conflict until France stands safe and erect in all her grandeur, until the wronged and enslaved states and peoples have been liberated, and until civilization is freed from the nightmare of Nazidom." [Emphasis added.]

The sentiment in those final few words was the sentiment which had provided the basis for not only Churchill's many speeches and addresses on behalf of The Focus, but also his vote of confidence address to the House of Commons one month earlier, his broadcast to the nation, and his address to the Commons on June 4. In that one brief but consistent expression Prime Minister Churchill had tied the fate of the British Empire to Hitler's pursuit of his final solution. The sentiment and the decision were clearly Churchill's. The decision had been brewing for some time but it was taken without specific public debate for the purpose, without parliamentary debate and with a minimum of cabinet consultation. It is therefore very tempting, and it may be justifiable on the basis of the evidence available, to say that Churchill was personally and politically beholden to The Focus and that he was therefore locked into the decision which he took. But that is too simplistic and it does no justice to the integrity of either Churchill or the Jewish community. The consequences of the church's self misunderstanding, centuries of anti-Semitism and, specifically, the cynical manipulation and exploitation of the Jewish community by means of the Balfour Declaration in pursuit of Britain's imperial interests were coming home to roost. Churchill's personal stand on the Jewish question was well known and he had never sought to conceal his commitment to Zionism but in the weeks and months which followed that bid he had to work hard to maintain consensus in cabinet and it therefore fell to him to maintain the support of the British public, together with the dominions and colonies, and to secure the involvement of the United States.

Even if the cabinets had both reached majority decisions to implement the union which Churchill proposed it is very doubtful whether it could have been sustained because of dissent in both countries. Marshall Petain said that it was a scheme to place France in tutelage, to carry off her empire and to reduce her to the status of a dominion. And because he expected Britain to be defeated within three weeks, having its neck “wrung like a chicken”, he said it amounted to “fusion with a corpse.”¹³⁸ Similarly, in Britain Lord Hankey declared that he would resist to the uttermost in his power “any sacrifice of our nationality or any permanent fusion with France.”¹³⁹ National pride and ethnic sensitivity, bias and insularity ran just as deep on both sides of the battle lines.

Cordell Hull’s advice to Roosevelt that his supportive statement of the 13th should not be published proved politically astute. While Churchill, Halifax and Corbin were at lunch on June 15, the US Congress was in the act of rebuffing Roosevelt for his strong policy stand and for the fact that he had already authorized substantial sales of arms to Britain and France. It showed clearly that while some people, like Secretary of the Interior Harold Ickes, were prepared to “support a resolution right now declaring war against both Germany and Italy”¹⁴⁰ an isolationist atmosphere still prevailed. Congress approved a resolution for the sale of surplus US coast and anti-aircraft defence equipment to Latin American countries which were also to be permitted to build warships in US naval shipyards. But it prohibited those countries from transferring out of the hemisphere (of the Americas) any of the goods so purchased or built.¹⁴¹ It was more concerned at the possibility that Germany and Italy might join forces with the ultra-right wing regimes in the Argentine and Uruguay and foment an anti-American movement among the five million or so people of German, Italian and Japanese descent in the central and southern Americas than it was about the immediate fate of Western Europe and Britain.¹⁴² And there was also a strong feeling in Congress that Britain would either be defeated or seeking an armistice within weeks and there was little to be gained by permitting further supplies to be shipped there. They were only echoing Hitler’s confidence. His confidence was so great that on that day he had ordered partial demobilization of the Reich Army, from 160 divisions to 120, a move which he had foreshadowed in May. It was hardly the action of a supreme commander who anticipated the need for the military occupation of Britain by sea-borne invasion.

In the meantime, while German troops were marching into Paris, the Soviet government issued an ultimatum to Lithuania requiring that Soviet troops be permitted to occupy the country. With no option, the government complied. Latvia and Estonia were subjected to the same treatment on June 16. Those actions undermined even further any will which the French government had to continue resistance. With the balance of its army facing a rout, the Petain government opened negotiations with Germany on June 18. Churchill and the British government were under even greater pressure to do likewise, but there was a ray of hope, and some relief, next day when an agreement was signed with Japan resolving the Tientsin territorial and trade dispute which had brought the two countries to the brink of war a year earlier. However the relief proved short lived. The knowledge that France had sought an armistice with Germany made its impotence in the East even more obvious than Britain’s and Japan was learning very quickly how to leapfrog one piece at a time. Demands for the French to close Indo-China's borders with China were delivered to the French Ambassador the same day, June 19, and Britain's relief was immediately offset by a similar demand. The Director of Intelligence of the Imperial Japanese Army (IJA) delivered the government's demand that Britain immediately close both the Burma/China and Hong Kong frontiers, and withdraw its forces from Shanghai. In reporting those demands, the British Military Attache in Tokyo told Whitehall that the situation was critical; there was nothing to stop Japan from seizing any or all of French Indo-China, the Dutch East Indies or Hong Kong; the United States was in no condition to prevent Japan from taking any action it wishes in the Western Pacific; and immediate compliance with its demands "is the only thing that may yet avert a declaration of war by Japan against Britain."¹⁴³

The Foreign Office reaction was to instruct Craigie to 'play for time' and to warn Japan of the economic consequences of siding with 'the unreliable Germans', but he responded with a five point plan to defuse the crisis. He proposed: British assistance to settle the Sino-Japanese crisis linked to Japanese undertakings to remain neutral in the war in Europe and to respect the status quo in South East Asia and the Pacific; financial and economic assistance from the United States and Commonwealth countries immediately and following the ending of the Sino-Japanese war; no re-export of supplies to Russia or Germany; and questions of settlements and concessions in China to be dealt with when peace was restored to Europe and China.¹⁴⁴ Craigie then battled to keep the talks alive while Churchill and his new government, which had regarded the threat to British interests in East Asia as "an inconvenience that had to be neutralized by whatever resources were available, including appeasement,"¹⁴⁵ began to focus in two directions at once. They focussed very quickly when the French authorities in Indo-China bowed to pressure and closed the border with China while the Petain government was still negotiating an armistice with Germany. The reconstruction of colonial Asia appeared imminent and both the US and Japan were eager to be involved in the action. To Japan, Germany appeared to be the partner of the future. Germany's new order in Europe would be matched by a co-prosperity sphere in East Asia under Japan's leadership.

The Franco-German armistice was signed on June 22 and, on June 25, Whitehall asked the Roosevelt administration two questions. Would the United States support Britain militarily if it refused Japan's demands? If the answer was 'no', would it agree to joint Anglo-American mediation in the Sino-Japanese war? Whitehall was on tenterhooks for a few days while it waited for the US response in case news leaked out about British talk of mediation between China and Japan. If it did, China might be pushed into the Soviet camp and British interests would be at serious risk. The Soviet Union would be antagonized by the threat of encirclement just when the Foreign Office was working to improve Anglo-Soviet relations in the European theatre, and although the FO "had no desire for Anglo-Soviet collaboration in East Asia", it certainly did not want to precipitate a Soviet push southward.¹⁴⁶ In addition Japan's relations with both of its neighbours would be compromised and it could be expected to increase its pressure for Britain to quit Asia altogether. Its double-handed poker game was going against Britain on all sides of the table. The American response was received on June 28, the same day that the contraband control negotiations with Japan broke down and the plan for a Japanese-supported trade embargo against Russia had to be abandoned.¹⁴⁷ Secretary of State Hull would give no guarantee of US support. He said Britain should only give way on the Burma Road closure under force majeure, and while he did not object to Sino-Japanese peace discussions "Britain should not expect joint or parallel action by the United States." Britain was to fend for itself in its colonial adventures in East Asia,¹⁴⁸ and, at least for the time being, it had to in Europe as well. It seemed as if all the world was against it, but no one in government or in the churches had any explanation for how or why that situation had come about, and the government felt obliged to continue the conspiracy of silence because the release of any information, disclosure and debate could only weaken Britain's position still further.

Over the next few days Britain floundered from one decision to another and what ever it did – troop movements or refusal to move, border restrictions, or trading changes – antagonized one or more of China, Japan and Russia. However, by that time, although less than six percent of Americans favoured a declaration of war against the Axis, and less than 30 percent believed that Britain could win the war, public opinion in the US had swung heavily in favour of more economic assistance for Britain. It had risen from less than 20 percent in March, to almost 80 percent,¹⁴⁹ and much of the credit for that dramatic change is given to Churchill and his speech in the Commons on June 4.

Churchill was therefore determined to fight on and to avoid giving ground in compromise negotiations, and he succeeded in dragging his government with him in a decision to do so. Hitler was still equally determined to get Germany's Lebensraum and to rid of his Jews, but he had to change his methods because any further 'negotiated' emigration was quite out of the question. In August a plan was presented to him for the transportation of all Jews in occupied territories to the French Island of Madagascar. Whether the Nazis really expected to be able to continue their policy of expulsion and forced emigration in this way is uncertain. They could hardly expect to run the gauntlet of the British navy with full immigrant liners all the way around Europe and Africa, let alone protect them as they returned as freight-carrying vessels to Germany. They would have been very easy targets. And in any case Germany could hardly afford to release the resources for such a venture – unless it could find an alternative use for a Jewish ghetto settlement, such as a means of blackmailing Jewish communities in the United States and elsewhere. [See also, chapter 24, the Fugu Plan and Tripartite Pact negotiations, pp. 18–26.] Therefore these schemes were, in effect, a part of the 'think tank' and negotiating processes, and part of the continuing psychological or public relations battle to get the Allies to the armistice negotiating table, which the Nazi authorities went through before finally arriving at the alternative of death camps. In that sense they failed miserably.

The Great Powers pondered their options and manoeuvred for advantage and while they did so the pincers closed relentlessly on Finland's strategic frontier area which could be of interest to any number of parties. Its people found themselves totally isolated following the German occupation of Denmark, Norway, the Netherlands, Belgium, Luxembourg and finally France.

They struggled to prevent either further Russian territorial claims or action by Britain to blockade its harbours. Depending on which alliances were forged or broken Finland could become a battleground in the war between Britain and the German-Italian Axis or, if circumstances changed, between Germany and Russia, or between a Western Alliance (with or without Germany) and Russia. In due course, in 1941, they would find themselves cooperating, necessarily but unwillingly, with an Alliance of Germany and Italy. But Finland desperately needed allies, or at least someone who had the ear of one or more of the warring parties. In such circumstances the overtures from the Vatican sounded heartwarming indeed! Diplomatic relations were established between them in 1942.

In the meantime it was not long before unforeseen consequences of the 'alliance' between the US and the Vatican began to show. It quite quickly undermined, or perhaps superseded, the intimate relationship between influential Fascists and the Vatican and, even though the United States was still in non-combatant mode, it was necessary for the presidential mission to be relocated within Vatican City instead of in the suburbs of Rome when Italy entered the war. A little later it was actually withdrawn, only to be re-established and enlarged when Germany invaded Russia twelve months later, on June 22, 1941 and greatly complicated the political situation for the Western Alliance and relations between the US and the Vatican. Subsequently, when the Allies invaded North Africa in November, 1942, (the decision to do so having been taken in January), and there was an increase in Allied activity in Northern Italy with obvious collusion from the church, Mussolini accused the Vatican of being little more than a listening post for the Western Alliance. He banned Taylor (who had conveniently returned to Washington six weeks before the invasion) from returning to the Vatican via Italy and contemplated revoking the Lateran Treaty. Cardinal Spellman then paid a special visit to the Vatican as personal messenger from Roosevelt to the pope. In spite of vigorous denials by the Vatican the indications are overwhelming that the transfer of the papal seat from Rome to the western hemisphere was considered at that time.

Pius XII was painfully aware of the implications for the church's doctrines, operations, political influence and its policy of Ultramontanism if the papacy and the headquarters of the Roman Catholic Church were to move to the US, or anywhere else in the Western hemisphere, and he resisted all pressure from both Mussolini and the United States. He insisted on staying put even though his presence complicated Allied strategy in Southern Europe and Mussolini could not force him out without some arrangement which gave the appearance of papal agreement or he would have had a nation-wide rebellion. By that stage it would have been quite impossible for the pope to shift his seat to Jerusalem – the only other city which would have been acceptable in terms of the self-understanding of the papacy – because the Jewish claim to it was becoming well entrenched in the United States. Quite apart from that, the complications for Britain's relations with the World Zionist Organization, the Jewish Agency and the Muslim Arab countries would have made its position in the Middle East impossible and the overall effect on the Allied war effort would have been catastrophic. Rome simply had to be protected so that the pope could stay there. Thus the United States – the bastion of evangelical Protestantism – informally assumed the role of guarantor to the papacy which Austria had filled when earlier popes had been at loggerheads with Italian rulers over the future of the Papal States.

However a gradual but distinct shift occurred in the way in which the Roman Catholic Church presented itself. Its officials and spokespersons increasingly used the term ‘Catholic Church’ and ‘Mother Church’, and avoided using ‘Roman Catholic Church.’ The rise of the Ecumenical Movement which was undoubtedly world wide in character, gave them the opportunity and the incentive to place the emphasis on the competitive term ‘catholic’, meaning world wide, rather than the somewhat restrictive term ‘Holy Roman Church’ with the implication that it was ‘of and anchored in Rome.’ This enabled it to minimize the potential impact of a move away from Rome by the papacy if the circumstances of war changed so that it was impossible for it to stay put. In due course this would require it to distance itself from the decrees of the first Vatican Council seventy years earlier. Those decrees – issued within the memory of elderly Catholics everywhere – had stated categorically that: “The Holy Roman Church enjoys supreme and full primacy and pre-eminence over the whole Catholic Church ...” and “... none can doubt ... that the Holy and Most Blessed Peter ... received the keys of the kingdom from our Lord Jesus Christ, the Saviour and Redeemer of mankind, and lives, presides, and judges, to this day and always, in his successors the Bishops of the Holy See of Rome, which was founded by him and consecrated by his blood.”¹⁵⁰

Other words must have come back to haunt Pius XII also: his own pathetic praise for Mussolini in his hunt for concordats in Summi Pontificatus as well as those of his predecessor, Pius XI. In answer to a question from a foreign diplomat about whether he was seeking guarantors to the Lateran Treaty, Pius XI had said the need for such guarantors would never be less than in Mussolini’s era. If he had time to reflect on the history of the church he may also have noticed that it was pressure of political circumstances and not religious tolerance or enlightened understanding which had forced both Mussolini and the United States to change their attitudes to denominational issues. They were no different to either nineteenth century Britain when it was forced to enfranchise both Jews and Catholics or Bismarck when he dropped his Kulturkampf in favour of his anti-Semitic program in the same era.

Hitler’s decision to attack the west had reinforced existing resistance movements within Germany, some of which had been in existence since he came to power in 1933, and triggered a series of new moves against him. An important one which later involved repeated assassination attempts was formed by senior officers of the German High Command. Another involved influential clergy from the Confessional wing of the Reich Evangelical Church, and a third was based among workers linked to the Communist Party and other left wing organizations. Links were soon established through Vatican channels with the British authorities and, for a time, Pius XII agreed to act as an intermediary. This is surprising in view of his having urged Hitler, with Mussolini, to turn and wage war against the Soviet Union. As the networks of resistance became progressively intertwined they provided contacts for Allied intelligence operations, assisted in the shelter and rescue of service persons, prisoners of war and Jews, and helped to undermine the effectiveness of the German domestic war effort through industrial disruption and sabotage, although the effectiveness of disruptive activities of that nature is debatable.¹⁵¹

But it was not only the Jews who were to suffer. Those areas of Poland which were to be fully integrated into the Reich to provide breathing space – the parcels of land for every scion of the people of the Reich to till with their own hands – were to be cleared of everyone who failed the test of Germanic racial purity.¹⁵² The Polish leadership elite including the clergy, the nobility and the intelligentsia were to be exterminated and non-Teutonic Poles were to provide labour for German controlled industry. On the other hand blond Polish children of Teutonic appearance were considered especially desirable. They were to be sent to Germany for ideological indoctrination. And a steady stream of ‘racially pure’ Germans which eventually totalled half a million persons was brought from Germany to establish German peasant colonies.¹⁵³ While some senior German army officers were opposed to the Polish ‘reclamation’ program their opposition was quickly overcome through political indoctrination programs and by ensuring that the ‘special duty units’ worked apart from the army but kept the army informed of their programs.

The world seems to have been mesmerized by the action in Europe and while Poland was being devastated there was an air of unreality about the war. This resulted from the fact that few countries had wanted to stand up to Hitler for one or more reasons. They either had sympathy for his efforts to correct the readily perceived and skillfully manipulated wrongs of Versailles, they concurred with his Jewish program or they were reluctant to talk about territorial concessions. But the unreality was compounded by the continuing conspiracy of silence.

Naturally the level of trust between members of the British Government and the Jewish authorities was very variable and relationships were severely strained. Immediately after the outbreak of war the government rejected a proposal by the Jewish Agency that an army be recruited from Jews in Palestine and around the world to fight in the British Army under a Jewish flag. However the threat of the final solution encouraged voluntary enlistment by Jews both in Palestine and overseas in Allied armies in numbers quite out of proportion to their representation in their communities in spite of that rejection. The Jewish Agency received 130,000 registrations for military service from both men and women of service age in Palestine. That would have provided a formidable force but Britain feared the consequences of such a force being available to the Jewish Agency to throw against either the British authorities or the Arabs when the future of Palestine was to be determined after the war with Hitler. It therefore mounted a deliberate campaign to discourage Jewish enlistment from Palestine but in spite of that 30,000 out of the 130,000 still served in the British Army.^{154 155 156 157}

In the United States the Jewish community had been galvanized into action by the invasion of Poland even though it was deeply divided on the question of Zionism and whether this required an exclusively Jewish State. The Zionist Organization of America took the initiative to establish the American Zionist Emergency Council and under the influential leadership of Rabbi Wise and Rabbi Abba Hillel Silver the council set out to mobilize US Jewish, Congressional and public support for the establishment of a Jewish State in Palestine when hostilities ceased. There was deep seated antagonism to overcome from the “violently neutral” population and the proposal was opposed by the State Department, the War Department and influential diplomats until 1945 as being prejudicial to the war effort. But various Zionist groups were successful in raising funds, arranging secret shipments of arms to the Hagana and recruiting volunteers to navigate ships with illegal immigrants from Europe across the Mediterranean to Palestine to circumvent the quotas set under Britain’s White Paper. The United Jewish Appeal which was organized to help fund settlement in Palestine raised $US3.5 million in 1940 and grew rapidly so that in 1947 it raised $US50 million. Naturally there were difficulties. Until the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbour in 1941 the Zionists were under regular attack for trying to draw the United States into the war against Hitler for their own ends and many prominent Jewish leaders would not speak out for fear of having their American patriotism questioned.^{158 159}

There were a number of considerations behind Britain’s decision to declare war once Hitler invaded Poland, but three stand out. First, there was the question of empire. The Reich had grown so big so suddenly as a renewed imperial power in the heart of Europe that Hitler, left unimpeded, was not likely to stop there and with the resources available he would have been able to dictate terms anywhere in the world – especially in the Middle East – and Britain’s empire was therefore at further risk. Second, British investors held enormous interests in Poland and they expected their government to recover them, especially as part of the country was in socialist hands. Third, the Jewish lobby would not rest until the government took steps to prevent the final solution.

PROPAGANDA AND PUBLIC OPINION

Unfortunately the government was unable – or at least unwilling – to discuss the problems of the empire frankly and openly. In the post-depression atmosphere the nation may have objected to a war over a bit of foreign investment, especially if it was known to be controlled by Jews. Apathy towards the Jewish question and acceptance of Hitler’s final solution were so deep seated that the government may not have carried the public with it on that basis and it is very doubtful whether it had the strength of commitment to do so. The Jewish question was so sensitive that the British censor banned any media reference to the existence of the Jewish Agency’s recruiting office and any news items which reflected favourably on Jewish involvement in the war effort were suppressed. Even ministerial answers to questions in the House of Commons were censored to prevent the publication of any reference to Palestine.¹⁶⁰ The world was therefore forced into another propaganda slanging match to enable the great powers to fight over power without having to admit it to their people who were carrying the main burden of funding the war through taxation (although their country’s reserves were also being exhausted), and through deaths, casualties and massive social dislocation.

Hitler had ordered the establishment of a Ministry of People’s Enlightenment and Propaganda as soon as he came to power and a presidential decree was signed on March 12,1933. In the meantime the Nazi Party had operated a major unit with that purpose at its Munich headquarters and the two bodies apparently worked in parallel. The party unit employed about 14,000 people in 1934 while the ministry was set up with only 350 staff and it had not reached Minister Goebbels' limit of 1,000 by April 1939.¹⁶¹ Officially the ministry was to undertake all tasks of national mental indoctrination, of promotion of state, culture and economy, and public instruction about these tasks both at home and abroad. In fact its main functions were propaganda campaigns against Communism, against the Jews and the churches, and in favour of racial purity plus, of course, censorship. All that had to be set in a context in which people would believe that Hitler was achieving for them what he had promised in 1933 and in which they would accept war in due course. Hitler talked peace, not war, but incited indignation over injustices inflicted on Germany and Germans by others and emphasized German national strength and unity.¹⁶²

The British decision to establish a Ministry of Information was taken by the Committee of Imperial Defence in July 1936 after twelve months study against a background of "an emergency" and with the expectation that war time censorship would be required with a system for issuing news as well as for controlling it. During the protracted negotiations to get the ministry fully operational there was debate between units of the civil service, the British Broadcasting Corporation and politicians about whether the same people should prepare and release both propaganda and genuine news. Propaganda had to relate to government policy whereas newsworthy matters may occur without regard for government policy and they may well come into conflict. There was also some dispute over whether the Minister for Information was to conduct political warfare or merely service other ministries.¹⁶³ As the early years of the war went against Britain the ministry was progressively reorganized to ensure more effective production and delivery of propaganda both at home and overseas with special emphasis on allied and neutral countries. A number of early slips had either depressed morale at home or boosted German morale.

The techniques of public opinion polling to assess current public attitudes and how to influence them which had been developed and exploited in the United States were relatively new to Britain, having been introduced only in the late 1930's, but immediately war was declared the ministry retained consultants to report on public reactions. Postal censorship was also used in part for the same purpose.¹⁶⁴ Subsequently the National Institute of Economic and Social Research was asked to carry out such work to avoid an adverse response to the ministry making commercial arrangements in the matter. Surveys provided the basis for decisions on such matters as industrial working conditions, consumer supplies, public transport and, of course, the justification for continuing the war – all physical and psychological factors which influenced good war morale which was defined as "conduct and behavior indicating that [the public was] prepared to go through with the war to final victory, whatever the cost to the individual or group."

As a result of the conspiracy of silence during the 1930's the British public's understanding of Britain's situation was very poor and the born-to-rule philosophy and interests of the conservative elite and the financial controllers of British domestic and overseas enterprises left no room for rapid change in that respect. In September 1938 there was widespread acceptance of Hitler's "new philosophies" and belief that the concessions required – of other people such as the Austrians, the Czechoslovakians and the Poles – were justified to preserve 'peace.' However the surveys a year later showed a gradual drift away from that position and the majority were moving towards the conclusion that Hitler must be stopped and that this could only be done by force. Just before hostilities broke out only 34 percent of those surveyed still thought that anything was better than war and by the end of September 89 percent said Britain should fight until Hitlerism disappeared. In fact in spite of Chamberlain's conspiracy of silence which did not have the benefit of legal recognition at all, 77 percent disapproved of further peace talks with Germany.

Conservatives saw Hitler as a menace to Britain's power, Liberals believed he was a threat to freedom and Labor saw him as a threat to social democracy.¹⁶⁵ But the individual pieces of Hitler's new philosophy still had such wide support and were being implemented in one country or another that a propaganda campaign on the basis of his platforms would have been divisive and counter productive. The British Government had locked itself into accepting the basic thrust of Hitler's ethnic policy by proposing and arguing for the partition of Czechoslovakia on the basis of ethnic community of interest. Then when it gave the government of President Benes a guarantee of intervention on the basis of 'so far and no further' few people in Britain queried why it had been given or whether it could be acted upon. It couldn't any more than the later Polish guarantee. At that stage Britain did not have the aircraft capacity to intervene effectively either in Germany, Czechoslovakia or Poland and it was to be a long time in coming. (Chamberlain's admission, chapter 25) The propaganda attack therefore had to be on 'Hitlerism' in a general sense. A wedge had to be driven between the German people and their leaders while the threat to traditional values and to Christianity had to be played up at home, in the dominions and in neutral countries. Churchill was expert at capturing the mood and the expectations of the British people and once he was back in government the propaganda machine took full advantage of his inspiring speeches. Chamberlain's speech on the declaration of war, as pathetic as it was, actually set the pattern which was to be maintained. "We have no quarrel with the German people," he said.

Changing circumstances and the propaganda machine both had their impact as public attitudes evolved so that when a survey was taken in June, 1941, 46 percent of Britons said they were fighting for freedom, liberty and democracy; 14 percent to stop Fascism, Hitlerism and aggression; 8 percent "because it's them or us"; 5 percent for "our existence." Only 7 percent looked to the future in the sense of saying they were fighting for a better world and a mere 4 percent saw the war as 'an imperialist and capitalist racket.'¹⁶⁶ However in the circumstances that 4 percent was very significant and it certainly would have risen if the government had not suppressed two papers which questioned the national war motive (the Daily Worker and The Week) from January 1941 to August 1942 and threatened others with similar action. In addition special measures were taken to circumvent the independence of the BBC broadcasting service to ensure that it followed the official line.

Italy actually opened the propaganda broadcasting war when it beamed anti-British programs into the Middle East in the Arabic language in 1937 but Britain reacted quickly and had services operating in Arabic, Spanish, Portuguese, German, Italian and French before the declaration of war. Programs for the overseas services were produced and transmitted from secret locations to avoid compromising the BBC and to minimize the need for those involved to justify what they were doing and saying, and to make it easier to devise and produce 'black' propaganda. Censorship went so far that while Members of Parliament were permitted to discuss the foreign broadcasts in the House of Commons they were not permitted to refer to the policies behind the programs or to see the scripts (until late in the war).

The Ministry of Information also undertook regular leaflet drops over Germany. At the peak of the program in 1943, 50 versions in 10 languages were being produced and dropped over Europe either by the Royal Air Force or by balloons. The Pope's encyclical Summi Pontificatus of October 20, 1939 was even among them but, as Hitler found it quite to his liking, it served little purpose. In fact as circumstances unfolded there was much less value to be gained in Europe in the propaganda stakes from the issue of religious affiliation than had been the case in the first world war. The Allies could not play up Hitler's final solution to the Jewish question unless they were prepared to accept enormous numbers of Jewish refugees and they had been hell-bent on demonstrating that they were not. In fact Churchill's speeches played skillfully on the general threat to Christendom, not Judaism, but he also had to be very careful how he played the Christian game. He could not denigrate Islam because it would have been the quickest way to consolidate links between Hitler's regime and Muslim countries throughout the world. And he had to be very careful how he handled the question of fascism and Christianity in the face of the Vatican's concordats with each of the Fascist governments and its love-hate relationships with both Germany and Italy. A key issue, as in the previous war, was how to avoid antagonistic statements being issued by the Vatican. Certainly if the Pope left Rome he would lose the Lateran Treaty and his temporal rule over Vatican City which went with it, with the distinct possibility that the papacy would never return to Rome.

The British authorities were clearly in a bind. Information on German atrocities against Jews and others was being provided by resistance workers and other sources on a continuous basis and if it was not used either in operational planning or to influence public attitudes in both Allied and Axis countries the Jewish community had good reason to be concerned and to develop closer links with the United States. The policy was therefore adopted of releasing statements on terrorism and crimes against humanity on a strictly factual basis in two ways: the publication of official war documents and the release of news bulletins on individual situations. Nothing was released through propaganda channels. It appears that from October 1939 to December 1942 the British Government issued one White Paper, the Stationary Office two 'notes', the Polish Ministry of Information in exile one statement on German methods in Poland, and the United Nations office one detailed statement on war crimes. It also appears that only a limited number of major events were covered as news.¹⁶⁷

From time to time the British Political Warfare Executive also called the attention of news media to selected aspects of German war crimes. Not less than 11 such calls were issued and sometimes these were supported with information annexes but there was always a direction that the emphasis was to be on cold authenticated facts “without any appearance of mounting an atrocity campaign.”¹⁶⁸ The Ministry acknowledged that between the wars the Allies had earned a bad reputation for their exaggerated and fabricated stories about German atrocities in the first world war and the same criticism applied to their treatment of the Bolshevik revolution. The German propaganda authorities naturally took full advantage of this to undermine the credibility and the acceptance of British reports of German war crimes in the second world war and this actually enabled them to boost the effectiveness and the volume of their anti-Semitic propaganda.¹⁶⁹

In addition to adopting a subdued approach to the Jewish question Britain also had to play down its attacks on Communism as a philosophy, the Soviet system and its leaders. The Allies all knew – just as well as Hitler and Stalin – that the non-aggression pact between Germany and the Soviet Union was a matter of mutual convenience. It could not last. The question was simply which party would break the treaty. Britain desperately needed Russia to open a second front against Hitler, so the propaganda line was softened to: “the Communist system is not for us, but the Russian people are fine.” It was not until Japan entered the war that all stops could be pulled out and the well tried issues of racism and religion could again be trotted out to provide the basis of Allied propaganda. It enabled the Allies to conceal, at least from their own people for a couple of generations, that it was basically their policies and conduct which precipitated the war and plunged the world into such an abyss.

Even within its dominions and the United States (on which Britain was very soon to be dependent for its survival) the Ministry of Information had to be very careful indeed. The British Government was deeply conscious that much of the isolationism in the US was based on the widely held belief that Jewish pressure and foreign propaganda were the basis of the nation’s decision to enter the first world war. That belief was being force fed by commercial interests – in particular the oil and motor industries – which were opposed to any trade embargoes. Britain therefore could do nothing which would ‘prove’ the isolationist case. It could only liaise closely with the president and those in the US administration who were sympathetic, provide information on request and wait for the inevitable decision.

On the other hand Hitler faced a similar dilemma. He knew the inevitability of US intervention and while he wanted to delay it as long as possible he could not be seen to be courting the isolationists. Britain gave him his best break when it rejected his peace offer. He had fabricated incidents to justify his attack on Poland, he was able to instruct his media people to highlight the guilt of Britain’s leaders and he insisted that France should be spared adverse publicity in order to drive a wedge between the two allies. Subsequently the German media was instructed to mark September 3 as the outbreak of war – the date of Chamberlain’s declaration – and not September 1 when Germany took its “police action” in response to Polish “provocation.”¹⁷⁰

South Africa had served notice on Britain that it would not go to war against Germany on the ethnic integration issue. In Britain, too, there was strong feeling within the Labor movement that Nazism was a result of the Allies’ heavy handed treatment of Germany after World War I and that war could have been avoided. But Europe was caught up in its war. The principal belligerents had locked themselves in so that it was bound to spread and few people really understood what it was about. There is a widely held belief, although it is most unfortunate, that a government cannot conduct a war to the maximum benefit of the nation if all the people know all the facts and nothing but the facts. As a result, selective and partial reporting and manipulation of what is presented (and how) is a fact of life. As the second world war gathered pace and ferocity the propaganda war accelerated too. Changing relationships, successes, dangers and the conduct and characteristics of allies and enemies became the stuff of propaganda. Granted, there was an enormous volume of facts and news to be processed and disseminated and the fundamental issue of the fate of the Jewish people had to take its place alongside all the rest. But it is very reasonable to ask whether the Jewish question and its importance in the war were treated by Britain and her allies as thoroughly or as openly as it should have been. The clear indication is that it was not. It was not simply because Britain and its relationships were all tied up in knots. The conspiracy of silence and the cover up of national motives continued. Truth was, as always, the first casualty. Tensions were brought to the surface all around the world. Cohesion was achieved in some communities at the price of dissent among others.

But we have jumped ahead a bit. When France withdrew on June 22, Churchill was determined to fight on and he succeeded in dragging his government with him in a decision to do so. Britain declared its position and waited for Hitler to make his next move, but there were a lot of other players, and while some were becoming impatient for their moves, others were more reluctant. There is no doubt that the intensity of anti-Semitism in Europe, the apathy towards the matter in the non-European world, and the deep-seated fear of a general war were such that if Britain had accepted the opportunity for an ‘honorable’ peace after the fall of France, the British public would have accepted it. The people of the British Commonwealth would have accepted it, and the whole world would have understood and accepted it – and then set out to exploit it ... and the trouble in the triangle would have rolled on. It would have followed a somewhat different course, but it would not have been physically, technically or philosophically possible to eliminate Judaism and to circumvent the trouble in the triangle, irrespective of the final extent of Hitler’s temporal authority.

It was indeed a remarkable situation and totally consistent with the nature of the parody of Mein Kampf. When Britain had the opportunity to ensure a change of government in Germany through recognition of the key group of conspirators and by courtesy of Pius XII it treated them with disdain. A settlement on the basis which the conspirators proposed would have provided for almost all of the expectations of the amorphous Christian gel, except for the elimination of the challenge of Communist influence flowing from the Soviet Union. Neither would it have solved challenges of the Jewish Question as it was manifest in Zionist expectations, or the colonial question as it was manifest in the challenge of Japan's co-prosperity sphere. These would have remained to be worked through in more settled times when people could consider the overall challenge to the church and Western Christian self-understanding of the trouble in the triangle. But perhaps that concept of "more settled times" after the world returned to the status quo – white Western Christian superiority – was a part of the problem. No group, no government, has ever surrendered a position of privilege until it has been faced with a challenge supported by overwhelming or potentially overwhelming force. The negotiation of equity by groups with greatly unequal power rarely, if ever, occurs. The world simply had to work through the parody completely. Was it a pause to regroup ... or cause for reflection?

CHAPTER 24

CAUSE FOR REFLECTION

On June 22 1940 Britain stood alone. Desperately alone. Pathetically alone. The great white Christian power which dominated the most extensive empire the world had ever known was losing its grip. It was struggling to avoid defeat in a war in Europe which its people neither understood nor wanted; it faced the prospect of a second war, in Asia, which threatened to strip it of its colonies and dominions in that region; and it was embroiled in a crisis in the Middle East which, if it could not be contained, had the potential to make it impossible for it to avoid defeat in both wars. It was running out of friends and allies. It was even running out of a list of like-minded imperial European Christian powers which were either prepared to help it prop up its position of power and privilege or which were in a position to do so.

The thinkers in Britain were only very slowly coming to realize that the conflicts of interest and deep antagonisms which it had generated over a long period by its policies and actions as a Christian imperial power – especially during the current generation – had made its position untenable. And, unfortunately, the churches were not among the thinkers. Their self-understanding was such that they perceived themselves to be essential to the solution, not basic to the problem. Britain's lines of communication to the component parts of its far flung empire were becoming indefensible. Instead of being able to defend its imperial interests, or instead of even being able to impose its will in its colonies, it was becoming dependent upon the goodwill of those colonies and dominions. In fact the goodwill had largely run out and Britain was dependent on the ability of the relatively small numbers of dominions which were dominated by English settlers to come to its aid. Very few people thought seriously that Hitler could be restrained unless the United States dropped its neutrality and fought in an alliance with Britain against Germany, but they had not thought through, or could not think through, the implications of Britain's weak position. They simply could not comprehend that such a mighty God-fearing world wide empire could be brought to its knees so easily, and because of the conspiracy of silence which had become necessary to prop up Britain's position it was a long time before the reality of the situation became apparent.

THE WAR GAMES: PLAYERS' AIMS

There was no country which had actually welcomed the thought of war or which wanted to go to war. Not even Hitler. He had expected that he could get his way without going to war. In spite of all the propaganda to the contrary from both sides of the conflict, Germany was not prepared for general war and Hitler knew it. His advisers kept telling him so. But Britain had played into his hands at every turn, with disarming naïvety at times, so that he believed the risk was worth taking to achieve his aims.

So Britain now stood alone. But was there any need for it to do so? What would have been the consequences if Churchill had opted for an armistice instead of the evacuation of Dunkirk? To be able to reflect on these questions it is necessary to first reflect on the situation of each major player and its war aims. The ones to consider are Germany, Russia, Japan, the United States, the Zionists, the Arabs, the Vatican and Britain. Hitler, as the central figure, provides a starting point. What were his aims, reduced to their simplest form? And what were the corresponding aims and motives of the other principal players?

Hitler's aims were quite definite. They were to regain a place in the sun for Germany by the adoption of economic and social policies based on the growth of capital, but different to those adopted as a result of its defeat in World War I; to obtain "breathing space" by an expansion of territory in Central and Eastern Europe, beginning with the integration into the Reich of all German speaking regions of Europe; to eliminate all Jewish influence within Germany, and subsequently beyond, in accordance with its much-promoted aim which the Christian Church had failed to carry out; and at the same time to eliminate Communism which Hitler saw as the antithesis of his ideal society and a consequence of Jewish influence. A secondary aim was to harness the church in such a way that it became an instrument to impose the social and economic ideals of National Socialism and to help achieve his main aims. It was not among Hitler's aims to bring down the British Empire. In fact he saw cooperation with a continuing and strong British Empire as important to achieving his long term aims.

There was certainly nothing secret about Hitler's aims. He had been shouting them from the rooftops since he wrote Mein Kampf while in prison. And the high level of public support for them both in Germany and in Western countries abroad was common knowledge. He had clashed with the Reformed Churches and even with the Vatican at times but people as high ranking as the former King Edward and the former British Prime Minister Lloyd George had supported his policies publicly and shared confidences with him. Lloyd George, PM at the close of the Great War and one of the architects of the discredited Treaty of Versailles, described Hitler to his daughter as "a very great man" and admitted to him during their meeting in 1936 that Britain had been about to sue for peace at times but Germany did so first and thus suffered the ignominy of total defeat¹ But in addition, Pope Pius XII, in his former capacity as Vatican Secretary of State, had been very eager to take full advantage of Hitler's rise to power and had actively helped him into office and into dictatorship. He could have hoped for no better credentials in pursuing his aims than that.

Soviet Russia's aims were, first and foremost, to avoid being subjugated by Hitler! Then having survived, it also wanted to regain a place in the sun; to develop a viable economic and social structure based on the rule of the proletariat, radically different from the Capitalist system of the Christian Western countries; to encourage the overthrow of the Capitalist system which, before Hitler, had sought to prevent its establishment; to do this through the International Comintern by revolution if the ballot box failed; and to minimize the influence of all religion. Similarly, its aims were widely promoted and well understood, with a growing base of support among labour movements and in the academic sector of the Western World.

Japan's aims were, likewise, to gain a place in the sun by throwing off the American and European domination of its economy; to build a strong economy based on a zone of Asian Cooperation; to eliminate Western colonial influence in Asia and in doing so to achieve a position of regional leadership; and to expel from the region the Christian Church which had assisted in, and which was the epitome of, Western interference and subjugation of the people. Its aims were well known and understood in Asia, but its regional leadership aspirations were disputed by the giant of the region, China, and they were being exploited by America and the European powers. Antagonism towards it, fuelled by ignorance and fear, was being deliberately generated in the European colonies and dominions, and in turn Japan found it advantageous to harness those same factors in order to pursue its aims.

The United States was playing a waiting game. Alongside the long-established powers of Europe and Asia it was the muscle-bound adolescent, vigorous, resource rich, agitated and rearing to go somewhere. It aimed to be – and it believed itself to be already – “the New Israel”, fulfilling theology, encouraging religious observance and representing everything which should have been great and noble about the Western Christian World; providing the outstanding example of economic and social development through its home-grown version of the Protestant Work Ethic linked to virtually unbridled Capitalism (on which its social reformer president was intent on placing a bridle); aspiring to a position of world economic and political leadership; and aiming to fill a pseudo-colonial power role in Asia at the expense of Japan in the event of the expected collapse of European influence in the region. Thus, unlike Germany, the United States did aim to bring down the British Empire by forcing Britain to dismantle the Imperial Preference Trade System and by sponsoring independence or self determination for its dominions and colonies to assist it to muscle-in on their resources and trade which Britain had locked up. But the rearing, muscle-bound adolescent could not decide which direction to take first, or whether to sit back and wait, taking advantage of every situation as it unfolded, to enable it to pick up the crumbs – and other peoples' resources.

The Zionists' aim was to enable the Jewish community to escape from the oppression of life under the church and the anti-Semitic Christian powers of Europe and, in doing so, to fulfill their prophetic mission by returning en masse to re-establish the State of Israel within Palestine as the National Home for Jews – in accord with the undertaking made to them by Britain in the Balfour Declaration.

The Arabs of Palestine and the surrounding region simply aimed to protect their rights in their long-held homeland which was of equal historical and religious significance to them as to the Jews, to do so in accord with the undertakings made to them by Britain prior to the Balfour

Declaration; to eliminate Britain's oppressive colonial influence and, in doing so, to maintain the thrust of Islam's prophetic role.

But because of the nature of the conflicting or double-crossing commitments which Britain had made during World War I, and because of the policies which it had subsequently found it expedient to follow, the aims of the Zionists and the Arabs were not compatible. They could only be pursued concurrently by each of them frustrating Britain's policies and interests at every turn – unless a plan could be found to accommodate the aims of both communities or unless Britain simply withdrew and left the Zionists and the Arabs to resolve the matter themselves. In the circumstances neither option was available. It naturally became an Arab war aim to prevent the establishment of a Zionist State in Palestine. A British withdrawal would simply have left both parties reaching for an alliance to enable them to step up their struggle and Britain would have been a loser from several points of view. It would have lost control of the Eastern Mediterranean, the Suez Canal and the oil resources of the region. But in addition it would have indicated to every colony that it had lost its will and its capacity to hold on to any of them. This would have led to a struggle of enormous proportions for control of the eastern Mediterranean which would have reshaped Europe yet again, probably leaving Hitler's Germany as undisputed master of the region, and Britain would have suffered a total break with the Jewish community and an outflow of capital of enormous proportions. As it was, several Arab countries did forge alliances with Hitler.

The only other alternative (to a joint accommodation plan or British withdrawal) was for either the Palestinian Arabs or the Zionists to modify their aims and their territorial claims, forfeiting Palestine, including Jerusalem, to the other. As we have noted, the Palestinian Arab community was comprised of two sub-communities: Muslims and Christians. The Palestinian Muslims could not have withdrawn, even if incentives were offered for the local community to migrate elsewhere, because under the concept of dar al-Islam the Palestinians are the custodians of Jerusalem's holy places in the name of the entire Nation of Islam and agreement for such a withdrawal would have been unthinkable. Similarly the links between the various churches and diplomatic representation of European powers were still such that for the Palestinian Christians to withdraw was equally unthinkable. They were a mix of adherents to nationalistic Orthodox and Protestant churches as well as some which were in communion with Rome.

THE VATICAN FACTOR

Then there was the Vatican factor and the church's fundamental Christian self-understanding. It is clear from the encyclicals of the years 1936–1940 which we have examined, (Mit Brennender Sorge, Summi Pontificatus, Sertum Laetitiae and the unpublished draft of Humani Generis Unitas), that the Vatican clung to the idea that it was the sole contemporary body authorized by Christ to interpret and to impose divine law in association with other appropriate states and temporal authorities and that the reigning pope was the designated successor of Christ and therefore the designated and sole representative on earth of the Triune God. Nothing was to stand in the way of the exercise of that authority. Nothing. Certainly not the establishment of a state linked by statute to the practice of Judaism. The circumstances of the time provided both the justification and the opportunity to extend and to consolidate that authority and to do so in association with whom ever the reigning pope might bless with a concordat. Several rulers who shared the Vatican's totalitarian philosophy were so blessed but the principal ones were Mussolini and Hitler. Mussolini's importance lay in the fact that he was the exemplary signatory to the Lateran Treaty and, as such, he held the security of the Papal State in the palm of his hand and could, if he wished, reopen the ghastly Roman Question all over again. He must therefore rank first. Hitler's importance lay in two facts: his expansionist course promised the opportunity for additional concordats as he extended his power; and he was the person philosophically most nearly aligned with the Jewish policy of the Vatican and therefore most likely to reduce the influence of the Jewish community to the point at which it was seen to remain only to confirm that it had been succeeded in God's plan by the Church. Hitler therefore must rank very close behind Mussolini.

The Vatican's principal war aims can therefore be summarized as: to secure and extend its temporal authority in association with like-minded totalitarian powers and others which would enter into concordats; to eliminate the philosophical and political challenge of atheistic Communism by encouraging alliances which would ensure the defeat of the Soviet Union; to prevent the establishment of a state linked to Judaism; and to reduce the presence and influence of Jews to the level of significance which it saw as divinely ordained. If these things could be achieved while maintaining peace or international stability at the same time, so much the better. Thus, if the Arab communities in Palestine moved to withdraw from Jerusalem and to allow the Zionists control of the Holy City, either spontaneously or under pressure from Britain, it is absolutely certain that there would have been a re-run of the intrigue of the post World War I period and the negotiations for the Palestine mandate. The greatest threat to the Vatican's self-understanding came not from the Ecumenical Movement and the Protestants or Reformers, not even from atheistic Marxist Communism, but from the idea of Jewish religious authorities having temporal authority and international recognition and influence through a Zionist State. If that idea took root it would challenge the church's claim to a uniquely divine status as God's exclusive earthly institution and the popes' claim to be the successors to Peter, and therefore to Christ as well, and this would reopen the debate over the most fundamental theological question of all: God and the Trinity. Pressure from the Vatican with its concordats, its enormous army of clergy and its highly disciplined people on both sides of the Axis/Western Alliance divide, would be unbearable. From this it is clear that the Vatican's war aims were most likely to be achieved – in fact could only be achieved – if Hitler's philosophy and influence came through the war intact. A devastating war in which National Socialism was shattered was therefore the last thing the Vatican wanted to see. If Hitler could be removed to placate the Western powers while his philosophy remained intact, that would be fine. This was the driving motive behind all of the papal peace initiatives prior to June 1940 and it remained a factor long afterwards.

This meant that if there was going to be a peace initiative in the Middle East it would have to come from the Zionist Movement withdrawing its claims to a National Home for Jews centred on Jerusalem in Palestine. In the circumstances of 1940 the prospects for such an initiative were nil. Zionist leaders had said very clearly and very firmly that their claims to Palestine stood and would be pursued relentlessly. Continued Zionist support for Britain was conditional upon Britain's continued support for Zionism. But although Zionist policies were determining the position of both the Jewish community and Britain, there was certainly no unanimity within the total Jewish community, nor even within the Zionist lobbies and among their diverse groups of supporters. To appreciate this we must briefly go back ten or fifteen years to the period when Hitler and the Nazis were beginning to make their presence felt, and move forward again. Those years show that there was, relatively, more thinking being done within the Jewish community on Hitler's possible impact than within any of the other groups involved and this contributed to the great diversity of views within that community.

According to the 1925 German census which was conducted shortly after Hitler's release from prison and about the time that volume one of Mein Kampf was published, the country's population of 65 million included less than one percent of Jews: 564,379, or about 0.9 per cent. Spread over about 3,000 locations they were organized into 1,800 Kehillot, or bodies corporate, to manage their community affairs and a Central Welfare Organization of German Jews was responsible for coordinating community services. In 1926 this was officially recognized by the government in order to help improve coordination, the provision of services and liaison with aid and international organizations. All Kehillot also related loosely to a broadly representative body, the Central Union of German Citizens of the Jewish Faith (the CV), which had been established in 1893, the year before the Dreyfus Affair burst in Paris, to fight anti-Semitism and to strengthen and protect the community's civic and social status. The CV had an actual membership of 60,000 or 12 percent of the Jewish population, and was the largest Jewish organization in the Weimar Republic. But in addition there was a Zionist group, the ZVfD, which claimed about two percent membership and whose members saw themselves as equally loyal German patriots, although they saw Germany as part of the Diaspora.²

In 1931, with the Nazis growing in parliamentary influence and with their communities subject to increasing anti-Semitic propaganda and physical attacks, the CV and the ZVfD, together, approached Prime Minister Heinrich Brüning for a public affirmation of the rights of Jews. They were rebuffed. The following year a new umbrella organization was set up to represent Jewish federated associations but this proved rather ineffectual, and with attacks on private property and the desecration of synagogues and graveyards worsening, and with violence forcing families from their homes, villages and small towns, the CV submitted a comprehensive 'white paper' to President Hindenburg seeking decisive action. The only outcome was a generalized and noncommittal statement denouncing assaults on German citizens and their political and religious rights.³ With the Jewish population in steady decline due to a low birthrate, a high deaths:births ratio, intermarriage and emigration from the Kehillah – it had fallen by about ten percent since the 1925 census – it was as if there was a general expectation that Jews would gradually disappear altogether and even a barely concealed wish within the church, the Nazi Party and even the government to help them on their way.

The situation deteriorated rapidly upon Hitler's appointment as Chancellor on January 30, 1933. Even on that day measures were taken to begin the closure of Jewish schools. But there is always someone available to respond to a challenge and also on that day Recha Freier set up an Aid to Jewish Youth Society which later became known as Youth Aliyah. The CV acted quickly, organizing a three-pronged Joint Defence Campaign with legal actions through the courts against Nazi boycotts, acts of terror and incitement to violence; educational and public relations programs; and direct electoral opposition to Hitler.

Beyond Germany's borders the general attitude was one of apathy. The world had its own economic and social crises to work through and in any case it was rather tired of hearing about the Jewish question. However moves were quickly underway in some quarters to apply pressure on Hitler through media campaigns and anti-German trade boycotts. Within weeks of his appointment as Chancellor one Boycott Committee was established in the United States and another in Poland, and an informal boycott network sprung up in Britain. The American Jewish Congress was involved. The American Jewish Committee and B'nai B'rith were not. Neither was the British Board of Deputies. Then on March 27 a mass anti-Nazi rally was led by Stephen Wise in Madison Square Garden, New York. Many of those who stayed away from such ventures did so because they feared a prompt backlash from Hitler against the Jewish community in Germany, not because of a lack of concern for his policies or what he had already done. It did not take Hitler long to prove them right. The backlash came on April 1. A strategy had been decided on March 28, the day after the Madison Square Garden rally, and announced in Nazi Party newspaper advertisements on March 29 with banner headlines 'Let Jewry Know Against Whom It Has Declared War.' It was a nationwide boycott against all Jewish businesses and professional offices to be imposed by every branch of the Nazi Party stationing members at the entrances to their stores and offices. (See earlier reference, chapter 18, for more detail.) Neither action can be described as a great success. They both simply served to raise the fear and hatred levels and in the 'tit for tat' exchanges which inevitably follow in such situations Hitler was in a much stronger position to torment his subjects.⁴

The differing emphasis which Zionist leaders placed on Palestine, emigration to other countries, and the rights of German 'domestic Jews' also complicated their relationships with the German authorities once Hitler was in power. Chaim Arlosoroff of the Jewish Agency's political office in Palestine opposed the boycott in his bid to negotiate more visas for travel to Palestine under the Transfer Agreement (over which the Zionist Organization was divided anyway), while Chaim Weizmann maintained that a flood of settlers was not sustainable and that Jews must have the right to stay in Germany as well as to emigrate. At the same time Franz Bernheim led a campaign to the Council of the League of Nations to obtain a ruling that the Jews of Upper Silesia were not subject to Germany's Nuremberg Laws under complicated arrangements which were part of the 1922 Geneva Agreement which had granted the region to Germany. Hitler, in a bid to raise his international acceptance level, agreed to waive the regulations for the term of the Geneva Agreement.⁵ Bernheim and his coreligionists thus won a somewhat pyrrhic victory. When the Geneva Agreement expired in 1937 the Nazis turned the screws on Upper Silesia and later, when the Final Solution was being put into effect, they paid special attention to the region. These issues all meant that the CV (until it was dissolved by the Nazis in 1938⁶) and the Zionist Organization were seen to be running several streams of campaigns with the German authorities: for equality within Germany; for visas to emigrate to Palestine (with and without the Transfer Agreement); for visas to emigrate to other countries; and legal battles in the courts – all with the aid of sophisticated political campaigns, publicity and boycotts overseas.⁷ In turn this meant that the whole Jewish community was open to accusations of playing one authority off against another, of being divided among themselves, of wanting everything in their favor, and of not knowing what their real aims were while their government simply wanted them to stop arguing and to quit the country. So we come to Britain and its war aims.

BRITAIN'S DILEMMA

It was Britain which took the initiative to declare war against Germany when Hitler pursued his expansionist policy in spite of the fact that three of its major settler-dominated dominions (Australia, South Africa and Canada) preferred to see the smaller Central European countries making 'concessions' to Germany – a euphemism for being subjugated by Germany – rather than support a war in Europe. And it is not clear whether the dominions took the stand they did out of an acceptance of the validity of Germany's claims that German speaking people had been unfairly treated under the Treaty of Versailles or out of veiled support for his social and economic policies. However it is clear that at least one of them, Australia, was fearful of being isolated, unprotected and exposed to Japan if Britain fragmented its defence forces by taking action against Germany in Europe. When Hitler moved against the smaller Western European countries it was to protect his supplies and communications lines or to move against those of Britain and not to occupy them as part of his expansion plan. And it was Britain which became more and more isolated and exposed every time Hitler occupied another country or when Britain proposed trading the colonies of other countries for a bit more war preparation time. Thus it becomes evident that it was Britain whose opposition to his policies Hitler had to counter if he was to succeed in implementing those policies.

On that basis it would be reasonable to expect that Britain would have had clearly defined war aims to state when it chose to declare war, to involve a great many other nations which otherwise would have remained neutral in a war which they did not want to fight, to insist on continuing the war when every country, almost without exception, expected it to seek "an understanding" with Hitler which would not have involved heavy territorial loss, and when it had to appeal to the world beyond Europe for support to continue a war which, then, could only lead to quite dramatic domestic loss and international trauma.

But Britain did not have clearly defined war aims which it could justify to the world on the basis of either the moral strength of its own policies or the moral depravity of Hitler's policies. On many occasions the Foreign Office and Cabinet, either as a whole or as groups of ministers, grappled with the issue of war aims and how to present them to the world but they were unable to determine an acceptable statement. The only statements which resembled war aims were devised much later, in collaboration with allies. The first and most notable was the Atlantic Charter which was followed by statements after summit meetings such as the Teheran and Yalta Conferences. At the time when it really needed a statement of war aims to encourage cohesion within Britain and to justify appeals for collaboration and sacrifice by the dominions, colonies and other countries, the government was forced to rely on stirring statements by the new Prime Minister – in particular his speech in the Commons on May 19 and his broadcast, on June 4, already discussed. (See chapter 23, pp. 29–30.)

Britain was unable to state cohesive war aims for several reasons. Basically the world was so divided that it could not say anything which would gain general support. Whatever it said was just as likely to antagonize its potential allies as to encourage their support, or to expose it to charges of hypocrisy because of its own conduct. It could not say to the world “we are going to war in a bid to preserve our position of imperial privilege and to retain control of overseas resources.” That was in fact the nearest thing to truth. It was what Churchill had told the Commons and the nation in his vote of confidence speech on May 12, [see above, chapter 23, p. 26] but it was one thing to say it to Britain and quite another thing to say it to the world. The British government was totally distracted by the perceived need to retain Britain's position of privilege and influence but, as an argument for war that was not acceptable either to its colonies or to the United States which was intent on undermining that position. It could not even make less comprehensive statements such as “we are going to war to protect our present Capitalist system of trading and to preserve the gold standard.” And even though it had officially declared war to honour its partial guarantee to Poland it could not say it was going to war to preserve the integrity of Poland because it had told Hitler he was welcome to Danzig and the Corridor and it had to be prepared to go to war with the Soviet Union as well as Germany because the Soviet Union had also occupied half of the country. It could not rely on general criticism of Hitler's social program because he had copied various pieces of it from other countries of Europe and the United States and had gained quite widespread support as a result. The issue of support for small self-governing countries and self determination for others was out of the question because on one hand it had already encouraged Hitler into Austria and Czechoslovakia as part of its much vaunted appeasement policy and on the other hand it was not prepared to grant such privileges to the smaller countries of its own empire. Just a touch of hypocrisy, plus the fact that it was resisting pressure from the United States to apply those principles to its own empire.

On September 23, 1939, when Halifax asked Cadogan to prepare a brief on Britain's war aims he first noted in his diary that ‘evacuate Poland’ was not acceptable, then wrote: “I suppose the cry is ‘Abolish Hitlerism.’ What if Hitler hands over to Goering!”⁸ In other words, it might be possible to denounce a person but it was not possible to debate his policies.

Certainly, as the Cabinet Committee on the Refugee Problem would confirm at two meetings during the next ten days, it was not possible to make an issue out of the rescue of refugees. The first of those meetings was held on September 25 to determine what instructions should be given to Lord Winterton, Britain's representative on the Inter-Governmental Committee for Refugees (I.G.C.) which had been set up at the Evian Conference. Chaired by Colonial Secretary MacDonald and attended by representatives of all major ministries, the committee resolved that:

as a matter of principle it would be impossible for H.M.G. to assist in any way the exodus of the nationals of a country with which it was at war, and that H.M.G. could not differentiate between refugees and other German nationals. This would apply to territories under German control as well as to Germany proper.

The second meeting, on October 3, decided how that principle would be put into practice. Firstly, if the I.G.C. (and that really meant the United States) intended to continue to negotiate with the German Government for the emigration of German Jews, (which the German Government was keen to achieve), the British Representative would withdraw from the Committee. Secondly, only Jews from outside of enemy or enemy occupied territory would be eligible for the 75,000 certificates to be issued over five years under the White Paper for immigration or refugee admission into Palestine. Among the reasons for those decisions were Colonial Office fears that the Germans could circumvent the blockade and "relieve themselves of so many useless mouths", and that the Jewish Agency may cooperate with the German Government on organizing the "expulsion" of Jews from Poland in order to break Britain's White Paper limit on admissions to Palestine.⁹

Only four days later, on Saturday, October 7, Cadogan was called to the War Cabinet for a war aims discussion in the context of a reply to Hitler's peace address to the Reichstag the previous day. He noted that his advice was to say 'we won't make peace with Hitler.' "Get rid of Hitler. ... Remove him, and there will be such disunity in Germany that they can't win." This, he said, should be coupled with an assurance that "we don't want to dictate a peace." But the Prime Minister, Chamberlain, hesitated at that, and Cabinet knew that the French would not agree, aiming for the re-partitioning of Germany, and the discussion was 'not very useful.' War aims or peace aims should connote three things: what forced us reluctantly to take up arms; what our immediate object may be in righting wrongs; and what we may conceive and aim at as a better order in Europe and the world, he said. Then, showing the frustration he was feeling, Cadogan's diary note indicates that nothing could be resolved without knowing how the warring parties would be grouped, how long the war was likely to last and what the condition of Europe might be at the end of it.¹⁰

Into that super-charged atmosphere were tossed, first, Summi Pontificatus on October 29, 1939, and, second, Sertum Laetitiae, the special encyclical for America, on November 1. (See chapter 23.) They were hardly documents designed to make it easy for Britain to express the motives behind its declaration of war.

Then on May 26, 1940, the new British cabinet, under Churchill, again discussed a statement of war aims. It was the day that Hitler ordered the resumption of the attack on Dunkirk in an effort to thwart the British evacuation when Hitler realized that Britain was not about to sue for peace terms. And it was after President Roosevelt had asked for the British fleet to be ordered to sail to North America on the assumption that Britain faced total defeat and he feared that Hitler could turn the British fleet against the United States, but it was still almost a month before the fall of France. Halifax stated his view that Britain had to face reality, that it had no hope of imposing complete defeat on Germany and that it should therefore consider any proposal which would reasonably safeguard the independence of the empire, provided that the liberty and independence of Britain itself was assured.¹¹ Kilzer reports that Halifax then asked Churchill directly, whether, as Prime Minister, if Britain could get out of the war with its sovereignty assured, and only that, he would agree to such terms. He then quotes Churchill as saying ‘yes’, he would be thankful for Britain to get out of its present difficulties on such terms, provided that it could retain the essential elements of its strength, “even at the loss of some territory”, but he did not expect Hitler to be so considerate.¹² Thus the British government knew, and accepted in principle, that major changes were inevitable, that it was dealing with a problem of ‘damage control’ and that it could not say that it was at war to protect the integrity of the empire. It desperately needed the support of the empire for its own survival. In fact it desperately needed the support of any country which would act in concert with it.

Britain had stumbled into that situation as a consequence of its previous conduct but there is nothing available to us to indicate that the government realized what had happened. Its strategists seem to have only stumbled onto the realization that Britain’s situation was such that the only means available to it to secure allies was to demonstrate that it was in a country’s self-interest to act in concert with Britain. This is the reason that it was also stumbling – perhaps floundering or blundering – from one exercise in manipulation to another and from one half-hearted and insecure alliance to another with countries with which it shared no common bonds. Churchill showed some awareness of that when he wrote in The Gathering Storm: “The disasters which had occurred in Poland and the Baltic States made me all the more anxious to keep Italy out of the war and to build up by every possible means some common interest between us.”¹³ Could it, then, fall back to the well tried motivator – or propaganda strategy – from the Crusades, the Reformation, the early Colonial Era or the Great War? Religion: Christianity, or the Jewish question? Could it, once again, try to make a virtue of its religiosity?

A statement that ‘we are at war to save Christianity, or to carry the Gospel into new lands’, was not acceptable. To begin with, the church had not recovered from the drubbing which it suffered because of its contradictory conduct in World War I. (See above, chapter 20.) Then there was concern about what direction the Vatican might take, especially because of its concordats with Hitler and Mussolini. But the Foreign Office was very conscious of antagonism towards the churches in Asia, of the extent to which Britain would be dependent upon military forces from non-Christian countries, and of the need to avoid antagonizing the governments and people of the critical Muslim Middle East and North Africa. Support for the church and Christianity was therefore virtually a non-issue except to be dribbled out quietly in the WASP (White Anglo-Saxon Protestant) settler dominated communities in the dominions of Australia, New Zealand, and perhaps Canada and South Africa, or as a subversive exercise in Catholic Poland.

What, then, about the Jews? Deep-seated anti-Semitism was widespread but not everyone who had been subjected to anti-Semitic propaganda – and that was virtually everyone in the Western Christian World – had developed hard line anti-Jewish attitudes or tendencies. Would the community respond to appeals for support on humanitarian grounds and ignore sectarian issues? Attitudes are still very difficult to survey and to quantify fifty years after the war, so such research would have been more difficult and less reliable in the late 1930s. However it is reasonable to believe that a relatively small proportion of people in most Christian countries outside of Hitler's immediate sphere of influence would have gone as far as to physically or verbally abuse Jews or even to deliberately snub them. But most people could not avoid being influenced to some extent. They were probably at the point of thinking that "where there is smoke there must be fire" and if some people hate "them" so much, and if the church pours so much vitriol on them, then there must be some valid reason. Therefore, while they may not have taken part in anti-Semitic activities many people would simply keep their distance, perhaps to avoid being 'labelled' by association, and they would certainly not have responded to appeals to go to war to help save the Jews. An attitude of "they got themselves into this mess, they can get out of it" would also have been common, along with sheer disinterest and apathy. Certainly at the domestic level the British Government could not have said: "We are going to war to save the Jews. We will invite mass immigration and you will soon have more Jewish neighbours." Public support would have been nil.

Pressure had begun to mount for the detention and deportation of 'foreign aliens' from Britain even before war was formally declared and immediately the declaration was made tribunals were appointed to register and classify all persons of non-British citizenship. They were classified as either refugees from Nazi oppression or non-refugees and they were placed in one of three categories: 'A', to be interned as a possible security risk; 'B', free but subject to restrictions; 'C' free and unrestricted. Of 73,400 persons registered, 55,500 were classed as refugees and a total of 64,000 were placed in category 'C', free and unrestricted. A disproportionate number of those registered were professionally qualified: 27 per cent of the men and 17 per cent of the women.¹⁴ And of course 80 percent of the refugees were Jewish.¹⁵

CHURCHILL'S DILEMMA

Then the blitzkrieg struck against Holland, Belgium and France on May 11, 1940, the day on which Churchill effectively took office and began to appoint the ministers for his new government. Senior military authorities advised the Home Secretary that in view of the imminent risk of invasion every male "enemy alien" between 16 years and 70 should be removed forthwith from the coastal strip. In an immediate roundup of Germans and Austrians, other than those declared invalid and infirm, 2,200 men were ‘temporarily’ interned. A high proportion of them were Jews who had moved to Britain to avoid persecution under the Nazi regime. They included staff members from both Cambridge University and the London School of Economics as well as men from many other professions. Two days later the net was cast wider and another 2,200 German and Austrian males – all those in category ‘B’ – were interned as well. The roundup was melodramatic, ludicrous and arbitrary, with many distinguished and dedicated anti-Nazi scientists and doctors held under very rigorous conditions.¹⁶

In accordance with the well established conspiracy of silence the term ‘Jew’ was never used in public to describe those who were being rounded up. It would have been very embarrassing indeed to have done so. Only weeks before, Hitler had abandoned a plan to locate three million Jews in reservations in a semi-independent region of Lublin, central Poland, which had been announced in November 1939. (Chapter 23, p. 23) That plan could have proceeded and even been improved through negotiation if Britain had given its ‘nod’ to Hitler that he could annex all of Poland, Czechoslovakia-style, and not only the Danzig Corridor, if there had been agreement to ‘cultural autonomy’ in a ‘rump state’ in Central Poland: in that semi-independent Lublin region. Conditions in Lublin at the time have been described as “intolerable” with masses of deportees in disease ridden forced labour conditions.¹⁷ In other words they were consistent with the circumstances in which the scheme had been devised, but that need not have been the case. However Britain could not give the nod which Hitler wanted unless the Zionist Organization did so also, and that was inconceivable unless Britain also gave its nod to Jewish settlement in Palestine and that was inconceivable because ... Britain was locked in yet again by its self-inflicted crisis in the Middle East.

When the Lublin region scheme was abandoned construction began on the walls which would become the Warsaw Ghetto and Hitler’s version of the roundup continued unabated. The best that can be said for the British version is that it was quite a bit less degrading and without the murderous brutality of Hitler’s version. But the seriousness with which the problem of the ‘aliens’ in Britain was viewed is shown by a paragraph in a memo from Churchill to General Ismay, head of the military wing of the war cabinet secretariat, on May 18.

*Everything must be done to carry out the recommendations for the control of aliens put forward by the Committee and minuted by me on another paper. Action should also be taken against Communists and Fascists, and very considerable numbers should be put in protective or preventive internment, including the leaders. These measures must, of course, be brought before the Cabinet before action.*¹⁸

The initial decision had been taken on May 11. Churchill did not re-appoint the Home Secretary and minister for Home Security, Sir John Anderson, to those posts until the next day, May 12.¹⁹ This means that the decision to proceed with the roundup was taken by the minister in a ‘caretaker’ role. Whether Churchill would have approved of it in the drag-net manner in which it was carried out is problematical. He would certainly have been more conscious than most people that the roundup would ensnare many strenuously anti-Nazi Jews. He insisted that British nationals who were members of antagonistic political groups were to be included in the roundup as well as aliens. And he also insisted that further measures were to be “brought before the Cabinet”, which meant him, rather than just to the minister. The roundup then ran hand in hand with a campaign that has been characterized as ‘the enemy in our midst: the invisible fifth column’ and which appeared to be well orchestrated from official quarters and designed to set the British public against aliens and refugees as well as to justify the internment program. The popular press ran unsubstantiated reports of refugees turned spies and saboteurs, and direct appeals for the public to spy on all aliens. ‘Aliens’ became the scapegoats in a campaign to suppress both the undercurrent of support for Hitler which had underpinned the policy of appeasement, to suppress any continued support for peace negotiations and to recruit Local Defence Volunteers.

At the level of propaganda directed overseas, the problem was even greater. Firstly, the failure of the Evian Conference and the attitudes demonstrated there made it quite apparent that there would be no support for a war effort which was intended to relieve the Jews from oppression. Secondly, there had to be some consistency in Britain’s policy and, in view of the decisions made by the government in September-October, the world would see it as an act of hypocrisy if Britain immediately made the rescue of refugees an aspect of its war aims. In any case, at the time of the fall of France it was not a question of saving the Jews from genocide. Germany’s policy was still based on isolation, oppression, disenfranchisement and, as much as possible, forced emigration. Systematic execution and slaughter had not commenced. And if the British Government could not hope for support for a war to relieve the Jews of oppression it had less hope of support for a program of mass immigration unless it was prepared to provide a lead by either opening its own gates or those of Palestine. It knew that it could not open the gates of Palestine because if it did so the country would soon be aflame from end to end, the entire Middle East would be in turmoil and firmly in Hitler’s camp, the war would be unwinnable and the empire would disintegrate.

In fact Britain saw its position in the Middle East as so critical that it was building even higher barriers to force Europe’s Jews to stay where they were. After the Cabinet Refugee Committee meetings noted above, foreign governments had been advised that they should “institute strict watch of their frontiers against such persons” [Jews trying to break the British embargo], and when Russia occupied the Baltic countries in mid-1940 the Colonial Office asked the Foreign Office to support a policy that Russia should be considered an ‘enemy country’ for purposes of Jewish immigration policy, even though it was, in fact, still neutral. British diplomatic efforts were therefore concentrated on keeping almost the entire Jewish population of Europe where they were for the next three years and there was much talk about the possibility of German agents getting through the net under the guise of Jewish refugees. The Colonial Office had already used that argument in February 1940 in an unsuccessful bid to persuade the Board of the Admiralty to intercept and divert vessels known to be carrying illegal immigrants so that they could be interned without the glare of Jewish and world scrutiny when the vessels arrived at their planned destinations.²⁰ In addition, when the Palestine censors intercepted correspondence which suggested that the German authorities were trying to ‘export’ more Jews by omitting the letter ‘J’ from their passports, the British Ambassador in Belgrade was instructed to ask Yugoslavia to ensure that when transit visas were granted to Jews from other countries their passports were labelled with the letter ‘J’ and that they complied with all British requirements for admission to Palestine.²¹

Thus neither the current treatment of the Jews in Germany nor their possible fate were acceptable issues for either a British statement of war aims or a propaganda campaign and that aspect of the conspiracy of silence had to continue. But the British were obligated to the Jews. They had made a promise which the Zionists were determined to hold them to, and the person who had become the key player, Winston Churchill, had confirmed Britain’s obligation in parliament in July 1937, two years before he was invited back into government. Churchill said:

*It is a delusion to suppose that this [Balfour Declaration] was a mere act of crusading enthusiasm or quixotic philanthropy. On the contrary, it was a measure taken ... in due need of the war with the object of promoting the general victory of the Allies, for which we expected and received valued and important assistance.*²²

Pursuing the same issue, a former President of the Zionist Organization of America, Emanuel Neumann, wrote:

*Britain, hard pressed in the struggle with Germany, was anxious to gain the whole-hearted support of the Jewish people: in Russia on the one hand, and in America on the other. The non-Jewish world regarded the Jews a power to reckon with and even exaggerated Jewish influence in unity. Britain’s need of Jewish support furnished Zionist diplomacy the element of strength and bargaining power which it required to back its moral appeal.*²³

And as Alfred M. Lilienthal points out:

*It was felt that the support of American Jewry at this stage [the critical phase of World War I in 1917] could make a substantial difference to the Allied cause. It was also hoped that the British move would lessen world Jewish hostility toward Russia, and give those Jews who had been active in overthrowing the Czar’s regime a real incentive to keep Russia in the war on the Allied side.*²⁴ *[Another practical consideration was that] the Suez Canal needed a protective base in a nearby territory where “important elements would not only be bound to Britain by every interest but would command the support of world Jewry.”*²⁵

By the time of the fall of France in June, 1940, many people would have believed that Britain’s obligation had been recognized and well discharged, especially in view of the interpretation which Mr. Balfour gave the British Cabinet in 1917 at the time that the Declaration was being debated. His understanding was that:

*... some form of British-American or other protectorate under which full facilities would be given to the Jews to work out their own salvation and to build up by means of education, agriculture and industry a real centre of national culture and focus of national life. It does not necessarily involve the early establishment of an independent Jewish State, which was a matter for gradual development in accordance with the ordinary laws of political evolution.*²⁶

That understanding is complemented by three things. Firstly, the memorandum to Cabinet by Balfour's successor, Lord Curzon, on October 26, 1917, in which he said that the administration [of Palestine] "cannot be Jewish, but should secure to the Jews, but not to the Jews alone, equal civil and religious rights with other elements in the population."²⁷ Secondly, the Churchill White Paper of June, 1922, with statements that: "It is contemplated that the status of all citizens of Palestine in the eyes of the law shall be Palestinian, and it has never been intended that they or any section of them should possess any other juridical status." Further: the Jewish community in Palestine should be able to increase its number by immigration, but such an increase is not to "exceed whatever may be the economic capacity of the country at the time to absorb new arrivals."²⁸ Thirdly, advice to the House of Lords by the Colonial Secretary, the Duke of Devonshire, in June 1923, that while the intention from the beginning had been to make a national home for the Jews, "every provision has been made to prevent it from becoming in any sense of the word a Jewish state or a state under Jewish domination."²⁹

However, while many people would have regarded Britain's obligation to the Jews as having been discharged it is apparent that the Zionist Organization did not. Neither did Churchill. The address quoted above was referred to in connection with the tabling of the Peel Commission Report, shortly after Churchill testified before the Commission and called (in somewhat intemperate language) for all of Palestine to be handed over to the Jews.

The possibility cannot be ignored that in the circumstances at the time, with widespread expectation that Britain would seek a peace settlement with Germany, Churchill, in his new capacity as Prime Minister at the time of the fall of France, was having great difficulty distinguishing between a number of factors. One was Britain's national obligations to the Jews in terms of the Balfour Declaration. Another was his deeply held beliefs and genuine commitment to Zionism. And a third was his personal obligations to those members of the Jewish community whose political and financial support had enabled him to continue in parliament and to return to high office. (See above, chapter 23, pp. 24–25.) Whatever may have been his final line of reasoning, the available evidence points heavily to the conclusion that the decision to continue the war after the fall of France was essentially taken by Churchill who bulldozed it through Cabinet.

However the question must be considered: would Churchill have forced that decision upon the government if circumstances had been different? If the countries of the White Western Christian World had opened their arms – or at least their gates – to the Jews of Europe who were their historic kith and kin in every sense except religion, would he have made a different decision?

The bulk of the positive external pressure in support of that decision appears to have come from the Zionist lobby which insisted that Hitler had to be eliminated in order to relieve the Jewish community of the oppression which his regime was imposing. It is clear that they intended to fight, and to fight hard, for both a National Homeland in Palestine and freedom from oppression in Europe. But if they could not have a National Home on the basis of their definition of that homeland, they would insist on every effort being made to ensure that they could live in peace and freedom in the countries of Europe which were their homelands. They could not countenance the idea of a peace settlement in which Hitler could remain to impose his oppressive policies in Central and Eastern Europe or anywhere at all. But the negative pressure in support of that decision was the fact that Evian failed because the countries of the White Western Christian World had refused to open their arms or their gates.

The Jewish community in general knew the nature of the beast who was opposed to them and whom they were opposing. They realized that the level of oppression could only get worse if general war continued and they had reason to anticipate an attempt at genocide. But it was by no means certain that such a program would be implemented because 'The Final Solution' had not been devised at that stage, it would not be devised and implemented for another year until Hitler had exhausted all attempts to reach an accommodation with Britain, and there was always the possibility that he could be removed or eliminated at any time. They were not to know that by their action in pressing for a continuation of hostilities they were contributing to a worsening of the situation on an unbelievable scale. At that time, although the Zionist Movement had rallied a great deal of support within the Jewish community for its policy of insistence on Palestine or nothing, there was still deep division within the world wide Jewish community on whether that was the correct (or best) policy to pursue.

Thus, if either the Western Christian World had made Europe's Jews welcome (or at least been prepared to accept them) or if they had anticipated the path that anti-Semitism and Hitler would take, it is probable that they would have accepted mass resettlement elsewhere and would not have insisted on Palestine. This would have meant that even Churchill would have been free to negotiate with Hitler, knowing full well that the Jewish community was safe and that the Fuhrer did not wish to bring down the British Empire. The armistice negotiations would then have focussed on other socio-economic and political issues in a totally different environment. It would not have, and it could not have, solved 'the Jewish Question' or the trouble in the triangle, but the Holocaust would have been circumvented at that point and there may have been sufficient incentive for the church to rethink its role in the crisis and its theology and the process of unraveling the trouble in the triangle may have been initiated. And if, as happened anyway, the church proved itself unable to begin that rethink, the situation would have simply continued to degenerate until the trouble in the triangle reached 'critical mass.'

But the church and the Western Christian World did not go down that track. They, and Hitler together, continued to pursue policies and decisions which compounded the crisis. Neither they nor the Jewish community grasped the nature of the trouble in the triangle any more clearly than the bulk of their Muslim colleagues. No one had bothered to take the relationship between the prophetic roles of Maimonides, Muhammad and the Messiah seriously. Each of the religious communities in the triangle, and especially the church, was committed to the correctness of its particular understanding and it was too late for a rethink. The situation was far too volatile. The plot of the Qur'anic Night Journey had to be played right out. And the primary responsibility rests not with either the Jewish or Muslim communities but with the Christian church and its adherents whose forbears caused the problem and whose subsequent actions had compounded it.

Or was it too late? Britain stood alone while the world slid into a twelve month pause for reflection before Hitler would try to implement his ‘final solution.’ We can now follow events to see how that pause was spent and whether the implementation of ‘the final solution’ – the Holocaust – could have been avoided. But before we do, there are those two questions to reflect on. Was there any need for Britain to stand alone? What would have been the consequences if Churchill had opted for an armistice instead of the evacuation of Dunkirk?

As we ponder those questions it is important to keep it in mind, that religion and the church were a consideration in the war aims of each of the major players: Germany, Russia, Japan, the United States, the Zionists, the Arabs and Britain. To those can be added the Vatican as the principal church player, and Italy as the presumed chief protector of the Vatican since Pope Pius XI and Mussolini had, in the words of the pope, “given God back to Italy and Italy back to God” through their Lateran Treaty of February 1929 and the Vatican Concordat (See above, chapter 20, p. 25.) However, it is regrettable that religion and the church were a factor in all of those war aims not because of the good things that the church had done during its long history or because the world was enjoying the fruits of the Messianic Era, but because of the destructive things which it had done and the consequences of its self-understanding. Thus, although we have now noted that the decision to continue the war after the fall of France was essentially determined on the basis of Zionism, we have also noted in previous chapters that the development of modern Zionism is a consequence of the church’s self-understanding and the abuse of its position and it therefore follows that it is with the church and not with the Zionist or Jewish communities that the final responsibility for the decision must rest.

At the time that the decision was made to evacuate the BEF, May 26, 1940, Hitler had gained control of Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland (half of which he had conceded to the Soviet Union under their treaty), Denmark, Norway, Holland, Belgium and a sliver of France equal to four percent of its land mass. Italy, Hitler’s principal treaty partner, had designs on Yugoslavia for its resources,³⁰ the French Alps and Provence, Gibraltar and a slice of Spain to go with it as well as North Africa, but it had not yet entered the war and acquired any territory. Hitler’s other European treaty partner, the Soviet Union, in addition to its half of Poland, had taken three small bites out of Finland – with great difficulty! His Asian treaty partner, Japan, was taking full advantage of China’s weakened position with Britain’s partial withdrawal to consolidate its position on the Asian mainland after the serious setback which it suffered when the German-Soviet Non-aggression Pact was signed.

HITLER’S PAUSE

Hitler certainly expected Britain to sue for peace even though its prime minister was determined to carry on. He expected either that the cabinet would over-rule Churchill or that the government would fall and Churchill’s successor would propose an armistice. Is that, perhaps, why he ordered the pause in the battle at Dunkirk which actually provided the ‘window of opportunity’ which the Allies needed to take the steps towards an armistice? Was he expecting that they would sue for peace rather than use it to secure the evacuation?

Controversy raged about Hitler’s reasons for ordering that halt. At about the same time he foreshadowed, in conversation with his generals, the partial demobilization of the Reich Army. There is no doubt that Hitler knew of the parlous state of Britain’s defences and finances as indicated by Churchill’s letter to Roosevelt, even though he did not know the precise details, or about the letter. Therefore, irrespective of whether the intelligence reports available to German command had been accurate, and irrespective of whether he had been determined to knock Britain out of the war instead of negotiating a settlement or had wanted to put himself in the strongest possible negotiating position, he would have been expected to order his forces to press home their advantage without delay. The key question, then, is: why did Hitler, supported by General Rundstedt and Goering, order a halt to the panzer advance three days after the Somme River celebration? Other German generals were shocked and objected violently to the decision just when they were poised for a knock-out blow. Hitler knew that Labor leader and cabinet member Clement Attlee had publicly proposed peace discussions in November 1939, that the British government was still divided on the issue of a separate peace in spite of their dynamic new leader, and that the public was naturally very dispirited. His chances of a knock-out blow would probably never be as good again if he let this opportunity pass.

Some commentators suggest that the order to halt was consistent with Hitler’s want to encourage armistice negotiations, his admiration for things British (other than Churchill!), his want to have the British empire continue as a partner empire, and his expectation that a reprieve for a major part of the Allied forces would ensure that Britain agreed to give him a free hand in Europe.³¹ However Shirer believed from his investigations that the order resulted basically from tactical considerations raised by both Rundstedt and Goering,³² although he also notes that historian Liddell Hart attributes the other view (the want to encourage an armistice) to General Blumentritt.³³ Historian Martin Gilbert supports the tactical considerations view, saying that the order was first issued by Rundstedt on his own authority on the evening of May 23 to reduce German casualties in view of Goering’s confidence that the air force could play a decisive role in the battle, and that Hitler simply confirmed the order next day.³⁴ But in his memoirs Churchill cites statements by General Halder in which he attributed the order to Hitler personally, and said the Fuhrer intervened out of fear that the armoured formations could not handle the terrain and should not be sacrificed.³⁵

Hitler was not expecting, nor planning, to fight a full scale war indefinitely. This is shown quite clearly by his conversations with Mussolini and Count Ciano in Munich on June 18 when they met to discuss the French armistice. Ciano noted that Hitler clearly wanted “to act quickly to end it all ... (he) is now the gambler, who has made a big scoop and would like to get up from the table, risking nothing more. Today he speaks with a reserve and a perspicacity which, after such a victory, are really astonishing.”³⁶ If he had been planning a protracted war Hitler would certainly not have foreshadowed partial demobilization. It is therefore probable that tactical considerations coincided with his want to bring Britain to the negotiating table and encouraged him, or provided the justification for him to issue the order to pause. But nothing was further from Churchill's mind than negotiation. He had consistently said there should be no deal involving either the return of Germany's colonies or a free hand for Hitler to do as he wished with the people of Europe. He was determined that Britain would fight to retain its empire intact, former German colonies and all ... and to ensure that Hitler could not impose his 'social policies' on Britain, Europe or the world.

This conclusion explains Churchill's extremely careful and consistent choice of words for his key speeches to parliament and his broadcast. He did not talk of 'anti-Semitism' or 'Jews' at all. He talked of Czechs and Poles and Danes and Dutch, of "wronged and enslaved states and peoples" – but he did not talk of Jews. He used terms such as 'the odious apparatus of Nazi rule', 'monstrous tyranny', 'the lamentable catalogue of human crime', 'shattered states and bludgeoned races', 'the foulest and most soul destroying tyranny', 'the nightmare of Nazidom', and, 'the long night of barbarism ... unbroken even by a star of hope.' His play on words was excellent. Was it the Christian symbol, the Christmas star, or was it the Jewish symbol, the Star of David, to which he was alluding? And there was 'no survival for all that the British Empire has stood for.' But he did not talk of anti-Semitism or oppression of Jews. He talked of the need 'to rescue ... mankind', 'in God's good time', of 'rescue and liberation', 'a miracle of deliverance', and 'mankind moving forward towards its goal.' But he did not talk about the need to rescue the Jews.

Churchill was using Chamberlain's 'conspiracy of silence' technique with even greater effectiveness. He knew just as well as any of the appeasement negotiators and any of those who had been struggling to draft a statement of war aims that to say "we have got to save the Jews" or "we are doing this in response to Jewish demands" would have invoked a negative response. While the subject of their conspiracies of silence was the same, 'the Jewish Question', Chamberlain and Churchill had quite different aims. The aim of Chamberlain's concealment was to avoid Britain having to fight a war. The aim of Churchill's concealment was to ensure that it continued to fight a war. However whichever of two basic decisions Britain took, whether to continue its war with Germany or to negotiate a peace settlement, its decision had very important implications for many countries in and adjacent to Europe and, where colonies of European powers were involved, countries well beyond Europe.

In the first case, 'the armistice or knock-out option,' (a decision by Britain to negotiate an armistice from a position of near-defeat for both its own and France's forces at Dunkirk), other countries would have had to decide whether to recognize Hitler as virtual master of non-Soviet Europe. If they wanted to have an argument with Hitler, or oppose his policies and his demands or resist the demands of his treaty partner, Mussolini, they would have had to do so without the possibility of treaty intervention by Britain, France, or the United States which was firmly committed to staying out of a European war. The only possible substantial treaty partner for the smaller countries was the Soviet Union and in view of the fact that Germany already had a non-aggression pact with the Soviet Union the negotiation of such treaties would have been very complex indeed. They therefore would have had to consider what concessions they were prepared to make to Hitler to retain national independence or, similarly, what concessions they were prepared to make to the Soviet Union if they decided to seek Soviet support. However the Soviet Union had no one to turn to, except to do what Britain had been doing and to regard its smaller neighbours adjoining Germany as ‘buffer states.’ It had to fend for itself.

But in the second case, ‘the drawn out war option,’ (a decision by Britain to continue the war) the decision carried a completely different set of implications for countries around the world. It became necessary for other countries – allies (even including France), enemies, dominions and colonies alike – to consider their positions very carefully. They had to assess what each of the belligerents, Britain, France and Germany, might do to protect their positions, where and how they might strike against their opponent(s), what they might do to ensure supplies of the vast resources they would now require to fight their war, and what they might do to prevent their opponent(s) from gaining access to such supplies. Then they had to consider three broad issues. The first was whether they were directly or indirectly threatened by one or more of the belligerents and their own defence requirements and, in the case of France (and Britain), whether it could depend on the unqualified support of its colonies. The second was the nature and extent of their obligations to other countries, either under treaties, imperial decisions or by virtue of ethnic or other relationships, and whether to cooperate fully under those obligations. The third was their opportunities, either commercial or political, and, if they were so inclined, whether to take advantage of another country’s weakness.

Depending on how they assessed those matters, each country then had to determine whether to align itself with one belligerent or another, or whether to declare neutrality. For some countries the final decision was easy. For others it was difficult and painful. Thus, we are now able to consider, briefly, some of the probable consequences if Britain had withdrawn or was knocked out at that point, before we consider what actually happened as a consequence of its decision to fight on.

The war could have stopped at Dunkirk either because the German armies continued to a knock-out blow against the French and British armies instead of pausing, or if the British government had opted for an armistice on May 26, 1940, instead of commencing the evacuation of the Allied forces. Everyone expected that Britain would sue for peace and that when it did so, France would do likewise. No other country in Europe would have been in a position to oppose Germany except Russia – his reluctant treaty partner and deferred target. The United States would not have entered the war. The political climate already discussed makes that perfectly clear. It was expected that negotiations would then begin over colonies, territorial claims and spheres of influence. Hitler would have been virtual master of Europe and Mussolini, content to share the glory from within his shadows, would have pursued the demands which he was nurturing. Britain was expected to “return” all or at least some of Germany’s former colonies in Africa and the Pacific, with bonuses. France would have paid a very high price either in North African colonies or in border negotiations.

The situation for the minor powers on the Continent was much more complicated. What additional territories would have been ceded, Munich-style, or demanded and annexed in line with Hitler's plans for Lebensraum must now be a matter of conjecture. The Soviet Union had less reason than the Western Allies to bargain with Hitler, except that it had no 'natural allies' on which to call and this may have tended to make it more open to reasonable treaty negotiations with its smaller neighbours which provided a buffer between it and Germany. But the Soviet leaders knew that if Britain withdrew or was knocked out, Germany would be in a greatly strengthened position, Hitler would not find solace in Lebensraum short of its territory and, with or without allies or buffers, it would sooner or later have to defend itself against Germany's onslaught. The extent of the double-dealing and the number of contradictory treaties which had been made, exposed and broken during Europe's modern history period suggest that the prior existence of the German-Soviet treaty would have been no real obstacle to the negotiation of new treaties. Certainly that treaty proved to be no obstacle to Hitler's precipitate invasion of the Soviet Union after he had been thwarted by Britain.

But for the minor powers of non-Soviet Europe to turn to the Soviet Union for support would have automatically involved recognition of the legitimacy of the Soviet Communist economic and political philosophy and system, and probably some loss of sovereignty even if it did not require the substantial adoption of the Soviet systems. That would have brought considerable domestic pressures into play and it is most likely that they would have chosen what they saw as the lesser of two evils: negotiation with Hitler, making whatever territorial, trading and social policy concessions they believed were consistent with their national integrity and independence. If they had chosen to negotiate with the Soviet Union with a consequent rise in its international influence, the United States would have become even more isolated as the principal White Western Christian Capitalist power. In that case the pattern of the confrontation between the Capitalist and Communist systems would have assumed a completely different character concurrently with the reshaping of the non-European colonial world.

Those countries which could not avoid falling within Hitler's sphere of influence, including the Western European countries which were already occupied, would have had little choice than to conform to Hitler's social program which would have included, of course, the expulsion of all Jews. On the basis of this scenario, given Hitler's record of very successful territorial gains by playing the ethnic community game, Germany would have been in an even stronger position by the time that he decided to confront the Soviet Union. The colonial reorganization would have proceeded under the influence of the counties of the tripartite agreement, Germany, Italy and Japan. Similarly, it is clear from the evidence of the Evian Conference, the Vatican's attitude up to that time and its enormously powerful position because of its concordats with all of the totalitarian states and several of the others, the states which would have had to confront Hitler would have been in no position to reject his social policies. He would have been able to impose his plan for the expulsion of all Jews across much but not all of Europe. The Jewish exodus from non-Soviet Europe would have continued and with Hitler's closer ties with the Arab nations any prospect of the establishment of a Zionist state in Palestine would have receded into the background. But with continuing persecution of Jews, Zionist aspirations would not have been dampened and neither the Jewish Question nor the trouble in the triangle would have receded at all. It would have bubbled along until some other circumstance brought it to a climax.

The countries on the fringe of Hitler's sphere of influence would have been in a position to negotiate with him in such matters as economic concessions or agreements, and social policy. Can we assess how they would have responded? Yes, with a good degree of confidence, by reference to the proceedings of the Evian Conference and the decisions taken by the countries represented at it; the conduct of the Vatican and its agencies; and records of prevailing political and social attitudes. All of those indicators lead inexorably to the conclusion that while there would have been much angst over economic concessions, almost all of the non-Soviet countries concerned would have been quite content to accept Hitler's social program ...except probably the Scandinavian block and Britain once Churchill was in the chair.

The Zionist bid for the establishment of a Jewish state in Palestine would have remained a matter of record until circumstances brought it to the fore again at a later date. Certainly the 'Jewish question' would not have been resolved. Non-Soviet Europe's Jewish community – virtually all of it and not only a small remaining portion of it – would have been scattered far and wide in an increasingly anti-Semitic environment. The question of the development of Bira-Bidzhan as a Jewish enclave, with the possibility that it could eventually gain the status of a self governing republic within the Soviet Union, would have therefore become a major issue. But one way or another the vast majority of the Jewish community would have been concentrated in either the United States or the Soviet Union, flexing its political muscle increasingly in both countries.

The Vatican would have felt well satisfied with its concordats with Hitler, Mussolini and each of the other totalitarian leaders, and it would have been able to pursue additional concordats almost at will. It would have also felt well justified in the policies towards Jews and Judaism which it had been pursuing so relentlessly and therefore much the same tensions which precipitated the rise of Zionism in Europe would have been exported throughout the world. The Zionist bid for the establishment of a Jewish State in Palestine would therefore not have remained only a matter of record for very long. It would have been back on the agenda very quickly. At the same time, Hitler's support for the Arabs in the Middle East would have lifted Muslim morale, not only there but elsewhere as well. The relationship between the three Abrahamic Messianic faiths therefore would have come under more strain and the trouble in the triangle would not have been dissipated. It would have been aggravated, especially with the relationship between the Reformed, Orthodox and Catholic churches being skewed even more.

The weakened positions of Britain, France, Holland and Belgium would have encouraged their colonies to apply more pressure for either independence or greater self government, so that the decolonization process would have been accelerated throughout Asia and Africa, and Japan would have been encouraged to pursue economic leadership or dominance of the Asia-Pacific region, much to the dismay of the United States. Whether Japan would have, in those changed circumstances, sought to impose its imperial status throughout the region is highly debatable. It is a question more easily left in the too-hard basket. In any case, as a consequence of those changes the countries of Asia and Africa would have been very happy to strengthen their economic ties with Germany which had precipitated the changes. But the evidence from their subsequent actions suggests that they would not have cooperated in his social policies. In any case the redrawing of the world colonial map would have commenced with collaboration between Germany, Italy and Japan. Britain, France and Holland could not possibly have retained their grips on their colonies and their resources.

In addition Hitler would have been able to pursue his push for Lebensraum at Russia's expense, uninhibited by a war on his western flank. Whether territorial and social policy 'compromises' could have been reached between Nazi Germany and the Communist Soviet Union short of war is highly unlikely, especially as the Soviet Union would have then been home to one of the two great Jewish communities. The United States would not have wanted to become involved in such a war and one way or another there would have been a titanic struggle between the two great Continental powers which, together, although diametrically opposed to each others' socio-economic policies, represented the most direct challenges to the church and its amorphous Western Christian gel. At that stage, the United States had only limited capacity to influence the course of events in the other continents, but the spotlight would have shifted firmly onto its future role. It dominated the twin continents of the Americas, and, as already noted, it would have been geographically and increasingly economically isolated between Europe and Africa to its east and from Asia to its west by the vast expanses of the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans. Its self-understanding as the New Israel was still intact, or even reinforced by the events in Europe and Asia, and it was home to the other of the two great Jewish communities.

The strategic analyses which would have been available to the British government at short notice when it was confronted by the Dunkirk crisis would have been limited basically to the immediate impact on Britain and its ability to hold its empire together. This is apparent from the nature of the brief report which Churchill sought from the Chiefs of Staff and which was the basis of the evacuation order which was issued on May 27. They would not have been concerned with implications for other countries except as they may have indirectly, but strategically, impacted on Britain. They would certainly not have been asked for, nor would they have had any reason to volunteer, as assessment of the impact on interfaith relations and the consequent political complications. However their previous reports had given a very good indication of the likely course of events, and it is also apparent from Churchill's speech in the Commons one week later (chapter 23, p. 31) that he had a better understanding of the wider implications of the situation than those around him. Hitler had gained control of Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Denmark, Norway, Holland, and Belgium in less than two years. He had treaty arrangements with Italy, Russia and Japan, plus the Vatican. He had friendly relations with a number of other governments and he had only one major power against him. Great Britain. If there was an armistice and peace negotiations at that time he did not have to gain physical control of territory beyond Europe for his influence in the other continents to be greatly enhanced. There was that one other major power which he would have to keep in the neutral corner. The United States. Thus on May 26, 1940, Hitler had good reason to believe that he was well on his way to achieving his paramount aim: the final solution to the Jewish question.

But Britain under the leadership of Churchill did not invoke an armistice and sue for peace. It decided to fight on and that decision changed the 'rules' of the war game decidedly. In line with the issues outlined under 'the second case' above, that decision made it necessary for other countries – whether allies, enemies, dominions, colonies or otherwise disinterested parties – to consider their positions. They had to thoroughly review their relationships to each of the parties already involved in the war; whether they were likely to be asked directly to 'contribute' to one war effort or another; whether their own interests and security may be directly or indirectly affected by the continuation and expansion of the war; existing treaty obligations and possible conflicts of interest; whether they would cooperate fully with requests from treaty partners or imperial masters, or whether they would take advantage of weaknesses exposed by the turmoil; and, of course, their own defence requirements. At first it appeared that they would have a very short time indeed to consider their positions. The war in France continued for only four weeks before the nation was crushed.

So France had fallen. ... Under its armistice with Germany, the northern three fifths of France was occupied and placed under military rule while a French Government, led by Petain, was set up at Vichy to administer the unoccupied zone in accordance with the terms which Hitler required in the armistice, and the French overseas territories. There were a number of ministers of the former government who left France when the decision was taken to quit the war. Their intention was to set up a government in exile. Similarly, General Charles De Gaulle organized the Free French Army from exile in London. But the cold hard facts could not be denied. France had been defeated decisively and Hitler had granted it an armistice on terms which were far less onerous than those which had been imposed on Germany under the Treaty of Versailles.

Similarly, in spite of the dramatic changes in the circumstances during the four weeks since the pause at Dunkirk, Hitler told his aides that Britain could still keep its colonies under the peace treaty which he anticipated making. He then proceeded with his peace overtures to Britain through Goering and their Scandinavian businessman friend Dahlerus, whom the British Foreign Office disdained as an amateur and did not take sufficiently seriously as a personal emissary from the Hitler and Goering. And having ordered a halt to the German advance against the beleaguered British forces at Dunkirk on May 24,³⁷ in anticipation of immediate peace negotiations, thus enabling their evacuation much to the amazement and annoyance of his commanders, he also proceeded with the demobilization of thirty five divisions of Germany's army which he had announced in May.³⁸ These were hardly the actions of a person intent on crushing his adversary or, as Petain had put it, 'wringing the chicken's neck.' Hitler was supremely confident of reaching a peace accord with Britain. Thus the period from the fall of France to Hitler's invasion of Russia is critical. It provided the opportunity for a rethink on whether the war was really necessary, but a rethink did not take place. We have looked at the motives driving each of the major participants, so we can now look closely at the events of that critical pause, keeping in mind Hitler's standing, those diverse motives, the series of peace overtures which Hitler made to Britain, Britain's official response to them and the way in which some of the major players tried to respond to them

THE REALITY AFTER FRANCE

When France fell on June 22 Britain's roundup of 'aliens' was immediately extended to include males up to age 70 in category 'C' (free and unrestricted) and 13,000 of them were interned within three weeks. The public outcry changed to "intern the lot" and "ship them overseas."³⁹ Concerned at the drain on resources and the distraction involved in servicing and guarding thousands of internees and prisoners – for that is what those who admitted Fascist or Nazi connections became – the British Government approached each of Canada, Australia, South Africa and New Zealand to request that they each accept custody of some of them. Canada promptly agreed to accept a total of 7,000 (4,000 internees and 3,000 prisoners) and Australia agreed to receive a total of 6,000.

In the United States there were a series of very strong lobby groups advising congressmen and the president that it was in America's interests to join the war against Hitler, notably the American Jewish Committee and the Anti-Nazi Council, and to help marshal public opinion, the administration-sponsored Committee to defend America by Aiding the Allies, and Roosevelt manipulated his informal structures to keep supplies flowing to those allies, setting up a National Defense Advisory Commission as well.⁴⁰ However there was still no indication that the US Administration would commit forces to war and it was under strong pressure not to do so from the oil industry, other export trade industries, and both the German and Irish lobbies. Thus, in July, doing a bit more juggling, Morgenthau deliberately camouflaged Britain's growing balance of payments crisis⁴¹ and Roosevelt changed a draft speech, deleting a reference to US opposition to war and saying instead that no American men would fight in European wars.⁴² In view of that, many authorities either based their immediate decisions on the assumption of an early armistice in Germany's favour or sought to take advantage of an association with the winning team.

At the same time, Hitler took advantage of an enormous boost in his personal standing and that of the German military machine to pause and regroup. He had two immediate options: an invasion of Britain from very close quarters, or a return to his original plan of eastern expansion through an invasion of Soviet Russia under the cover of his non-aggression pact with Stalin. He could combine either of those courses with a swift push either through the Balkans and the Caucasus or through North Africa to secure the oil resources of the Middle East. If he did that he could eliminate the Jewish National Homeland in Palestine at the same time, knowing that he would have strong support from the Arab states. And he could also pursue his final solution without too much interference.

While Hitler planned his next move he had good reason to agree with Petain's view that Britain would be out of the war within a few weeks. He had heard Atlee's call for peace talks in May, and about the same time, following the debacle in Norway, he had received feelers from the British Foreign Office through envoys in Switzerland about the terms for a peace settlement. In June, while the terms of the French armistice were still being negotiated and Churchill was bidding for a Franco-British Union, the Foreign Office again initiated peace feelers with the full knowledge and support of Lord Halifax, this time through envoys in Sweden who were acting with the full support of their king.⁴³ When Churchill learned of it he rebuked Halifax and scuttled the initiative.⁴⁴

Clearly, in view of the depth of opposition to Churchill's policy of pursuing war at all costs at home, the best way for Hitler to ensure a free hand in Europe was to end any prospect of an Anglo-US alliance against him, and he could do that by making it easy for an alternative government in Britain to agree to peace terms. He had already told some of his aides on June 2 that he would make peace with Britain even without the return of all of Germany's former colonies.⁴⁵ But he had to be able to negotiate from a position of strength. He finally gained Mussolini's declaration of war in alliance with Germany on June 10 (after much haggling in Rome over the advantages of neutrality or even a pact of non-aggression with Britain and after Hitler had rebuffed Mussolini's 'offer' to declare war on June 5 in order that Germany's glory from a swift defeat of France would not be diluted⁴⁶) and this had greatly strengthened his hand in relation to the Vatican and its dealings with the British and Roosevelt, but he was in no doubt about the level of Churchill's determination. That had been established by the vigour of the new PM's speech to the Commons on June 6.

During the three or four weeks following that speech there had been a series of contacts between London and Berlin via 'other channels' in the name of 'the Peace Party' but it is unclear which of these were genuine attempts to broker a peace agreement in spite of Churchill's opposition, and which ones were 'a blind' to keep Hitler negotiating and give Britain a bit of breathing space. In the midst of those exchanges, on June 26, the British cabinet received and considered a 'flash' message indicating that Hitler was to offer exceptional terms for a settlement. Whatever were the contents of that message, Churchill's anti-Hitler stand hardened. He rejected it outright. There has been speculation, not confirmed by those who were privy to it, that the 'exceptional terms' were a cease fire and immediate negotiations for an armistice if Churchill stood down as PM.⁴⁷ Perhaps he was buoyed by news from Washington that day that Morgenthau had invited a British delegation for talks on the 'quandary' of how to finance the arms which Britain required. There had also been talks about Britain trading technical and scientific secrets and patents, such as the Rolls-Royce Merlin engine designs, for cash or goods so there was some hope that Britain's financial mess, which had finally become apparent to cabinet, might be eased.⁴⁸

Two days later, June 28, two more messages were received. One was advice from Tokyo that Britain's requirements for Japanese cooperation in an embargo against Russia and Germany were too broad and negotiations based on the MEW plan had been abandoned.⁴⁹ Cabinet had to consider that in the context of Japan's demand that the Burma Road be closed and Britain was again caught in a conflict of interest. To close the road would improve relations with Japan but it could either drive China "into the hands of Russia" or force it to make a settlement with Japan which would be to Britain's further disadvantage and it would also alienate American public opinion with repercussions in both the Far East and Europe.⁵⁰ The other message was one in confidence from the Vatican via Berne (one of three addressed to each of Churchill, Hitler and Mussolini) offering papal mediation "for a just and honourable peace." Churchill no doubt assumed that any papal mediation would be consistent with the Vatican's war aims. The offer was rebuffed in like manner. Churchill wrote to Halifax saying: "I hope it will be made clear to the Nuncio [the pope's ambassador] that we do not desire to make any inquiries as to the terms of peace with Hitler, and that all our agents are strictly forbidden to entertain any such suggestions."⁵¹

While there was a wide range of peace feelers being 'floated' Churchill had ships on his mind: mainly battleships, but others, too. The first of the new wave of British 'convict ships', the Arandora Star, was being readied to sail and it left England for Canada on July 1 carrying 1,500 unwanted 'aliens' and other internees. It was torpedoed and sank off the west coast of Ireland next morning, July 2, with heavy loss of life. The internees who survived knew not what their fate was to be, but they would be re-embarked a week later on the Dunera which carried a total of 2,542 internees, most of whom had become refugees from Nazism or Fascism on racial or religious grounds: the flotsam and jetsam of war.

Reports of the sinking of the Arandora Star proved a public relations nightmare for the British government but they soon slipped from the public mind when, next day, July 3, Churchill ordered the seizure of all French vessels in the English ports of Portsmouth and Plymouth and the sinking of the major French naval fleet at Oran. The implications were far reaching. The Chiefs of Staff feared that Britain might even find itself at war with France, and General Dill noted that this made it even more imperative for Britain to avoid taking risks in East Asia. At that time Churchill did not know that Roosevelt was monitoring the situation in South East Asia very closely by courtesy of Lt. Commander Arthur McCollum, head of the Far East Desk of Navy Intelligence, Washington, and the special Japanese communications interception unit which the US Navy had set up, and that he was in a position to 'jockey' or to 'play' the actions and reactions of each of the other countries involved to the best advantage of the United States. He probably did not know either that Roosevelt was especially interested in the continuing pressure which Japan was applying to Portugal to obtain access to resources through Timor, and to France for access to the French colonies of Indochina.⁵² But in anticipation of French retaliation, Churchill ordered a very risky move which greatly weakened Britain's authority in the East immediately – the cancellation of plans for an Eastern fleet. Australia and New Zealand were advised that the fleet which Churchill had undertaken to send to Singapore, as a cynical ploy to get them to send troops to Europe, would not be despatched.⁵³ That decision was taken against Craigie's barrage of apocalyptic advice that the Foreign Office was wrong if it thought Japan could not fight wars against China and Britain at the same time. He insisted that if Britain continued along that course the chances of war with Japan were more than 50 per cent.⁵⁴

Churchill's aim in ordering the sinking of the French fleet was to prevent the Vichy Government from using it in the Nazi war plan. In fact only three capital ships were sunk in the horrific but brief bombardment, with the loss of 1,250 lives, while seven ships escaped to France, but the effect on international relations was dramatic and complex. The Chiefs of Staff fears were well founded: the Vichy Government promptly broke off all diplomatic relations with Britain and was forced even further into the Nazi camp, and a declaration of war was only averted when the French Ambassador in London resigned rather than face the task of handing it over.⁵⁵

At that time the French administration in both Syria and French Indo-China supported the Vichy government, and if Hitler had been inclined to do so, Germany was in a very strong position to influence not only Arab relations with Britain but also the direction of colonial policy and decolonization in the Far East. The fall of France, Italy's entry into the war and fears of Turkey's ambitions in northern Syria and Iraq had, in fact, prompted the Iraqi government to establish secret contacts with the Axis powers. An Iraqi emissary, Naji Shawkat, obtained a letter of introduction from the Mufti to the German Minister, Von Papen, in Ankara which, being signed on behalf of the Arab Higher Committee for Palestine, gave him pan-Arab status in a bid to encourage German support for Syrian independence. When they met on July 5, only two days after the sinking of the French fleet, Shawkat handed Von Papen the Mufti's letter of introduction and greetings to the Fuhrer. It read, in part:

*... on the occasion of the great political and military triumphs which [the Fuhrer] has just achieved through his foresight and great genius ... the Arab nation everywhere feels the greatest joy and deepest gratification ... [They] confidently expect the result of your final victory will be their independence and complete liberation [and that they will then] be linked to your country by a treaty of friendship and collaboration.*⁵⁶

That message has been represented as a strongly pro-Nazi stand by the Mufti on behalf of Arabs generally, but it must be read in context. It was a reflection of his antagonism to Britain and its policies, and an appeal for help rather than a statement of support for Nazi policies. The Mufti was a pragmatist. He believed that a British victory was not in the Arab interest because "Britain would turn against the Arabs as she had done after World War I" but he also believed that the Arabs should continue to work in accordance with their relevant treaties and avoid either antagonizing the Axis or being drawn into the war. If they were able to do that, they could preserve their military strength and not be "bled for the sake of Britain's victory." However his policy was that if Russia, Japan and Italy joined the war on the side of Germany and if their armies were to reach Egypt and Iran, all the Arab countries must declare war against the British and their Allies.⁵⁷

Von Papen gave Shawkat little encouragement. He made it clear that Germany had little interest in Arab affairs and regarded them as a matter for Italy. In response Shawkat expressed Arab distrust of Italy, proposed the re-establishment of direct diplomatic ties with Germany and sought an Italo-German declaration on Arab independence and unity. At the same time a second emissary was assured by the Italian Minister in Baghdad that "Italy aims at ensuring complete independence and territorial integrity of Syria and the Lebanon as well as Iraq and the countries under British mandate."⁵⁸ The Italian reply was intended to conceal Italy's ambitions in Egypt and North Africa, and to avoid unsettling the other Arab countries, but neither response suggested any eagerness to draw the Arabs into a widened war to bring down the British Empire.

Certainly Britain's attack on the French fleet had strengthened Hitler's hand still further and he immediately broke off the feelers which he had been pursuing, being convinced that the peace contacts were being manipulated to stall him.⁵⁹ On the other hand, Britain's action convinced Roosevelt that it did have the will to fight – alone if necessary – and that strengthened Churchill's hand. On July 8 Roosevelt expanded upon the RFC financing arrangements he had approved in mid-June. He said the government could either build production plants which the operating companies would buy back over ten years, or the RFC could lend the money and be paid back from defence orders.⁶⁰ But the messages coming from the White House were still very confusing. Roosevelt knew that American public opinion was, by then, that if Anglo-French naval power was destroyed it would mean, in due course, a German war on the United States, but even so public opinion was still against American participation in a European war and Richardson was still vehemently opposed to the major West Coast fleet being based at Hawaii. Roosevelt agreed to discuss the matter with him privately over lunch that day but he did not budge. Richardson insisted that the "illogical basing of the fleet at Hawaii" was a disaster in the making and asked: "Are we here as a stepping off place for belligerent activity?" He left the luncheon with a promise from the president that he would not send the fleet to the Far East under "any foreseeable circumstances" but with the impression that he "was fully determined to put the United States into the war if Great Britain could hold out until he was reelected."⁶¹ Now: a speech had already been prepared for Roosevelt at the beginning of July on the simple basis that America was opposed to war, but when he was ready to deliver it next day, July 9, that note was changed to read that no American men would fight in European wars.⁶² This implied and was taken by observers to mean that the US would not join the war to save Britain but that if Germany was victorious against Britain, then American troops could then go to war in Europe in an American war.

However Hitler was eager to stop the European war and to avoid the need to have one with America whether it was on European or American soil. He knew that Churchill's opponents in government were eager to force him out, and it was reasonable to expect that the opportunity to hold the 'old' empire together would provide enough incentive for them to do so. And Hitler had just been dealt a wild card with which he might trump Churchill. It was the Duke of Windsor.

HITLER'S ROYAL TRUMP

Windsor had expected that when the furore over his abdication and marriage had settled down he would be invited to return to England to take up an official appointment, preferably one related to his special interests – industrial and urban reform. Frustrated when he received no such call he had determined to exert some influence in that field anyway. Assisted by a friend of long standing who was well connected with the German Nazi Party, Mr. Charles Bedaux, Windsor announced that he and the duchess would visit Germany and the United States in October and November 1937 to study housing and working conditions. The British Government and the palace ignored the visit. But the world's press did not, and it was soon widely known that the Windsors were impressed by Hitler and his achievements. Their visit became another embarrassment for Britain as well as an affront to the Jewish community, and the uproar in the US forced the last minute cancellation of the US leg of the Windsor's schedule.⁶³ Chamberlain, however, was not among those who were offended, and he visited the Windsors in Paris in November 1938 to discuss his Munich "success."⁶⁴

A few months later, in May 1939, the duke intervened directly in the muddled waters of international diplomacy by broadcasting to the US on the folly of war, immediately after Britain announced its guarantees to Poland, Greece and Rumania and while King George VI was in mid-Atlantic at the start of an official visit to the US and Canada.⁶⁵ He intervened again in August with personal telegrams to Hitler and Italy's King Emmanuel when Hitler's "police action" in Poland was about to force Britain's declaration of war. Both replied: the king, that he was doing all he could to preserve peace, and Hitler, that the choice between peace and war lay with Britain.⁶⁶

Within hours of war's declaration on September 3, 1939, Windsor offered to serve Britain in any capacity the king cared to name. On visiting London in very strained circumstances which his friend Churchill helped to ease, the duke was offered and accepted a liaison post with the British Military Mission in Paris, with the rank of Major General.⁶⁷ Much to the concern of his colleagues he maintained contact with Charles Bedaux. On May 28, 1940, when the German army broke the French lines and swept towards Paris, he quit his post in dubious circumstances – which have been described as desertion – and made his way to Lisbon (Portugal), via Madrid (Spain).⁶⁸ There is still much confusion about his contacts and movements during the following weeks, but it is certain that the British authorities were concerned that he was about to join the German cause. On the signing of the Franco-German armistice on June 22 Churchill ordered him to return to England. The duke held to his belief that Britain should make peace with Germany, broke with Churchill over his decision to fight on, and refused to return to England unless the duchess was granted a royal title and privileges. She was not.⁶⁹

High drama and intrigue followed as Churchill sought to get Windsor into a situation in which he could not press his peace-with-Germany line and undermine Britain's war effort. Instead of a return to England he was offered the post of Governor of the Bahamas. But Windsor wanted something better than that and told the Spaniards as much. He is also believed to have told the Spaniards that if he were still king Britain would not have gone to war and could be bombed into surrender.⁷⁰ Urged by Spanish Nazis to involve Windsor directly in his bid for a settlement with Britain, Hitler postponed an address to the Reichstag which had been planned for July 8 and authorized Joachim von Ribbentrop to ensure that the duke delayed his departure for the Bahamas and accepted a role in the German plan. On July 11 Ribbentrop cabled the German ambassador in Madrid with the message that only the Churchill clique stood in the way of peace and if the duke so desired Germany was willing to smooth the path for "the duke and duchess to occupy the British throne."⁷¹

In the meantime, having persuaded the government that it was in Britain's interest to provide a three-month breathing space by agreeing to a temporary closure of the Burma Road, Craigie was negotiating to get the agreement in place. His advice shows remarkable insights into the Japanese self-understanding and world view which contradicted the self-righteous imperial view from Whitehall (and Downing Street) and which would later be rigorously suppressed as the Allies sought to justify their 'response' to Japan's entry into the war. On July 14 Craigie said that a generous peace for China could only be achieved if the West was willing to make concessions to Japan. He said the grievances which Japan would raise in general talks on East Asia included the rejection of the racial equality clause in the League of Nations Covenant; the United States Immigration Act of 1924; the Imperial Preference policy decided at the Ottawa Conference of 1932; and the general refusal of credits to Japan. He also said that trade concessions, notably access to raw materials, was "more vital to Japan than territorial aggrandisement" and that both the US and Britain had to be involved in the discussion of future arrangements if any meaningful progress was to be made.⁷²

Churchill's fantastic but very illuminating response shows clearly that he was not about to budge from his imperial self-understanding. He wrote in a minute to Halifax: "Don't you think we might go very slow on all this general and equitable, fair and honourable peace business between China and Japan? Chiang doesn't want it: none of the pro-Chinese want it ... I am sure it is not in our interest that the Japanese should be relieved of their preoccupation. Would it not be a good thing to give it a miss for a month or so and see what happens."⁷³ It reeked of the same old 'divide and rule' philosophy which Britain had long relied upon and which he was still imposing in India. Its consequences would be of the same nature.

The Burma Road and Hong Kong border agreement was nearly ready to sign of July 16 when Japan's Minister for the Army resigned amidst disputes over the government's responses to Britain's politicking and inaction in South East Asia and the Yonai cabinet fell. Craigie, fearing that Prime Minister Konoye's new government would have the fiercely pro-Axis Shiratori Toshio as Foreign Minister and be more extremist, and with prospects of war already greater than 50:50, pressed for immediate authority to sign. It was granted.

But Hitler also took note of the changes in Japan and that day, only five days after Ribbentrop's offer to put Windsor back on the throne, he signed a draft order for his staff to prepare plans for an invasion of Britain and "if necessary carry it out."⁷⁴

Next day, July 17, Craigie and Arita signed an agreement banning the transport of war material, including petrol, to China and closing the Hong Kong border until October 18.⁷⁵ It represented an amazing volte-face by Britain which had totally lost its bearings as it rounded the beacon which it had tossed into the Sea of Japan on March 14. Instead of coercing Japan into joining an embargo against Russia it had been coerced into joining an embargo against its subservient ally, China. Thus, against a background of frantic action on two continents, Hitler's staff set about their invasion-planning while a British delegation set about discussing the problem of Britain's rapidly dwindling dollar balances in Washington, July 15–18. Roosevelt confided the 'frightening' news to selected Congressional leaders that Britain would require financial assistance within a year and even the liquidation of private securities would hardly dent the deficit.⁷⁶ At the same time the reaction of the US administration to the closing of the Burma Road was that it was "an unwarranted interpositions of obstacles to world trade."⁷⁷ Such a swipe at both Britain and Japan was resented in London because uncertainty about US motives and support had been an important factor in the decision taken. And seeing Japan in a position to control the Asian colonies of both Holland and France, and that its own foothold in China was under severe threat, the United States complicated matters more for Britain on July 19 by proposing a ban on American oils and controls on exports of aircraft parts, minerals and chemicals to Japan.

While Whitehall welcomed this proposal as an indication that the US was at last prepared to support Britain by taking a tough line, there was trepidation that it would bring another backlash from Japan and that the US would not provide military support if Japan launched an offensive to take control of the Dutch East Indies for its oil supplies. However the US was not at war with Japan, nor with any other country in the region, and it therefore had no more statutory justification to act as if it was implementing its Neutrality Act than it had had at any other time since the Neutrality Act became law. Certainly it had no more justification than in July 1937 when it did not invoke the Neutrality Law at the time of Japan's invasion of China during the 'Sino-Japanese incident.' Both decisions were based on its perceived economic interests at the time. The State Department therefore stepped in, no doubt to the delight of the oil industry, and limited the move to the introduction of licensing for the export of high octane aviation fuel and high grade scrap metal.⁷⁸

HITLER'S OPTIONS

On the same day, July 19, Hitler addressed the Reichstag.⁷⁹ The thrust of his speech was that the British people could have an end to the war without loss of sovereignty if they got rid of Churchill and his war mongering clique. "I can see no reason why this war need go on," Hitler said. "I am grieved to think of the sacrifices it must claim." The alternative to peace was great suffering for Britain, with the exception of Churchill who would take himself to Canada where the wealth and children of “those principally interested in the war” had already gone.⁸⁰ “Mr. Churchill ought perhaps, for once, believe me when I prophesy that a great empire will be destroyed – an empire which it was never my intention to destroy or even to harm ...”⁸¹ If Churchill once again brushes aside this statement of mine by saying that it is merely born of fear and doubts of victory, Hitler said, “I shall have relieved my conscience of the things to come.”⁸² Hitler and Churchill were competing in the propaganda stakes to see who could make the most effective references to the Jews without naming them. Then, moving to stir up the undercurrent of opposition to Churchill’s policy, Hitler said:

*In this hour I feel it to be my duty before my own conscience to appeal once more to reason and common sense in Great Britain as much as elsewhere. I consider myself in a position to make this appeal since I am not the vanquished begging favours, but the victor speaking in the name of reason.*⁸³

Churchill rejected the overture out of hand and the black propaganda service prepared a vitriolic response which was broadcast within an hour.⁸⁴ But not every member of Churchill’s cabinet agreed with his response. “Dissidents in the war cabinet” – taken to mean Lord Halifax (who was disappointed that Hitler had not offered concrete terms in his speech) and Neville Chamberlain – approached a German intermediary through the British Embassy in Washington to enquire what Hitler had to say about the kind of peace that “a proud and unconquered nation” could accept. Hitler authorized the German Charge d’affaires in Washington to broaden the contacts, but the exchange of messages was intercepted and Churchill, no doubt furious, instructed that the exchange stop.⁸⁵

On the evening of the day that Hitler’s speech was broadcast and in direct response to it – and in contrast to the self-interest-induced neutrality of his own country – Roosevelt surprised many diplomats by decrying any peace moves. In a speech broadcast from the White House accepting nomination for a record third term as President, he aligned himself with Churchill, saying there was only one way to deal with a totalitarian country: “by resistance, not appeasement.” He immediately signed the Two-Ocean Navy Expansion Act to authorize a substantial increase in US navy strength in both the Pacific and the Atlantic.⁸⁶ In reporting Roosevelt’s address the German Ambassador told Berlin that the president’s complicity in prolonging the war came out clearly. “England is to be prevented from changing her course,” he said. “English resistance is to be strengthened and the war is to be continued.”⁸⁷

Those moves by the United States reflected, in part, the concern of the Organization of American States that Europe’s war might spill over into the Americas, a concern which had prompted the decision by Congress only a month earlier, in mid-June, to permit the sale of surplus US coast and anti-aircraft defence equipment to Latin American countries which were also to be permitted to build warships in US naval shipyards. (See above, chapter 23, p. 33.) But it also reflected the wonderful opportunity which Europe’s war provided for the US to tighten its grip on resources and markets in Latin America under the guise of cooperation.

In particular the US had come to fear that as part of a peace settlement Hitler might gain a foothold in Latin America through the transfer of a European colonial territory – along with its people and resources. Meeting in Havana in July the OAS resolved that the Monroe Doctrine should be applied on an international basis, and the Inter-American Commission for Territorial Administration was set up to ensure joint defence in the event of a Nazi claim to any Latin American country. In the same vein, and to strengthen the resolve of those countries in which there was strong pro-Nazi sentiment, the Inter-American Financial and Economic Advisory Committee was also established. The US undertook to ‘cooperate’ by absorbing and reallocating surplus Latin American exports, including those which were stranded due to naval blockades imposed in Europe by Britain and Germany. or because of Latin American cooperation with the US in its policy of isolating Hitler. It also undertook construction of large sections of the strategic Pan American Highway.

Roosevelt’s response was in sharp contrast to those of the Pope and the King of Sweden two weeks later,(see below), through whom Hitler had also put out more feelers, and that of Lord Halifax and his Undersecretary, Butler. Halifax broadcast on July 22 that: “We never wanted the war. Certainly no one here wants the war to go on for a day longer than is necessary. But we shall not stop fighting until freedom for ourselves and others is secure.” And next day Butler, frustrated by the confusion in Whitehall and the extent to which British policy was being driven by dependence on the United States, or subservience to it, ordered that work begin on a proposal for a peace agreement with Japan. Then, faced with stalling tactics, he noted that Britain “may well go to the grave chanting that we must be polite to the Americans, but we shan’t save our civilization like this.”⁸⁸

Although, overall, Churchill won that round, he knew he would suffer a major setback in the war of psychology if the Duke of Windsor were to join the Germans, and steps were taken to ensure that the Duke would stay in Portugal until his scheduled departure for the Bahamas. Churchill received another boost – and Hitler got a nasty jolt – when Morgenthau announced on July 25 that American aircraft production was being lifted to 3,000 per month to meet Britain’s requirements and implied, in response to reporters’ questions, that money was not a problem. There could have been no clearer indication that in due course the United States would agree to substantial financial assistance because everyone knew that Britain simply did not have the means to pay for them.⁸⁹ Similarly, such a decision meant that the US was near to the point of being ‘locked into’ an alliance with Britain and that this would have to involve direct participation in the war. However that development made it all the more important for Hitler to be able to use his star recruit and next day, July 26, a plot was hatched to assist Windsor across the border into Spain which, since Churchill’s blunt rejection of the peace overture, Hitler had been pressing to act on its earlier commitment to join the Axis Alliance and declare war on Britain. A message was cabled to Berlin to indicate that Windsor would soon be available but it must have been intercepted by British intelligence because the plot was foiled. Under threat of court martial Windsor finally sailed from Lisbon on August 1. Hitler’s prize had slipped through his fingers. Windsor nevertheless managed to remain in touch with Ribbentrop through a courier from the Bahamas and it is thought that he kept an open mind on the German proposal to reinstate him on the throne from which he had been forced to abdicate.⁹⁰

It is now known that by that date, (not later than July 31), Hitler had decided that he would have to change his priorities and knock Russia out of the war – quite quickly – to avoid being caught in a pincer movement if Britain and Russia formed an alliance against him.⁹¹ However it is not clear to what extent the Windsor potential influenced his thinking, nor whether he alerted Windsor to his plan. What is clear is that there was a perceptible shift in international political attitudes and policies at that time. During June and July there had been an assumption that Britain was facing defeat and that it would have to sue for a negotiated peace if it wanted to avoid total subjugation. Because of that, governments were basing their planning and their reactions on the first of the two options noted on page twelve of this chapter, ‘the armistice or knock-out option.’ However during August and September that assumption gave way to the belief that Britain, and therefore the whole of Europe at least, was in the war for the long haul. Governments shifted a gear to plan on the basis of the second option, ‘the drawn out war option,’ and to consider the three issues set out there, viz.: whether they were directly or indirectly threatened by one or more of the belligerents and their own defence requirements as a consequence of that threat and, in the case of France (and Britain), whether it could depend on the unqualified support of its colonies; the nature and extent of their obligations to other countries, either under treaties, imperial decisions or by virtue of ethnic or other relationships, and whether to cooperate fully under those obligations; and their opportunities, either commercial or political, and, if they were so inclined, whether to take advantage of another country’s weakness. There were seven ‘powers’ whose ‘shifts’ on the basis of that third issue were of special consequence and become apparent as we trace decisions taken during the next nineteen weeks: Vichy France, Spain, Italy, the United States, Japan and the Vatican.

Of particular interest is the fact that Vichy France and Spain, together, held the key to the quick defeat of Britain if they were to cooperate more closely with Hitler, but they had competing interests and, in addition, Franco was tired of war. If Franco’s Spain were to either attack Gibraltar directly or permit Hitler’s forces to march through Spain to do it for him, Britain’s control of the Mediterranean would be lost, except to the extent that it could capture the Canary Islands and use them as a naval base from which to close the Straits of Gibraltar to Axis shipping. In his memoirs Churchill had the audacity to write that “General Franco’s policy throughout the war was entirely selfish and cold-blooded.”⁹² Surely a case of the pot calling the kettle black. Similarly, Italy held the key to a sweep east by the Vatican through the Balkans, and also to the ability of Britain and Russia to bury their hatchets and cooperate against Hitler. Pius XII was well aware of that and also that if the Soviet Union were to sweep west first, the Vatican’s opportunity to Catholicize the Balkans would be lost.

However, just before the reality of the situation dawned on Hitler and the rest of the world and that shift began, Hitler, Halifax, the king of Sweden and the pope were certainly not the only people who were still trying to disengage the belligerents, and the pope was not limiting his techniques in any way. He had always promoted concordats as the way to peace and he was eager to negotiate another one, with the Vichy French Government, to complete the chain of governments linked by concordats right through the heart of Europe. [See chapter 23, p. 22.] This caused concern for France's Protestant and Jewish communities alike. They both feared to be governed by a clerical regime of reactionaries, the croix de feu or Cagoulaards, in the climate of high passion for a 'national revolution' which swept Vichy in the wake of the national military defeat. Faced with that prospect the president of the Protestant Federation of France, Pastor Marc Boegner (also president of the administrative committee of the Provisional World Council of Churches) called on both Vice Premier Pierre Laval and Justice Minister Alibert on July 26. The provisional committee of the W.C.C. had already established an Inter-Church Aid Committee and a network for refugee rescue and relief, and it felt shame that the armistice required any refugees to be handed to the Germans on demand.

When Boegner referred to "the Catholic character" of the national revolution Laval stopped him and said that tendency might be present in some of the ministers, but the government would "vigorously maintain religious freedom." Unfortunately he immediately qualified his statement. Protestants, far from being persecuted, would have their rightful place in the nation, he said, but "as for the Jews, they have done such harm to the country that they deserve collective punishment."⁹³ In other words religious freedom in France was for Christians – and presumably Muslims because the French overseas territories were almost entirely Muslim – but certainly not for Jews. Vichy French policy towards the Jews was confirmed over the following months when various racial laws, controls on appointments to public posts, the establishment of internment camps for "non-Aryans" and the repatriation of German Jews to Germany – and the gas chambers – were introduced and enforced. When Boegner wrote to Petain and to the French press objecting to those measures on behalf of the Protestant Federation he was roundly attacked as the "champion of Jewry", for interfering and for not consulting members of the churches in whose names he had written.⁹⁴

Alibert was perhaps more frank on the matter of concordat negotiations. He told Boegner that no plan was under consideration in the ecclesiastical field because according to Cardinal Gerlier, the Archbishop of Lyons, the Holy See would never accept a concordat which would restrict the exceptional freedom which the Catholic Church had been able to extract from the law of 1905.⁹⁵

At the time of those talks, while Vichy France was preparing to hand over its Jews on Hitler's demand, the US further tightened the screws on Japan by introducing the regulations discussed above which included aviation fuel, lubricants, iron and scrap steel under licencing controls.⁹⁶ Japan's next and quite natural response was to seek secure petroleum supplies from other sources. It had already obtained official German assurances that Germany did not have designs on the Dutch colonies, and in August it approached the colonial authorities at Batavia to insist upon huge petroleum supplies and the imposition of controls over the shipping and finances of the Indies. Knowing that Japan was eager to avoid a confrontation with the four interested powers – the powerless Dutch Government in exile, the United States, Britain and

China – the Dutch colonial authorities did all they could in the circumstances to thwart the Japanese and to encourage the Western powers in their opposition to Japan.⁹⁷

Much to the delight of Whitehall, the man whom Craigie had expected, Shiratori Toshio, was not appointed as Japan's Foreign Minister but it soon became apparent that it would make little difference. Anglo-Japanese relations were caught in a downward spiral. Over the five days immediately prior to August 1, fourteen British citizens, some holding the rank of Honorary Consul for other European powers, were arrested on spying charges and on that date Foreign Minister Matsuoka issued a press release announcing Japan's intention to set up a Greater East Asian Co-prosperity Sphere. This was to include the Netherlands East Indies and French Indo-China. Whitehall's concern was aggravated by concurrent rumours that Japan was sending an economic mission to Batavia to press the Dutch officials, still in authority, to ease quotas on commodity supplies and by demands on the French in Indo-China that Japan's troops be given free passage through Tonkin province and the use of air bases around Hanoi. In a doubly swift retaliation Britain's War Cabinet decided, the same day, to arrest ten Japanese subjects.⁹⁸

On August 3 the King of Sweden stepped up his efforts as a peace-maker when he wrote urging Britain to accept a peace settlement. Churchill in response drafted a strong reply in which he referred to massacres and pillaging in the countries which had been subjugated. He very cleverly tied the members of the Chamberlain Government to his policies, saying:

These horrible events have darkened the pages of European history with an indelible stain. His Majesty's Government see in them not the slightest cause to recede in any way from their principles and resolves as set forth in October 1939. On the contrary, their intention to prosecute the war against Germany by every means in their power until Hitlerism is finally broken and the world relieved from the curse which a wicked man has brought upon it has been strengthened to such a point that they would rather all perish in the common ruin than fail or falter in their duty.

Before any [request or proposals for an armistice] could even be considered it would be necessary that effective guarantees by deeds, not words, should be forthcoming from Germany which would ensure the restoration of the free and independent life of Czechoslovakia, Poland, Norway, Denmark, Holland, Belgium, and above all, France ...⁹⁹

Churchill showed quite clearly in the words which he chose, so carefully, for that letter that he had not understood the parody of Mein Kampf or the responsibility of the church and the amorphous Christian gel for the situation which he described, nor the way in which he, personally, had become a key player. It was all "that wicked man." Relieve the world of him and get a guarantee of "deeds, not words" from his country and the problem would be solved. There was no hint of recognition that it was the words and deeds of the church and its adherents which had caused the words and deeds of Hitler to be generated as a parody of the words and deeds of the church and the amorphous Christian gel.

The consequences of the parody were gradually unfolding. Hitler maintained that he didn't want to bring down the British Empire, while Roosevelt knowingly pursued a policy which was bound to dismantle it. In fact, the US was in strong competition with Japan to see which of them would succeed the European powers as masters of the East.

HITLER, ROOSEVELT AND THE BRITISH EMPIRE

The plot became thicker and thicker. On August 6, only 16 days after Churchill's urging to ignore Craigie's advice and 'miss a month or so and see what happens' before making any more concessions to Japan, the War Cabinet decided to try to extricate itself from a near-impossible position by withdrawing all British troops from its remaining two garrisons in China. It was soon searching for "unobtrusive measures" to take in reprisal.¹⁰⁰ And on that same day a very worried Roosevelt asked Lothian for the second time (see chapter 23, p. 33, May 19, 1940) to press the British government for an assurance that in the event of defeat its fleet would either fight on from within the Empire or be sent to the US and that it would not be surrendered or scuttled. Churchill's response on August 7 was characteristically blunt. He instructed the Foreign Secretary that the nation would not tolerate any discussion of what should be done "if our Island were overrun," that any discussion of the possibility of defeat would be injurious to public morale, the declaration requested must be refused, and that the deal for fifty or sixty old destroyers must be confined "solely to the Colonial leases."¹⁰¹

At the same time the War Cabinet had to focus on India again in spite of Churchill's blunt rejection of constitutional change only a few months earlier when the Muslim League had pressed for the establishment of autonomous sovereign states in areas where there was a Muslim majority. Some Indian army units had been recruited for service in Singapore and North and East Africa, but the fall of France and the continued reluctance of the United States to declare war against Germany made it apparent that much greater support would be needed from India. This was unlikely if Congress maintained its pacifism and if Japan stepped up its campaign to eject the European powers from Asia. Therefore on August 8 the government confirmed its offer of full and equal partnership in the British Commonwealth after the war, with full weight to be given to the views of minorities. A representative body would be set up at that time to devise a new constitution but there would be no change until then, with the exceptions that the Viceroy's Council would be expanded and a war advisory council would be established. In return Britain expected greater cooperation in the prosecution of the war. But Congress refused to cooperate with either manpower or funds, and thousands of people, including all its prominent leaders, were jailed for subversion.

Then, while the United States and Japan jockeyed for position to replace Britain in the East, Roosevelt was also jockeying to extract the maximum technical and territorial concessions from Britain in return for even the slightest military assistance,¹⁰² and Churchill was trying to provoke Hitler into bombing Britain. His aim was to generate maximum sympathy support within the US. The situation had not changed. It was yet another instance of Britain, or Churchill, as the key player in the war manipulating people with whom there was no agreed ‘common cause’, to coerce them into supporting a war which they did not want, and for which there were no acceptable statements of aims. At first he did not succeed.

Franco was in the jockeying business too, in an effort to get the maximum benefits for Spain if he was to commit it to the risky and undoubtedly damaging enterprise of war with Britain in alliance with the Axis powers. On August 8 Berlin was advised that in return for military cooperation Franco wanted Gibraltar, French Morocco, part of Algeria including Oran, and expanded territory for the existing Spanish African colonies plus “adequate military and economic assistance” including a number of 15 inch guns for the Spanish batteries facing Gibraltar, and that he insisted that Spain would not intervene until after German forces had landed in England. Franco knew that such terms were not acceptable to Hitler because the guarantee of French colonial territory as a prize would cost Hitler Vichy French cooperation and almost certainly lead to the setting up of a hostile French government-in-exile in North Africa and its cooperation with Britain. He also knew that Hitler could march through France, then Spain, abusing its nominal neutrality as he went, take Gibraltar for himself, leapfrog across the Straits to North Africa, establish bases and secure the strategic islands off the West African coast. However if he did that he would deplete his reserves so that an invasion of Britain would be more difficult and Churchill would trigger the well-rehearsed plan for the capture of the Canary Islands. Franco had called Hitler’s bluff while maintaining neutrality behind a pro-Nazi front.¹⁰³

But Hitler, having been rebuffed repeatedly by Churchill, most recently in the matter of the Lublin Reservation, was giving up any hope of being able to negotiate the emigration of Germany’s Jews and during August the Jewish Desk of the German Foreign Office refined and submitted detailed plans to transfer four million Jews en masse to the greatly exploited and neglected semi-independent Indian Ocean island of Madagascar. The island had previously been under Portuguese control but had fallen under French colonial suzerainty late in the 1890s. According to Yahil such a plan had been mooted several times by anti-Semitic writers, first in the 1880s and then in the 1920s, the 1930s, and specifically in 1937 before Heydrich instructed Eichmann to examine the matter in March 1938. But nothing more was done until after the fall of France when control of the island could be assumed, and Hitler is said to have favoured the scheme, referring to it several times during the summer of 1940.¹⁰⁴

In that atmosphere Hitler responded to Churchill’s provocation and obligingly instructed the Luftwaffe to soften up England in preparation for a full scale invasion under the code name of Operation Sea Lion, even though he had told Field Marshall von Rundstedt on the day of his Reichstag speech that he had not the slightest real intention of launching a cross channel invasion which, he said, would be quite superfluous.¹⁰⁵ Operation Eagle, the German air offensive which was planned to achieve air supremacy over Britain so that Operation Sea Lion could be put into action, was launched on August 13. Mass bombing of carefully targeted English cities began on August 15, and two days later Hitler declared a total blockade of the British Isles.

From an Arab perspective Hitler now appeared unstoppable and, although the Iraqi overtures in July had been discouraged, another delegate, 'Uthman Kamal Haddad, agreed upon by the prime minister and briefed by the Mufti, arrived in Berlin in late August for an extended stay. His task was to obtain a declaration which was consistent with Arab aspirations with recognition of the independence of Arab countries; their right to unite their countries; their right to solve the Jewish problem in Palestine in a manner which conformed to the national interests of the Arabs; and which asserted that the Axis powers had no imperialist designs on Egypt and the Sudan. He was to offer in return the resumption of diplomatic ties between Iraq and Germany; a favourable position for Germany in the Iraqi oil industry; and the resumption of the anti-British revolt in Palestine and Transjordan, for which Haddad requested logistical and financial support. However the Axis powers were also affected by uncertainties about their alliance. The Germans were generally supportive and were losing interest in Italy having an exclusive post-war influence in the Middle East; the Italians were unwilling to be frank about their own ambitions; and both were worried about the future of their alliance with Vichy France if they agreed to independence for Syria or Syrian-Iraqi unity.¹⁰⁶

At that stage, on Hitler's quite specific orders, no bombing was to be carried out against London so as to minimize political and business reaction and to improve his chances of a peace settlement with Britain. Churchill was well aware of that policy from message intercepts. It did not suit him. He was eager to gain more support for his war policy from both the general population and the financial section of The City. On August 24 one bomber overshot its planned target and hit greater London. Churchill had the justification he wanted for a 'retaliatory' raid on Berlin which he expected to provoke a German attack on London. It did.¹⁰⁷

Britain was desperate for funds – and for closer collaboration with the United States in the Far East – and the price which Roosevelt, the supposed friend of Britain, extracted for fifty antiquated destroyers was so great that it induced some members of Churchill's war cabinet to press for a negotiated settlement with Hitler. The price was agreed to on August 27, then on August 31, while an American military delegation was in London finalizing a lot of small print (and as if to soften the blow) it disclosed that the US had broken the Japanese diplomatic code and in future there would be an exchange of intelligence information.¹⁰⁸ Roosevelt was surrendering, at least in part, the advantage which he had exploited since the new naval intelligence unit became effective on February 23. (See chapter 23, p. 24.) On September 2 Cabinet decided that the Burma Road would be reopened on October 18, and next day, September 3, the bases deal was signed and announced: 99-year leases for naval and military bases in Britain's territories of Newfoundland (Canada), Bermuda, the Caribbean Islands and British Guinea, and the 'exchange' of technical information in several key military areas. Britain was actually so far ahead in radar development and code breaking at that stage, even allowing for the breaking of the Japanese codes, that the exchange was later described as bringing the US out of the stone age.¹⁰⁹ But before that price had been agreed US officials had proposed that Britain be required to cede its West Indies possessions to the United States.¹¹⁰

Perhaps that illustrates the depth of anti-British feeling which pervaded the United States – still a throwback to the colonial era – which Roosevelt had to battle to get even relatively minor assistance packages through Congress. A Gallup Poll taken at about that time showed that a massive 88 per cent of Americans agreed with the Lindbergh-Ford-led isolationist lobby line that the United States should stay out of Europe's war.¹¹¹ But at the same time the carefully orchestrated campaign against Jewish involvement was being stepped up, and the two issues were linked. In August, before the naval bases lease had been screwed out of Britain, the Senate Interstate Commerce Commission appointed a sub-committee to investigate whether the movie industry had encouraged the United States to end its neutrality. A sponsor of the motion claimed that foreign-born film producers who were naturally susceptible to racial emotions were trying to make America punch drunk with propaganda to push it into war.¹¹² And the US Ambassador to Britain, Joseph Kennedy, intervened directly in the debate when he paid a visit to Hollywood and sought a meeting with major Jewish film industry executives to whom he spoke for about three hours. He apparently told them that they should stop making anti-Nazi films and using the film medium to promote sympathy for 'the democracies' versus 'the dictators'; that anti-Semitism was growing in England where Jews were being blamed for the war; and that the Jews would be in jeopardy if they continued to abuse the power of the film industry.¹¹³

The partial loss of sovereignty over significant portions of Britain's empire may have been enough to cause the fall of Churchill's government, then barely three months old, if the details of the agreement had been generally known. And if it had been known that the fifty destroyers for which such prices had been paid had been in moth balls ever since the end of the first world war and most of them were in such poor condition that they were never to be used in battle, the outcry would have been even greater. At that stage of the war few of its people believed that getting rid of Hitler to ensure the basic rights of a few minorities, notably the Jews of Europe, justified sacrificing the empire. After all, didn't they have in their new leader the personification of empire? But the British people could not be expected to comprehend that their new friend, Roosevelt, was denuding Britain of the benefits of an empire in a way that Hitler never intended.

With the tempo of war suddenly raised by the bombing of both London and Berlin, and the ships-for-bases agreement, it was not likely to be any more than a minor diversion when the Dunera berthed at Sydney and the majority of its internees disembarked on September 6. When the Blitz of London began next day, September 7, the Dunera slipped quietly into history. The general assumption was that the blitz would continue as a part of the softening up process until Hitler was able to order a sea-borne invasion. Few people knew or cared that the internees had suffered a degrading two-month voyage of barbaric treatment and gross indignities in concentration camp conditions under the supervision of two officers whose inhumanity and bigotry knew no bounds. They were then interned at camps in harsh outback conditions while arrangements were made for them to provide cheap labor for the Australian war effort in one way or another – under strict security. Subsequently, when an official enquiry was conducted, the British Government admitted that there had been a monumental bungle, an effort was made to make amends for the tragedy and many of the internees stayed after their release to make outstanding contributions to their new homeland. But those responsible for the fiasco escaped virtually scot-free and the Dunera Scandal¹¹⁴ serves to illustrate the consequences of mass manipulation of public thinking and responses, even when it is based on what the public may perceive at the time as of quite worthy intent. In fact the Dunera internees were not the only Jews on the water during September. Shortly after the Madagascar plan was submitted, and as proof that the Nazis had not tried to prevent further emigration, another 1,200 Polish Jews were able to make their way from Lithuania to Palestine.

The earlier unplanned bombing of London may have provoked not only Churchill's retaliatory bombing of Berlin and then the Blitz, but also Roosevelt's decisions to send the first peacetime Draft Act to Congress and to authorize the establishment of a two-ocean navy that would eventually include one hundred aircraft carriers at a cost of $5 billion,¹¹⁵ and Hitler's final peace offer. Three days into the Blitz, on September 10, and two weeks after the ships-for-bases-and-technology agreement, Hitler made his last cast to hook a settlement with Britain. His envoy, Ludwig Weissauer, travelled to Stockholm to contact the British envoy, Sir Victor Mallet, through a friend of the Swedish king, Professor Lars Ekeberg. The terms were simple: for Germany, the continent; for Britain, retention of her overseas empire. Lord Halifax and Sir Alex Cadogan delivered the proposal together at 4 pm and urged Churchill to consider it. It was just the kind of concrete statement which Lord Halifax had been eager to receive from Hitler. However, when they returned at 7.30 pm Churchill had already drafted a rejection.¹¹⁶ No cabinet discussion. Not even discussion with his principal advisers responsible for foreign policy. Simply dictatorial Churchillian arrogance and determination.

Perhaps Churchill didn't need to consult his colleagues because they should have all realized very quickly that to agree to such a proposition would have turned all of Europe against Britain and meant total British exclusion from all French, Belgian, Dutch and Portuguese colonies in Asia, the Pacific and Africa. That would have resulted either from Hitler's control of those colonies, most notable of which were French Indochina, the Dutch East Indies and Portuguese Timor, or from European antagonism which would have been far more bitter than if the proposed African colonial giveaway had been pursued a year earlier (see chapters 21, p. 10; 22 pp. 2–5). In fact at that time Japan was in the middle of intense negotiations with the Dutch authorities in Batavia for the rights to a minimum of 3,150,000 metric tons of petroleum per year, and the quickest way to convert their strident 'No!' (which brought accusations that they were puppets of the United States)¹¹⁷ to 'Yes!' was for Britain to agree to Hitler's free hand in Europe. The same would have applied to Japan's on-going negotiations with the Vichy French for military bases in Indochina. In addition, with all of Europe's Jewry coming under direct pressure to quit, the pressure from the Jewish lobbies both in Britain and the United States would have been equally vigorous, and the Jewish question, complete with the issue of Palestine and Arab relations, would have been forced right to the top of the agenda. Britain's position would have been totally untenable. Totally. Britain was stuck. Churchill's "NO" was relayed to the messengers immediately. Hitler had been sweeping all before him until the Battle of Britain but Britain's unexpected resistance, especially in the face of the blitz, had the effect of strengthening resistance elsewhere. Thus, after receiving Churchill's blunt and unexpected rejection on September 11, Hitler no longer regarded the British Empire as sacrosanct. News of the exchange quickly leaked to Ambassador Kennedy who relayed it to Washington. Roosevelt's reaction does not appear to have been published, but controversial historical writer David Irving reports that when told of Hitler's terms the former President Herbert Hoover gasped "Why didn't the British accept?" to which Kennedy replied, "Nothing but Churchill's bullheadedness."¹¹⁸ Neither Hoover nor Kennedy appear to have been thinking any more clearly than some of Churchill's colleagues.

The blitz was dominating world news, it was naturally a preoccupation with people in Britain, and it therefore tended to conceal or at least draw attention away from Britain's related and deepening crises in the Far East. But people like Craigie and Japan's ambassador in London, Shigemitsu, continued with their efforts to establish Anglo-Japanese rapprochement. With Halifax' approval, Shigemitsu arranged to meet the Colonial Secretary, Lord Lloyd, and a cabinet colleague, Lord Hankey, on that fateful day: September 11. After friendly, but general, discussions they agreed to meet again.

Over the next few days the intensity of blitz bombing increased, reaching a peak on September 15. It is reasonable to assume that Churchill's rejection of Hitler's message had led directly to that peak assault, but it is also reasonable to assume that the increase in intensity of the blitz was not simply out of pique. Circumstantial evidence suggests that it was a deliberate effort by Hitler to apply more pressure on the people of Britain, the 'Peace Party' and the government in a bid to encourage the immediate overthrow of Churchill by his cabinet – or by the military leadership in a coup – and the installation of a government which was prepared to negotiate a peace agreement. Churchill was no more immune from intrigue around him than Hitler – a fact confirmed by the existence of the 'Peace Party.'

During the period June-September the peace politicking had been intense. In view of what is known about Churchill's attitude and his decisions noted above it is surprising to find that some of the messages reaching Hitler purported to carry Churchill's authority. Given that he was eager to gain time to strengthen Britain's position it is reasonable to accept that, as some writers have suggested, he was laying false trails and scents for Hitler. However it is extremely difficult to determine which were genuine and which were false trails. After the Germans had become aware in June that the conversations which they had set up with the British 'Peace Party' through Holland had been infiltrated and were being 'played' by British Intelligence Services, both Hitler (or his staff contacts) and the British Intelligence Services had to change to making their contacts through alternative channels. Hitler wanted to be reasonably sure that he was dealing with either a genuine 'Peace Party' or an alternative Government-in-waiting, while the British wanted to be sure that they stayed abreast of any initiatives which Hitler could take. Their need was to keep him talking instead of triggering an invasion while they improved their position.

However the losses of German bombers during the nine days of blitz bombing raids were unacceptable. Therefore on September 17, when Hitler realized that Churchill was not about to be overthrown and that he had failed to achieve air superiority, (even though he did not know the reason – the RAF’s use of radar), he postponed Operation Sea Lion indefinitely. The Battle of Britain had been won by Britain but the war of Gog and Magog was really only getting under way. In the Far East the bidding for team members was being raised higher and higher and the domestic battle to keep the United States out of the war was gathering momentum, too. The America First Committee had been established and was becoming an influential political pressure group with the aim of keeping the US neutral and preventing the transfer of military goods as aid to the European Allies. It did not oppose the sale of such goods, as long as all parties were able to buy and sales were subordinated to America’s military needs.¹¹⁹

During those few days when the Blitz was at its peak, Hull seems to have been influenced by a clearer understanding of how fragile Britain’s position had become and the threat to the interests of the United States which a British defeat would unleash. He showed a marked move towards cooperation in Asia and reversed one of the factors which had forced Britain to close the Burma Road. He talked of additional sanctions against Japan and a joint declaration with Britain, Australia, New Zealand and Holland to uphold the status quo south of the Equator, which suggested that a decision to reopen the Burma Road could be taken without too great a concern about Japanese retaliation.¹²⁰

In view of the failure of the Blitz, Hitler sent Ribbentrop to Rome to confer with Mussolini on September 19 and to give the Duce his assessment that Britain’s situation was desperate and its attitude was dictated by the hope of intervention by the Russians and the Americans. Mussolini’s view was that its controversial sale of fifty destroyers proved that for practical purposes the United States was at the side of Britain, and that an Alliance with Japan was advisable “to paralyse American action.” Then he indicated that he wanted a free hand in the Balkans where Italy already had seven hundred thousand men under arms in Albania ready to solve “the problem of Yugoslavia and Greece.” He said the Greeks represented for Italy what the Norwegians had represented for Germany and it was necessary for Italy to liquidate Greece, especially seeing that when Italy advanced into Egypt it would not be possible for the English fleet to remain at Alexandria and it would seek refuge in Greek ports. When talk turned to the likely duration of the war, Ribbentrop suggested, apparently without mentioning Franco’s conditions, that “a declaration of war by Spain following upon the alliance with Japan would be a new and formidable blow for England.”¹²¹

But both sides were still jockeying to influence Japan’s decisions, and the second Shigemitsu-Lloyd-Hankey meeting took place three days later, on September 22. Shigemitsu proposed, in line with an idea which an Anglo-Japanese business and professional group in London had been pressing for six months, that a British cabinet minister should travel to Japan as head of an official mission with the aim of improving relations between the two countries and countering German influence. The British ministers found the idea appealing and agreed to pursue it.¹²² However the situation changed dramatically in favor of the Axis powers the same day when the French military administration in Indochina, faced with an ultimatum, accepted Japan's terms and allowed the use of anchorages in the Gulf of Tonkin, free passage for 25,000 troops into Tonkin province, flanking China's southern border, and allocated four air bases for Japanese use. It was immediately patently obvious that Britain's position in the Far East would be completely untenable unless prompt action was taken to relieve the situation in Palestine and to secure both the Suez Canal and Middle East oil supplies. Middle East security and interfaith relations were back at the top of the agenda.

Throughout August, while Britons contemplated the prospect of invasion at the hands of Germany and their politicians contemplated the prospect of bankruptcy at the hands of the US, the Jewish Agency for Palestine had jockeyed Britain to establish a Jewish army. But Whitehall feared that such an army could be turned against Britain and the Arabs once Hitler had been disposed off.¹²³ Three months earlier, immediately Churchill was appointed Prime Minister, Zionist groups had persuaded him to move Malcolm MacDonald from the Colonial Office because it was he, through the publication of the White Paper, who had thwarted their plans for accelerated Jewish settlement in Palestine.¹²⁴ Then in August, when Weizmann proposed that 60,000 Jews in Palestine be armed in case Britain had to move its troops to other theatres, Churchill gave him a series of controversial undertakings. He undertook to accept Jewish military help; to 'investigate' the army's oppressive searches for arms held illegally by Jewish groups in Palestine; to recall eight of the 10 British battalions from Palestine; and to arm the Jewish para-military police instead. The critical situation in Indochina now made decisions on those matters urgent. It was clear that if the basic proposal was not agreed to there was likely to be a backlash which would only make the situation even more critical.

On September 25 cabinet reluctantly agreed to the establishment of a Jewish Division patterned on the Czechoslovakian and Polish armies in exile. But the decision caused further tension within the war cabinet. The British army chiefs objected strongly on the grounds that it would lead to an open Arab revolt, and MacDonald's successor, Lord Lloyd, objected because of the "appalling repercussions" of giving the Jews arms which they could use at their own discretion against the Arabs. As a result of the tussle of wills which followed, Lloyd agreed to withdraw eight battalions provided there was no deviation from the White Paper which might inflame the Arabs and that no steps were taken to arm a Jewish force for internal security purposes.¹²⁵ The nearest Britain could go towards forming a Jewish Army was to add a Palestinian battalion to one of the existing British regiments. The regiment was expanded from eight to 14 companies, each of which was planned to be half Jewish recruits and half Arabs. In practice Jews outnumbered Arabs because they had more affinity with Britain's war and they were under more pressure from their own community to enlist, but the mixed companies worked more effectively than many people expected and two years later the force was renamed the Palestine Regiment.¹²⁶

At the time of that cabinet meeting, a memorandum was being circulated summarizing the responses of Treasury, the Foreign Office, the Board of Trade and the MEW to the new, more supportive, American attitude. Considering that there were conflicting recommendations about whether to respond to Japanese demands with concessions or with tougher sanctions, it gave a very sobering assessment. As long as the war with Germany was in progress it was difficult to offer Japan any favourable consideration which would alleviate its position without damaging Britain's war effort. It was evident that for the long term, the opposition within the dominions to Japanese immigration, the impracticability of dismantling imperial preference solely for the benefit of Japan, and the impossibility of giving any cast-iron guarantee of Japanese access to raw materials meant that it was difficult to see how Japan, in its present aggressive state, could be satisfied. The head of the Far Eastern Department of the FO, John Sterndale Bennett, added a personal and very astute assessment that: "so long as Japan believes she can attain strategic and economic security by force or threat of force, she is unlikely to be satisfied with offers which will only partly meet her requirements." Japan wanted a new order: not just tinkering with the edges of the old. This made it clear that if Britain, as the nation wanting to maintain the status quo, was not prepared to make concessions under pressure then it appeared to have very little to offer even if Japan were to become more conciliatory. And if Britain was not prepared to work towards equality of opportunity, Japan had just as much to gain from unilateral expansionism as it did from multilateral negotiations, if not more.¹²⁷

That memorandum offered cabinet the opportunity to carefully reassess Britain's overall position. It encapsulated an understanding of the fundamentals required if twentieth century international relationships were to be put on a proper and stable basis. But it was too late. The crises were too deep and the pace of action and reaction too fast to permit a considered response. The US response to Japan's "provocation" in Indochina was not in that class. It was to announce, on September 26, the extension of embargoes on goods to Japan to include all scrap metal and all petroleum that could be processed into aviation fuel. It was then Hitler's turn. And Britain's response a few days later was no better. It was worse.

THE TRIPARTITE PACT

Hitler had pressed for the Soviet-German treaty of non-aggression more than twelve months earlier to ensure that he had a free hand in the west but, as noted above, from about July 31, he had decided that he would have to change his priorities and knock Russia out of the war – quite quickly – to avoid being caught in a pincer movement if Britain and Russia formed an alliance against him.¹²⁸ In turn that meant that he had to ensure the preventative encirclement of Russia. He was in good company. That was exactly what Britain had been trying unsuccessfully to do, but Hitler achieved his objective and upstaged the United States and Britain by signing the Tripartite Pact between Germany, Italy and Japan – the key player – with much pomp and ceremony in Berlin on September 27, the day after the extended US embargoes were announced. With the signing of the Tripartite Pact, and without realizing it, Hitler had added another chain to anchor the beacon which the British MEW had tossed into the Sea of Japan a few months earlier: its bid to encircle Russia with an embargo imposed jointly by Britain, France, Japan and the United States. [Chapter 23]

The key clauses of the Tripartite Pact recognized each country's principal sphere of influence and provided for mutual support in the event that any one of the three was attacked by the United States. Russia, being omitted from the pact, was clearly apprehensive.¹²⁹ It had good reason to be. Although Russia had a non-aggression pact with Germany, and Germany was in formal alliance with Japan, there was no treaty between Russia and Japan which had been courted by both of the teams ranged against it. In fact there was continuing animosity. And although Japan and the US were jockeying for position in the East they were also having discussions aimed at reaching an understanding short of war, with the common aim of greatly reducing the influence of the European powers in Asia.

The game of musical chairs – or beggar my neighbour – was approaching a climax. The teams for Gog and Magog had virtually been decided. The only question was what the role of the Soviet Russia would be. It had an alliance with Hitler's Germany, it had been wooed and rejected alternately by the Western Allies, and it had an assortment of alliances arraigned against it. Would it be left out in the cold to fend for itself or would it, if Hitler turned against it, be called on by the Western Allies to help defeat what would then be their common enemy? The ball lay in Hitler's court.

The signing and the timing of the Tripartite Pact, firmly linking Japan to the interests of Germany and Italy, must be looked at taking account of several related issues. They include the Jewish question; the politicking over a possible Anglo-German peace agreement, linked with the evolution of Japan's Fugu Plan; the American reaction to these matters; and Italy and the Vatican's response. It is necessary to do some more back-tracking to pick up some threads as we come to each issue in turn.

Concerning the Jewish Question. It is clear that Japan took no account of Hitler's anti-Semitic program in signing the pact. By arrangement with the American Joint Distribution Committee, 2,400 Jewish refugees from Poland, then accommodated in Lithuania, left for Japan in three months beginning September 1940.¹³⁰ Exactly how that refugee shipment relates to Japan's Fugu Plan for the large scale settlement of Jewish refugees in the region of Manchuria – immediately across the Sino-Soviet border from BiraBidzhan – which had been captured from China a decade earlier, is not clear, but several things are apparent. Japan had no wish to be associated with Christian anti-Semitism, its interest in assisted settlement was basically prompted by considerations of national development and security, and its attitude towards Jewish immigration and integration reflects the Japanese understanding of racial equality and encompasses some of the humanitarian elements of both Boleslav's charter for Jews in Poland and Russia's plan for BiraBidzhan. Similarly, Japan continued to allow unrestricted refugee movement into the Chinese mainland free port region of Shanghai which it had controlled since 1937, immediately adjacent to its European and American fortified trading and listening posts, and the number of Jewish settlers there rose from 1,500 in December 1938 to 14,000 in May 1939. At that point, instead of encouraging unimpeded access through Shanghai as a refugee escape route the earlier Jewish settlers, fearing “an excess of refugees” approached the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee and the end result was what Yahil describes as a strange “international conspiracy” involving the JDC, a Jewish settlement agency HICEM, the Committee for German Jews in London, the B’nai B’rith, the governments of the United States, Britain and France, and the Ezra (emigration) Society in Germany which led to directions from the US Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, that this traffic was to stop.¹³¹

Next, concerning politicking over a possible Anglo-German peace agreement. While Hitler was intent on facilitating his long term plans by reaching a settlement with Britain, he and the Nazi authorities were intensifying their campaign against the Jews and they were intent on forcing the emigration of Jews from Germany and the occupied territories or their deportation to any country which would accept them. Hitler does not appear to have understood any more clearly than most other people that Britain’s complex of contradictory undertakings had made those portions of his war aims, as well as Britain’s, quite incompatible. Exit visas were still being issued to Jews for travel from German territories to the United States and, as already noted, these were not stopped until the end of 1941, five months after the ‘final solution’ instructions had been issued, when the United States and Germany were formally at war, and no systematic genocide programs had been undertaken even though it is now apparent that they were being planned, presumably on a ‘contingency basis’ to be put into effect in the event that Hitler was not able to achieve total deportation and expulsion in the context of a peace deal with Britain.

THE FUGU PLAN

In fact Hitler’s anti-Semitism had provided a strong stimulus for the development of Japan’s ‘Fugu Plan’¹³² which, in retrospect and together with the BiraBidzhan Project, assumes enormous importance in the unfolding trouble in the triangle and in our understanding of the Night Journey. The plan was devised by Japanese Government authorities to utilize the manpower, skills and financial resources of Jewish refugees to boost the economic development of Manchuria and in doing so to enable Japan to consolidate its grip on the region which it annexed from China in 1931, in return for security and a safe haven. The Jewish community was to have local autonomy within the framework of a subordinate Japanese state. The Fugu Plan therefore bears remarkable similarity to the Model Charter for the Protection of Liberties for the Jews which Boleslav the Pious introduced in Poland at the time of the Crusades. (Chapter 9, pp. 1–2) Its origins, or the issues which prompted it, were also virtually the same. The origins of the Fugu Plan lie in the events of the late nineteenth century when Europe’s Jews were reacting to their degrading treatment at the hands of the church and the Great Powers and crying ‘let’s find a new home,’ and while Japan was reacting to the oppressive tactics of the same Great Powers plus the United States in breaking its isolationism, forcing the opening of Japan to outside traders, and undermining its existing social and economic structures.

Manchuria, although it had provided China's ruling dynasty for two hundred and fifty years, had vast areas of harsh, inhospitable and thus under-populated territory, rich in resources, difficult to defend and wide open to outside exploitation. Japan, its isolationism broken and prompted into an expansionist mood, occupied part of southern Manchuria in 1895 and watched while Tsarist Russia gained control of the Kwantung Peninsula region three years later. The two colonizing powers built railways to facilitate exploitation and competed for influence. Then in 1904 Japan attacked Russia, seeking to occupy Manchuria as a buffer between itself and Tsarist Russia. With his country facing the prospect of defeat, the Vice-Governor of the Bank of Japan, Baron Takahashi, sought loans in London to finance the war. He received little encouragement until an American Jewish banker, Jacob Schiff, influenced by Tsarist Russia's generally anti-Semitic policies, agreed to raise the loans required. Thus sustained, Japan defeated the Russian forces and was able to negotiate a favourable settlement under the Treaty of Portsmouth which enabled it to strengthen its position in southern Manchuria.

For the next twenty five years the position was very fluid and confused, and in 1931 Japan's military leaders, stung into action by the world wide recession and having virtual control of the government, decided to occupy and annex all of Manchuria. But when they did so they were unable to persuade Japanese to settle in the inhospitable area in sufficient numbers to carry out their development plans or to consolidate Japan's grip. In 1932 Manchuria was renamed the Independent State of Manchukuo, and Gisuke Ayukawa, founder of Nissan Industries, noting that during the years that the north was under Tsarist control (and in contrast to his domestic policies) Nicholas II had sought to Russify the region by offering 'concessions' to Russian Jews to settle there, proposed a plan to encourage additional Jewish settlement.¹³³ The concessions which the Tsar had offered were simple: freedom of religion, unrestricted business rights and quota-free schooling.¹³⁴ However they were sufficient to encourage some settlers, so that by the mid 1920s there was a strong community of thirteen thousand Jews settled in and around the key railway town of Harbin on the shortcut route from Chita and Manzhouli via Harbin to Vladivostok. By that time a large number of White Russians had arrived as a consequence of the Bolshevik Revolution, and the area of BiraBidzhan, on the main Trans Siberian route to Vladivostok, immediately adjacent to Manchuria across the Russian border, was being considered for a special Jewish settlement area. [See above, chapter 24, from p. 5.] BiraBidzhan had actually been declared a Jewish settlement area in March 1928 but because of the machinations of Soviet politics and ethnic affairs it was on the verge of being declared a failure. There had also been debate about the security aspects of its proximity to Japanese occupied Manchuria. However, while security was a major concern to the Japanese they do not appear to have been over concerned about the prospect of Jewish settlements on both sides of the border. Therefore when Hitler gained power in Germany early in 1933 and immediately began to impose restrictions on Jews, and Nazi mobs began to step up physical oppression, the prospects for a more favourable scheme of settlement in Manchukuo appeared to be good in spite of Japan's break with the League of Nations over its occupation of Manchuria.

However, with the White Russians had come a strong show of anti-Semitism, kidnapping, extortion and a return to a life of uncertainty for the Jews, and when the Japanese police arrived in 1931 they were influenced by the flood of anti-Semitic propaganda, including the notorious Protocols of the Elders of Zion, and they collaborated with the White Russians. Then in August, 1933, the kidnapping, torture and brutal murder of Simon Kaspe, the son of a wealthy Russian-born Jew with French citizenship, became the focus of a trial, retrial and blatant miscarriage of justice in which the Japanese police were entangled, and the Jewish community began to return to Europe in droves – condemning Japan as they did so. About 70 percent had gone by the mid 1930s. It was hardly the right environment in which to launch a new Jewish settlement plan, but the Japanese government was very eager to attract both settlers and investment and decided to proceed. About the same time that the Supreme Soviet announced that Birobidzhan would be upgraded to an Autonomous Jewish Region in a last ditch effort to get that scheme moving, (May 1934), the Japanese Foreign Ministry gave extensive publicity to ‘A Plan to invite 50,000 German Jews to Manchukuo.’ There were apparently no immediate ‘negative repercussions.’ Then, although its announced target was several times more settlers than the net increase in the number of Jewish settlers in Birobidzhan (14,000 at the end of 1935), it worked with sensitivity to encourage Jewish settlers and to avoid being seen as desperate to woo them.¹³⁵

Relations between the Japanese authorities and the Jewish settlers of Harbin gradually returned to normal and in 1937 the Far Eastern Jewish Council was established with Dr. Abraham Kaufman as chairman. It was welcomed by the Japanese government and admitted to membership of the World Jewish Congress. In December that year it hosted the first Conference of Jewish Communities in the Far East, attracting some 700 persons from Manchukuo, Japan and Shanghai. Japan had invaded China in July and annexed the Chinese sector of Shanghai (but not the International settlement or the French Concession which, together, accommodated 38,000 foreign residents including 4,700 Jews¹³⁶), and it was in the process of capturing Nanking which suffered 200,000 civilian casualties. Thus, as might be expected in view of the fact that there were very few Jews present from regions not controlled by Japan, the conference carried a resolution of support for Japan with a call for world wide Jewish support for Japan’s concept of a New Order in Asia.

*We Jews, attending this racial conference, hereby proclaim that we enjoy racial equality and racial justice under the national laws, and will cooperate with Japan and Manchukuo in building a new order in Asia. We appeal to our co-religionists.*¹³⁷

The New Year of 1938 opened with deepening crisis in the Middle East, with Hitler applying increasing pressure for Germany’s Jews to depart, with Britain hell bent on appeasing Hitler, and with Roosevelt extending invitations to his refugee talk fest at Evian – but no invitation was extended to either Japan or that other country which already had a well considered plan for Jewish settlement: Russia. The European Powers and the United States were not at war with them, but they both represented threats to the positions of privilege of those powers, so nothing would be done which might strengthen their ability to compete. Certainly not the saving of a few thousand Jews. It was as if the Western Powers were trying to force both Japan and Russia closer to alliances with Germany.

Then came Hitler's Kristallnacht, November 9–10, 1938, with its enormous pressure on Germany's Jews to flee, and the retaliatory boycott of German imports into the United States, led by American Jewry, which placed Japan under equally great pressure to think carefully about its foreign relations. It had only recently signed a cultural agreement with Germany and as a consequence several Japanese institutions had already dismissed Jewish staff. A special meeting of Japan's five top cabinet ministers and their advisers was convened for December 5, 1938. The problem was: should Japan persevere with its plan for Jewish settlement or discard it, and, if it persevered, under what conditions should it do so? The ministers and their advisers were divided. There was a general consensus that Japan needed as much capital as it could secure and manpower and expertise to help it implement its plans not only in Manchukuo but elsewhere, and the government believed that the Jews could help provide all three.

But ... Japan was being pushed by the attitude of the United States closer and closer to a formal alliance with Germany. It should therefore be careful to avoid policies or actions which offended Germany, but it had to make sure that it determined its own policy and that it did not allow Hitler to dictate policy on important matters of foreign relations. On the other hand, Jewish influence on the President of the United States was considered to be very strong and a favourable relationship with the Jewish community could possibly swing the US towards acceptance of Japan's plan for a New Order in Asia and away from war to determine the pre-eminent power. There was also Russia. Some advisers feared that the close proximity between BiraBidzhan and Harbin provided a potential spearhead for either a Russian attack on Japan or a Russian-Jewish takeover of Manchuria followed by a push into China. This raised the additional question of whether the plan should be modified, with settlers encouraged to go to a region other than Manchukuo. Then there were alternative views on whether Jewish support for Japan would be greater if the Jewish community were given autonomy or semi-autonomy within the Japanese empire, or whether it should have only limited local authority, subject to Japanese direction in all major policy areas. The meeting, which became characterized as 'The Five Ministers' Conference', dragged on, but eventually consensus was reached.¹³⁸

*Our diplomatic ties with Germany and Italy require that we avoid publicly embracing the Jewish people, in the light of their rejection by our allies, but we should not reject them as they [our allies] do. ... This is particularly true in light of our need for foreign capital and our desire not to alienate America.*¹³⁹

The Fugu Plan remained alive, but the emphasis in its application changed. It was agreed that Jewish settlement was to be encouraged in Shanghai (where the Jewish population had been swollen by the arrival of 1,500 refugees from Germany during 1938) rather than Manchukuo, but the flow of available capital was to be directed as much as possible to Manchukuo. Early in 1939 the senior army and navy officers responsible for implementing the plan moved from Harbin to the Japanese consulate in Shanghai where they worked in close collaboration with the consul general. Then in March, when German troops occupied Czechoslovakia, Lew Zikman, a wealthy Manchurian Jew, proposed the establishment of a leather working industry based on two hundred skilled leather workers and their families on the outskirts of an existing town in Manchukuo. Zikman planned to finance the venture partly from his own funds and partly from American sources in spite of trenchant opposition from Stephen Wise. He was in no doubt about the strength of Wise's opposition to Jewish collaboration with the Japanese as a result of an exchange of correspondence some time in 1938. Wise had campaigned vigorously against Japan's "criminal aggression" in China and in his letter to Zikman he wrote that "it is wholly vicious for Jews to give support to Japan", that he "deeply deplored whatever your reason may be that you are trying to secure support for Japan from Jews", that Zikman was doing "a great disservice to the Jewish people ... for reasons which are invalid and without regard for the fact that Japan is like Germany ... bound to take an anti-Semitic attitude", that he (Wise) would do all that he could to thwart Zikman's plans, and that he wished to have no further discussions on the matter.¹⁴⁰

By June, 1939, the Japanese officers had completed a project study based on Zikman's proposal with the rather clumsy but very frank title 'Concrete Measures to be Employed to Turn Friendly to Japan the Public opinion Far East Diplomatic Policy Close Circle of President of USA by Manipulating Influential Jews in China.' Several alternative sites in both Manchukuo and Shanghai were considered with ultimate target populations ranging from a low of 18,000 persons to a high of 900,000 persons. On July 7 the report was formally adopted by the Japanese administration in Central China for consideration by the government in Tokyo. It was given the much simpler title 'The Study and Analysis of Introducing Jewish Capital' and one important qualification was added. A recommendation by one of the drafting officers that the Jewish settlement area should be fully autonomous except in matters of foreign affairs and defence was struck out and it was noted that autonomy would be restricted to religious, educational and cultural matters.¹⁴¹ About the same time, while the MacDonald White Paper on Palestine was being contested before the League of Nations, the Pacific Trading Company was established with initial capital of $US700,000 provided by a combination of Japanese, Chinese and Jewish sources in Shanghai.¹⁴²

In the meantime Dr Kaufman had been invited to spend the month of May in Tokyo for consultations and he had been honoured with an Imperial Award; steps had been taken to convene a third conference of the Far Eastern Jewish Communities in December at Harbin; and contacts were established with other Jews in New York in a bid to arrange face to face talks with Wise which might help to overcome his opposition. But the rate of arrival of Jewish refugees in Shanghai had risen to close to one thousand a month and, much to the surprise and consternation of the Japanese authorities, this led to pressure from the existing Jewish community for the rate of arrivals to be stemmed. The longer-settled Jews were concerned that with the arrival of the refugees, many of whom were quite poor and became a temporary drag on welfare resources available, the number of Jews in greater Shanghai exceeded the total number of all other expatriates from the UK, France and the USA, and that this could lead to pogroms. [See above, this chapter, p. 19, the ‘international conspiracy’ to reduce the flow of refugees.] Thus, when the FEJC Conference went ahead as planned on December 23–26, 1939, almost four months after Hitler’s invasion of Poland and Britain’s declaration of war, it carried a resolution which was later referred to the World Jewish Congress, no doubt in the hope that it would be adopted as a resolution of that Congress. The resolution noted that Jewish refugees were “overflowing in some places in the Far East, particularly in Shanghai,” expressed gratitude to Japan for its kind treatment of the immigrants and refugees as well as Jewish residents, and continued:

Several thousand have no place in which to live and are being accommodated in school buildings and the like. We, the world Jewish community, will be much obliged to Japan if she offers to these refugees some place to live and settle comfortably in the Far East through Imperial Japanese effort. In the case of Japanese compliance (i.e. if Japan offers some land) we shall be responsible for the construction of that settlement and hereby promise to cooperate in building a new Asia as much as we can.¹⁴³

The text of that resolution had not reached Wise when he agreed to meet Mitsuzo Tamura, an American educated Japanese industrialist who had been asked to act as an unofficial emissary for the Fugu Plan team, early in the New Year of 1940. Wise listened to the basics of the proposal, reminded Tamura of the excesses of the Japanese military forces in occupied areas of Asia, and rejected the idea of Jewish involvement, suggesting that “it might be a rather unpatriotic thing for American Jews to do, even to discuss the future export of these items [required for the development of such a proposal] to a non-allied country without consulting at length with the State Department.” He then ignored Tamura’s plea that he either visit Japan himself or arrange for the visit of a delegation to assess the situation.¹⁴⁴ For practical purposes the Fugu Plan was dead. However, by July 1940, after the Nazis had overrun Holland, France had negotiated its armistice, Russia had occupied the Baltic States in accordance with its secret agreement with Hitler, and while the British Colonial Office was pressing the Foreign Office to consider Russia as an enemy country for purposes of Jewish immigration restrictions, Wise had softened his attitude to Japan somewhat. He wrote to Dr. Karl Kindermann, a German Jew living in Tokyo, to the effect that “any offer to settle Jewish refugees in Japan which would come from authoritative sources in Japan would certainly receive the fullest consideration of Jewish organizations.”¹⁴⁵

At the same time the Dutch Ambassador in Latvia, L. P. J. de Dekker, who had not yet been replaced by a German appointee, had realized that the Dutch colony of Curacao in the West Indies, well out of reach of Germany, had not changed its policy of visa-free entry and that it may admit some people on the basis of landing permits issued on arrival. He had therefore advised all of the Dutch Consuls in the Baltic countries to stamp the passports of Jewish refugees with the statement ‘No visa to Curacao is required’ to assist them to find a route out of Europe. It was up to the refugees to find a country which would provide a transit visa so that they could actually leave Europe and that would still be very difficult because most countries had already closed their borders. However a very resourceful young Dutch-educated but Belgian-born Jewish student, Nathan Gutwirth, who was then studying at the Tels Yeshiva in Lithuania, learned that it had been Japan's policy to issue short term transit visas if a person already had a visa to another country. Armed with his Dutch Curacao stamp, he approached the Japanese Consul in Kovno, Senpo Sugihara, and applied for a transit visa. Sugihara hesitated, but issued a visa. In doing so he triggered an avalanche of similar applications as word of his action spread through the Yeshiva and the Jewish community. He consulted the Japanese Foreign Ministry in Tokyo and was instructed that, in common with other countries, Japan's policy had been tightened and a valid entry visa to another country was required. After agonizing over the plight of the Jewish refugees for some time he decided to take the risk of acting on his own authority and against the instructions of his Foreign Ministry. During the next few months, until he was moved to another post, Sugihara issued 6,000 such transit visas. In spite of the fact that he was, by then, negotiating the Tripartite Pact, the Japanese Foreign Minister, Matsuoka, instructed that they should be honoured.

It was at that point, in the middle of the three-month negotiations for the signing of the Tripartite Pact, that the Jewish Desk of the German Foreign Office submitted detailed plans to transfer four million Jews en masse to the greatly exploited and neglected semi-independent Indian Ocean island of Madagascar.¹⁴⁶

BRITAIN OUTMANOEUVRED

So we are up to date again. On September 27, 1940, the Tripartite Pact was a reality. Hitler had totally outmanoeuvred Britain. The countries which Halifax had proposed as members of an alliance against Germany, and which the Vatican had sought to convert into an alliance against the Soviet Union – with Germany added for good measure, were now aligned as partners in an alliance aimed against the United States which was fast becoming the key prop supporting Britain. The ships of state wallowing around the MEW's beacon in the Sea of Japan had lost their bearings, turned full circle and, in doing so, ensured that it was completely impossible to disentangle the crises of the European theatre from those of the Asian and Far East theatre, or to avoid both the United States and Japan becoming fully involved. It was a world crisis in every sense of the word.

Britain's relationship with Japan had been under strain for a long time but as a consequence of the events and decisions taken since June 11 – the day that Whitehall rebuffed Japan's request that Britain withdraw its remaining gun boats and troops from China in order to avoid any clash with the Italian garrison in Shanghai – it was now in tatters. Japan had tied its flag firmly to the opposition mast and Hull had responded with aggression, proposing on September 30 that Britain and the US should begin staff talks. But not everyone in Whitehall or in the British diplomatic outposts regarded the position as irretrievable or was comfortable with Hull's new cooperative 'tough line on Japan'

Craigie and Vansittart were among those who saw the American attitude as excessive and feared that it could all too easily lead to a confrontation which would divert US resources away from the war against the main enemy, Nazi Germany. Craigie suggested that it was likely that Britain would become involved in an American-Japanese war and recommended caution. But when the war cabinet met on October 3, only a day after approving the establishment of a Far Eastern Committee chaired by Butler which was to find a way of restricting Japan's support for Germany without precipitating an expansion of the war, the prevailing attitude was not caution but confrontation. Craigie's advice was ignored and the decision was taken that the Burma Road agreement would not be renewed, that the road would be reopened on October 18, and that the decision would be made public ten days in advance through a statement to parliament. Churchill, who believed that it was to Britain's advantage to break America's isolation, responded to Craigie's advice with a scorching note to Halifax dated October 4.¹⁴⁷ It was not only a reprimand for Craigie, it was clear conformation that Churchill neither saw, nor looked for, any possibility of a negotiated settlement and that his only route to 'peace' was through an escalation of the war to the point of total German defeat and destruction – with the United States involved and the sooner the better. With Churchill holding the reins so tightly, Halifax might as well have filed the interdepartmental memorandum of September 25 in the archives straight away. Churchill wrote:

This shows the very serious misconception which has grown in Sir R. Craigie's mind about the consequences of the United States entering the war. He should surely be told forthwith that the entry of the United States into war either with Germany or Italy or with Japan is fully compatible with British interests. [Emphasis added.]

That nothing in the munitions sphere can compare with the importance of the British Empire and the United States being co-belligerent, that if Japan attacked the United States without declaring war on us we should at once range ourselves at the side of the United States and declare war upon Japan.¹⁴⁸

Churchill was well and truly embarked on his course of breaking America's isolation, escalating the war and coercing the US into direct involvement. On the same day that he wrote that scorching memo to Halifax he wrote to Roosevelt requesting that a squadron of US cruisers be sent to Singapore. Churchill's stated reason – that it might prevent the war from spreading – was not consistent with his note to Halifax, and neither was it interpreted that way in the Far East section of US naval intelligence.¹⁴⁹

THE US AND MCCOLLUM'S MEMO

Every power was feeling insecure. Every power: including Germany, Russia and the United States. International relationships were greatly undermined by a lack of frankness, the withholding of information and downright dishonesty to such an extent that mixed and confusing signals were flying in all directions. Preliminary British approaches to Molotov brought the response that the Tripartite Pact had changed nothing as far as Russia was concerned and there would be no shift in its foreign policy. And while Churchill penned that scorching note Hitler and Mussolini were conferring at the Brenner Pass. Hitler told the Duce he was worried about Spain's demands. If he gave in to Franco the English would occupy the Canaries and the French colonies in North Africa would join de Gaulle. Against that, the Metropolitan French may join him in Europe against Britain. Concerning Russia, Hitler said his distrust of Stalin was equalled by Stalin's distrust of him and he now had the task of directing Russia's dynamism towards India.¹⁵⁰ The New York Times report of that meeting by its bureau chief in Rome noted that: "The Axis is out to defeat President Roosevelt not as a measure of internal policies of the United States but because of the President's foreign policy."¹⁵¹ [Emphasis added.] And the US? Anglo-American economic embargo talks progressed, then stalled. Why?

Based on the prevailing international situation and the latest intelligence from Japan, McCollum, still at the Far East Desk of Naval Intelligence, prepared a confidential five-page assessment in which he concluded that war between The United States and Japan was inevitable and that the United States should provoke it at a time which suited its interests. He summarized the relationships between the major world powers and the strengths and weaknesses of the US and Japanese positions concisely, and advocated an eight-action program which he believed would lead to a Japanese attack on the United States which would provide the justification for entry into the war by the United States on its own terms. According to evidence which author and researcher Robert B. Stinnett describes as "conclusive" the McCollum assessment went to both the director of US naval intelligence, Captain Walter S. Anderson, and the president on October 7 and Roosevelt took the first action consistent with McCollum's proposals the very next day. Stinnett demonstrates that the McCollum plan was basic to the US modus operandi for the Far East from then until December 7, 1941, and that each of its action proposals were put into effect systematically over that period.¹⁵² It is therefore of such importance that extracts from McCollum's assessment are set out here with his action proposals in full.¹⁵³

The United States today finds herself confronted by a hostile Germany and Italy in Europe and by an equally hostile Japan in the Orient. Russia, the great land link between these two groups of hostile powers, is at present neutral, but in all probability favourably inclined towards the Axis Powers, and her favourable attitude towards these powers may be expected to increase in direct proportion to increasing success in their prosecution of the war in Europe. Germany and Italy have been successful in war on the Continent of Europe and all of Europe is either under their military control or has been forced into subservience. Only the British Empire is actively opposing by war the growing world dominance of Germany and Italy and their satellites.[Paragraph 1. In full.]

... Paradoxically, every success of German and Italian arms has led to further increases in United States sympathy for and material support of the British Empire, until at the present time the United States government stands committed to a policy of rendering every support short of war with the chances rapidly increasing that the United States will become a full fledged ally of the British Empire in the very near future. The final failure of German and Italian diplomacy to keep the United States in the role of a disinterested spectator has forced them to adopt the policy of developing threats to US security in other spheres of the world, notably by the threat of revolutions in in South and Central America by Axis-dominated groups and by the stimulation of Japan to further aggressions and threats in the Far East in the hope that by these means the United States would become so confused in thought and fearful of her own immediate security as to cause her to become so preoccupied in purely defensive preparations as to virtually preclude US aid to Great Britain in any form. As a result of this policy, Germany and Italy have lately concluded a military alliance with Japan directed against the United States. ... After England has been disposed of, her enemies will decide whether or not to immediately proceed with an attack on the United States. Due to geographic conditions, neither Germany nor Italy are in a position to offer any material aid to Japan. Japan, on the contrary, can be of much help to both Germany and Italy by threatening and possibly even attacking British Dominions and supply routes from Australia, India and the Dutch east Indies, thus materially weakening Britain's position in opposition to the Axis forces in Europe. ... [2. Emphasis added.]

... There is little that we can do now, immediately, to help Britain that is not already being done. We have no trained army to send to the assistance of England, nor will we have for at least a year. We are now trying to increase the flow of materials to England and to bolster the defence of England in every practicable way and this aid will undoubtedly be increased. On the other hand, there is little that Germany or Italy can do against us as long as England continues in the war and her navy maintains control of the Atlantic. The one danger to our position lies in the possible early defeat of the British Empire with the British fleet falling intact into the hands of the Axis powers. The possibility of such an event occurring would be materially lessened were we actually allied in war with the British or at the very least were taking active measures to relieve the pressure on Britain in other spheres of action. [3. Emphasis added.]

In the Pacific, Japan by virtue of her alliance with Germany and Italy is a definite threat to the security of the British Empire and once the British Empire is gone the power of Japan-Germany and Italy is to be directed against the United States. A powerful land attack by Germany and Italy through the Balkans and North Africa against the Suez Canal with a Japanese threat or attack on Singapore would have very serious results for the British Empire. Could Japan be diverted or neutralized, the fruits of a successful attack on the Suez Canal could not be as far reaching and beneficial to the Axis Powers as if such a success was also accompanied by the virtual elimination of British sea power from the Indian Ocean, thus opening up a European supply route for Japan and a sea route for Eastern raw materials to reach Germany and Italy. Japan must be diverted if the British and American blockade of Europe and possibly Japan (?) is to remain even partially in effect. [4. In full. Emphasis added.]

CAUSE FOR REFLECTION

While ... there is little that the United States can do to immediately retrieve the situation in Europe, the United States is able to effectively nullify Japanese aggressive action, and do it without lessening US material assistance to Great Britain. [5. Emphasis added.]

... A prompt and early declaration of war [against Japan] after entering into suitable arrangements with England and Holland, would be most effective in bringing about the early collapse of Japan and thus eliminating our enemy in the Pacific before Germany and Italy could strike at us effectively. ... [8.]

It is not believed that in the present state of political opinion the United States government is capable of declaring war against Japan without more ado; and it is barely possible that vigorous action on our part might lead the Japanese to modify their attitude. Therefore, the following course of action is suggested:

A. Make an arrangement with Britain for the use of British bases in the Pacific, particularly Singapore.

B. Make an arrangement with Holland for the use of base facilities and acquisition of supplies in the Dutch East Indies.

C. Give all possible aid to the Chinese Government of Chiang Kai-shek.

D. Send a division of long range heavy cruisers to the Orient, Philippines, or Singapore.

E. Send two divisions of submarines to the Orient.

F. Keep the main strength of the US Fleet now in the Pacific in the vicinity of the Hawaiian Islands.

G. Insist that the Dutch refuse to grant Japanese demands for undue economic concessions, particularly oil.

H. Completely embargo all US trade with Japan, in collaboration with a similar embargo imposed by the British Empire. [9. In full.]

If by these means Japan could be led to commit an overt act of war, so much the better. At all events we must be fully prepared to accept the threat of war. [10. In full. Emphasis added.]

The self-styled 'New Israel' was in the act of rewriting the rule book for peace procedures. Next day, October 8, the State Department openly and blatantly advised all Americans to evacuate Far Eastern countries as quickly as possible¹⁵⁴ and Roosevelt ordered Richardson to base the United States Fleet in Hawaiian waters. The provocation process had been activated on two fronts. It was three months since the Fleet Commander had disputed the president's previous order to hold the fleet there 'temporarily' and he now told Roosevelt very bluntly that "senior officers of the Navy do not have the trust and confidence in the civilian leadership of this country that is essential for the successful prosecution of a war in the Pacific." He later claimed that Roosevelt said at that meeting that sooner or later "the Japanese would commit an overt act against the United States and the nation would be willing to enter the war” and that he then objected to the president’s “willingness to sacrifice a ship of the Navy in order to provoke what he called a Japanese ‘mistake’.”¹⁵⁵

Mussolini very soon obliged the US intelligence service by demonstrating that its assessment of a pincer movement to sever Britain’s Suez Canal lifeline was accurate. A week after the McCollum memorandum, on October 15, he briefed Italy’s war leaders on his decision to invade Greece using the forces which were already occupying Albania. According to his address to those national leaders, his aim was to threaten Britain’s approach to Suez and then, when Egypt had been occupied, force its navy out of Alexandria and leave it with no friendly ports to harbour in. He did not expect trouble from other Balkans countries because Yugoslavia had “every interest to keep quiet,” as did Turkey because Germany already controlled Roumania, and Bulgaria had increased its strength and would cooperate “so as not to miss the present unique opportunity for achieving her aspirations in Macedonia and for an outlet to the sea ...”¹⁵⁶

Pius XII was already ‘convinced’ – confident might be a better word – that war between Germany and the Soviet Union was only a matter of time, and probably around May, six months earlier than Mussolini’s decision on Greece, the Vatican had laid plans for quasi-missionaries to accompany the advancing German forces into ‘liberated’ areas. Cardinal Eugene Tisserant had responsibility for organizing the Congregation for the Eastern Churches, and he is reported to have told a colleague in Paris, Cardinal Emmanuel Suhard, in May: “I fear that history will reproach the Holy See for having practiced a policy of selfish convenience and little else.”¹⁵⁷ Nazi officials were soon well aware of the policy and in July the head of the Reich Ministry of the East, Alfred Rosenberg, forbade the entry of Catholic ‘missionaries’ into the ‘liberated’ areas of Poland.¹⁵⁸ Given the probability that if the Soviet Union was goaded by Hitler into moving first, and the expectation that Stalin would suppress the Christian Churches as his forces moved west – or southwest into the Balkans where Yugoslavia was regarded as a last-ditch bulwark against Communism for Italy and the Mediterranean – some members of the Curia viewed Mussolini’s plans “with a measure of optimism.”¹⁵⁹ One person who did not share their optimism was Hitler. A distraction in the Balkans was something he could do without. However he was not to learn about the decision Mussolini had taken until it was too late to stop him. Mussolini wrote to him on October 19 to advise him but the letter followed him around Europe for seven or eight days.¹⁶⁰

Like McCollum and his US intelligence colleagues, Chiang Kai-Shek had also taken careful note of the Tripartite Pact and out of fear that closer German-Japanese ties might make Russia cut back on aid to China as a conciliatory gesture to Japan, China asked for more British aid – on the same day that Mussolini wrote to Hitler about his plans. Chiang Kai-Shek feared that Japan would then either be free to step up its campaigns in China or to pursue its push south to occupy Europe’s colonies, and this forced the Foreign Office to explore Russia’s intentions more carefully, especially as Hitler was moving to consolidate his support in an area of major importance – in the Middle East. There had been intermittent discussions with the Iraqi delegation and Berlin and Rome issued concurrent, common declarations on October 21. They offered sympathy for Arab efforts to achieve independence but because Italy, especially, was still trying to conceal its ambitions, the declarations were somewhat insipid. They were received with disappointment by Arab leaders who saw them as failing to clarify the ambiguity in the Axis powers' positions on 'the Arab question': the future of Palestine. The statements read:

*Germany (Italy) which has always been animated by sentiments of friendship for the Arabs and cherishes the wish that they may prosper and be happy, and assume a place among the peoples of the earth in accordance with their historic and natural importance, has always watched with interest the struggles of the Arab countries to achieve their independence. In their effort to obtain this goal, the Arab countries can count upon Germany's (Italy's) full sympathy. In making this statement Germany (Italy) finds itself in full accord with her Italian (German) ally.*¹⁶¹

Even so, the declarations increased British fears about a German-Arab alliance, aggravated the situation in Palestine, gave the Zionists the opportunity to raise the price of their support, and also increased British concerns about a possible Russian push into oil-rich Persia, through the Afghan gateway to India, or into China.

On October 22 Ambassador Cripps, in Moscow, warned Russia of the consequences of a Chinese collapse and made a totally cynical offer of de facto recognition of the Soviet Union's sovereignty over the Baltic States (in spite of Britain having mounted such opposition to its Finnish intervention) in return for cooperation in the Far East. Molotov's deputy, Vyshinsky, dismissed the transparent bribe. He confirmed earlier advice that the Tripartite Pact had changed nothing and rejected the suggestion that a Soviet pact with Japan was imminent. Then next day, October 23, the US State Department, acting in line with Hull's instruction that he would not be available for decisions on detail until after the presidential election, said there could be no formal talks until after that election.¹⁶² Morgenthau had told US Treasury officials the same thing, concerning financial support arrangements, two days earlier.¹⁶³

And there was another major complication, too. Those ships of state wallowing around the MEW's beacon in the Sea of Japan had also ensured that 'The Jewish Question' was a matter of concern in the Far East as well as in Europe, the Middle East, Africa, and the New World. During October, 6,500 German Jews from the Rhineland were deported to southern France, where Marshall Petain ordered the establishment of internment camps for foreign Jews and stripped Algerian Jews of their French citizenship. Hitler then found, no doubt to his great pleasure, that he was in good company again in planning mass internment camps for Jews in the southern India Ocean. Britain was doing exactly the same.

'ENEMY ALIENS'

In mid-October, when the Colonial Office was advised that five ships carrying a total of nearly 6,000 refugees were already at sea on route to Palestine, it persuaded the government of Mauritius to accept these refugees for detention under restraint, in barbed wire concentration camps. As a deterrent against further attempts at illegal migration it announced that they would be held in Mauritius until the war ended and that they were permanently banned from entering Palestine. It also instructed the Governor of Trinidad to prepare a second camp ready to receive deportees from Palestine.

The world was entitled to ask whether Britain was copying Hitler's example on this occasion, or was it simply returning to the policy of exporting its unwanted human debris which it had used so effectively in the New World of North America and Australia. In either case it certainly did Hitler's cause no harm that his Madagascar plan and Britain's Mauritius plan were getting world publicity at the same time. The legitimization of his own plan by its coincidence with Britain's was reason enough to keep the publicity going even if, as he knew, it would be impossible to carry out.

Britain's situation became very complicated. A bitter three-month row erupted involving Churchill, the Colonial Office, the High Commissioner in Palestine, the Jewish Agency and the Commander in Chief Middle East Forces, General Wavell. The row centred on the interception by British forces of five boats carrying illegal Jewish immigrants – refugees – into Palestine. Three of the five were unseaworthy. Three ships were then commandeered to take the illegal immigrants to the French island of Mauritius. One of the ships, the French liner, La Patria, was to carry the passengers from the three boats deemed unseaworthy. Hitler and Britain were in step again. Naturally the Jewish Agency didn't like the plan and, operating through Haganah, it arranged to wreck the engines of the La Patria to prevent the deportation. When someone miscalculated and used too much explosive the ship was wrecked and sank with the loss of 250 lives. But, never one to let an opportunity pass, the Jewish Agency used the same propaganda methods as both Hitler and Churchill – partial reporting, distortion and downright lies – and announced that the sinking was an act of mass suicide designed as a protest against British inhumanity.¹⁶⁴

The double war of intrigue which the Zionists were fighting – against Hitler's Germany on the one hand and against Britain of the White Paper on the other – backfired badly. Allied Governments were placed in the impossible position of never knowing when they might turn saboteurs, and their efforts to undermine Britain's policy played into the hands of rumour-mongering anti-Semites who had stepped up their campaign for the internment of "alien refugees" and enemy agents when the Battle of Britain erupted. They were therefore regarded as a potential fifth column and interned or deported in large numbers because, as even Churchill had to point out, governments and their security forces could not spend the time and effort required to vet the credentials of every Jew. The result was a further hardening of anti-Semitism in Britain and Allied countries which played into Hitler's hands. He could rely on it as a screen while he devised other means of quitting his Jews and he could expect a minimum of adverse publicity. He was right.

Churchill objected to the concentration camp conditions planned for both Mauritius and Trinidad and insisted that the early arrivals in Haifa, and the survivors, not be deported. He insisted that they be released to remain in Palestine and that only future illegal immigrants be deported to the two islands. Wavell objected, saying that their release would be disastrous from a military point of view, causing widespread disorder in Palestine and elsewhere. He insisted that if they were not deported he would have to withdraw his recommendation that a supply route be opened from Haifa to Basra via Iraq and Transjordan.^{165 166}

Hitler must have gloated over the confusion and how much Britain was also doing to restrict the Jews. He noted, yet again, how few other people wanted them as neighbours, and pressed on with his own plans. He was very pleased to keep the Madagascar plan 'alive.' It helped to camouflage the purpose behind some of the other mass movements which were already taking place and which were accelerated after the fall of France in retaliation for the non-cooperation he was faced with from the Western Powers in his bid to force Jewish re-settlement in countries beyond Europe.

However Hitler would have had in mind two particular factors. Firstly, the abandonment in May 1940 of the plan to locate three million Jews in reservations in a semi-independent Lublin region of central Poland which had been announced in November 1939. (Chapter 23, pp. 14–16, 23) That plan could have accommodated Britain's 'nod' to Hitler that he could keep all of Poland and not only the Danzig Corridor if he agreed to 'cultural autonomy' in a 'rump state' in Central Poland. Secondly, the need to avoid offence to Japan in view of its Fugu Plan and his need to secure its signature on the Tripartite Pact as a buffer against Russia. In addition it has been suggested that while the objective of Madagascar was "the collective evacuation of the Jews from Europe" it was also intended as an enormous hostage ghetto to exact 'good behaviour' on the part of their 'racial brethren' in America.¹⁶⁷ In any case, by encouraging an attitude that the level of oppression could not get any worse, it appears to have lulled the Jewish community and the Western Powers into a more passive attitude towards Nazi plans than would have been the case if they realized that the last resort of all – genocide – would become the next item on the agenda.

A factor which certainly contributed to the more passive attitude was the confidence, verging on an assumption, in Zionist circles that the United States would eventually join the war and that this would prevent Hitler from going too far. That confidence was boosted by the adverse reaction in America to the announcement of the Tripartite Pact and because the matter of neutrality was fast becoming a charade. Roosevelt was only inhibited in his public statements and methods of providing financial support for Britain by fear that if he made a slip, a carefully orchestrated campaign by the America First Committee could lead to an electoral backlash at the presidential elections on November 5. The difference between the stated policies of the Democrats and the Republicans were gradually narrowing and revolved around the extent of the commitment to Britain rather than the fact of the commitment.¹⁶⁸ Roosevelt was edging his administration into a deeper commitment at every opportunity even though he was accused of wanting to bankrupt Britain in the process of defeating Hitler's Germany and Eden was moved to complain that he was imposing "an almost entirely American policy."¹⁶⁹

On October 25, with the election at fever pitch, following the disclosure that the Sterling area deficit was up from the estimate of $US1.6 billion to $US3.5 billion, Roosevelt appealed for Churchill to send him a letter which he could use to demonstrate Britain's parlous position and swing the US public behind him when he announced a new British purchasing program. Churchill responded two days later with a letter which he did not refer to in his memoirs, admitting very frankly that American supplies were necessary for British survival.¹⁷⁰

At some time during October, the Nazi authorities had discontinued granting exit visas to Jews from Poland on the grounds that their emigration to the United States was assisting American Jewry in its diplomatic and political battle against Germany. The Warsaw ghetto was established and Poland's Jews were given six weeks to make their way there.¹⁷¹ In contrast to this, no doubt as part of the Nazi politicking, some Jewish emigration from Germany was still permitted until the end of 1941.

In the adjacent countries to the north, Lithuania, Latvia and Estonia, which had all come under the control of Soviet Russia a year earlier when Hitler and Stalin partitioned Poland, the Jews were still welcome to settle in Russia's designated Jewish settlement area of Birobidzhan – provided that they accepted Russian citizenship. Very few chose to do so. The majority, with the support of the Zionist Organization, compounded the crises for themselves, for Russia, Britain and the Arabs by indicating that they wanted to go to Palestine. The Birobidzhan settlement plan was generally regarded as a failure by that time and major contributing factors were Zionist opposition to the scheme because it was a competitor to Palestine and the consequent reluctance of Jews to go there, but it had not been officially dissolved.¹⁷²

Many thousands of Jews had already been transported in shocking circumstances from Germany, Austria and Czechoslovakia to labour camps in central Poland in what may be described as 'gearing up exercises', and 35,000 Polish Jews living in Germany had been herded into concentration camps by the beginning of 1940. In other occupied countries the process of herding Jews into concentration camps or labour camps and mass movement from those countries to Poland for "deportation" did not begin until September or October 1940. By the end of October 1940, when the Colonial Office and Churchill were engrossed in their row over illegal migration to Palestine, there were thirty six such camps set up and by the end of the year the number had passed fifty. The first major ghetto, at Lodz, was planned in December 1939 and actually set up under an order dated February 8, 1940. It held 160,000 Jews by May 1940. The Warsaw ghetto (occupying two and a half percent of the city area behind eleven miles of ten foot high walls) was proposed by the SS in October 1939 but it did not become a reality until a year later, in October 1940, because construction had been delayed pending orders which were only issued in August 1940, coinciding with the preparation of the Madagascar plan. By January 1941 it held between 300,000 and 400,000 Jews – or about thirty percent of the city's population. In addition a number of smaller district ghettos were also set up between July 1940 and January 1941.¹⁷³

With the benefit of hindsight it is now apparent that the labour camps and ghettos were very convenient ‘holding pens’ which enabled Hitler to keep his various options open. First: very rapid mass deportation in the event that he was able to negotiate a peace settlement with Britain which gave him his ‘free hand’ to cleanse Europe of its Jews and which obliged Britain to arrange their mass transportation to other parts of the world. Second: being determined to rid Europe of its Jews, equally rapid deportation to any alternative site which may become available to him such as BiraBidzhan in the event of success against Russia. Third: a ready made site for killing fields, or ease of transportation to other killing fields in the event that he did not achieve either a peace settlement with Britain or a victory elsewhere and had to resort to his final option – a program of genocide. By means of his ‘gearing up’ program he had established during the pause for reflection that a mass transportation program could in fact be carried out without great difficulty. It is a sobering thought to recognize that natural unassisted migration from Europe to the United States alone had reached 1,285,000 in the previous peak year of 1907, when there were far fewer facilities available than in 1940. ¹⁷⁴ In any case the United States should not be regarded as the only potential home for Jewish refugees.

Whether the logistics of mass people-transportation need to be regarded as a major problem or not is relative to the competing demands for the facilities. When they wanted to do so, Britain and its allies were able to mobilize transport, stores and equipment, and shelter, for millions of personnel under arms in a very short time. The evacuation of Dunkirk during which one third of a million persons had already been transported across the English Channel in hastily gathered emergency relief fleets in three days was certainly a special case, but we can identify any number of major campaigns during the war years which required logistical support which makes the programmed transportation of Europe’s Jewish population – either as assisted migrants or as forced refugees – look like child’s play. The classic illustration is the Normandy landing in which 173,000 heavily armed and equipped troops were landed or parachuted into occupied areas on D-Day, June 6, 1944, and the number of troops so landed had reached 500,000 within two weeks. The total number of personnel mobilized and under arms during the war in all countries, and requiring enormous transport and support facilities is estimated at 112 million.¹⁷⁵ Of those, probably between 20 million and 25 million were transported by sea or air for service overseas. An estimated 17 million (15 percent of the total mobilized) were killed, together with 14 million civilians, and 15 million persons were transported or simply struggled backwards and forwards across Europe as homeless and stateless refugees when hostilities finally ceased. Countless millions of others suffered casualties.

Thus it cannot be argued that an estimated 4 million to 6 million persons could not have been transported out of Europe and re-settled in other countries according to an agreed plan if a negotiated peace had been accepted. It was a matter of the will to do it. However, that is not to suggest that it should have been necessary. Neither does it suggest that by doing so the trouble in the triangle would have been automatically resolved, nor that the Jewish community should have carried all the responsibility for the settlement of the long running crisis. What it does suggest is that the Holocaust need not have occurred in the manner in which it did if the trouble in the triangle had been recognized and approached from different perspectives or, in other words, if different decisions had been made by Zionist leaders and by leaders of the church and the amorphous Christian gel. Which ever way we turn we cannot escape that issue and we shall come back to those matters shortly.

ANOTHER ROUND OF BARGAINING

As the war escalated the warring parties spread their nets wider in their hunt for resources and to gain strategic positions. Spain, effectively able to control access to the Mediterranean if it joined the fray, became especially important. Following his unsuccessful bid to keep France in the war Churchill soon discarded his high sounding guarantees of protection for the French Empire and regarded its territories as bargaining chips, just like other pieces of Africa during the months leading up to the war. In early October, in an effort to keep Spain neutral, he instructed Halifax to let the Spanish know that Britain would be “no obstacle to their Moroccan ambitions,” but when Halifax suggested that the future of Gibraltar might also be negotiable Churchill rejected the idea.¹⁷⁶

Then Hitler demonstrated that his manoeuvres were not restricted to gathering land for Lebensraum through annexations and that he was now happy to trade people and their territory for alliances, just like a real British imperialist. He met Franco on the Spanish-French border on October 23, just when the US government was switching to standby-mode for its election, to persuade him to join an assault on Gibraltar and to share his vision for a New Order in Europe. There were to be rich rewards for Franco at Britain’s expense: Gibraltar plus a share of the French territories in Africa which would be offset by the transfer of British territories to France. Franco declined. Hitler could not understand such reluctance to support an invasion of Gibraltar which would isolate Britain from North Africa and the Middle East.¹⁷⁷ He did not know that Franco was of part Jewish ancestry and that he was not at all interested in a major plank of the Nazi New Order, although it appears that his staff were aware of it.

A few days later, probably on the 26th or 27th, Mussolini’s letter of October 19 finally reached Hitler and he immediately requested a meeting with the Duce. It took place at Florence on October 28. Too late. Before dawn that morning an Italian ultimatum requiring Greece to provide unimpeded access for Italian troops to march through Greece had been delivered to the Premier, General Metaxas, and Italian armies had crossed the border from Albania at several points at the same time. Metaxas immediately appealed for Britain to honour its 1939 security guarantee and Churchill responded.¹⁷⁸ But his response had less to do with honouring that guarantee – Churchill was not averse to ignoring an undertaking when it suited him, as in the case of ships for Singapore – than in facing down the threat to Britain’s naval base at Alexandria and the impending loss of its alternative bases in Greece.

Six days later, on November 4, the day before the United States presidential elections, Chiang Kai-Shek increased his pressure on Britain with a direct request for a Chinese-American-British Alliance, a new loan of up to 300 million pounds Sterling, and planes at the rate of one thousand per annum¹⁷⁹. Whitehall assumed that Chiang Kai-Shek was trailing a line to see what he could catch, but it was quite obvious that even if Britain could scrape together the funds for such a large loan, it could not respond to the request for aircraft from its own resources. The aircraft would have to come from either an expansion of Britain's debt commitment to the US, or direct assistance from the US if the three-party alliance was entered into. The second alternative was almost as threatening to Britain as a peace agreement between China and Japan. The ultimate effect of either agreement was likely to be the same: Britain would be required to forfeit its territorial rights in China. But the possible outcomes if Britain refused the request outright were even worse. China would probably either be defeated or chose a negotiated peace. The result in either case would be the same: Britain's expulsion and the release of Japanese forces to concentrate on the territories and colonies further south. The decision was one which Britain had to make on its own. It could not consult the United States on the issue directly. That matter took several weeks to work through.

In the meantime, with the presidential elections over and Roosevelt re-elected with a reduced but still substantial majority, the US cabinet could again consider matters such as Europe's war and how to accommodate Britain's financial needs and supply requirements. At a meeting on November 8, after freely conceding that loans or credits would eventually have to be arranged, Roosevelt said that Britain would first have to liquidate the properties and credits which it held in the United States. But then, almost casually, he changed tack and raised the possibility that the US could build and own ships and lend them to Britain, under a lease, together with "any other property that was loanable, returnable and insurable." He didn't press the matter and simply left the administration bureaucracy to think it over.¹⁸⁰ However enthusiasm for increased aid to Britain was growing and on November 12 four alternative grand strategies regarding Europe and Asia were submitted to Defence Secretary Knox. 'Plan D' was intended as a basis for US policy in the event of war in two theatres. It proposed offensive action in Europe and defence against Japan and appears to have been adopted as a semi-official basis for policy by the end of the month. The administration assumed that Germany was a threat to the Western Hemisphere and aid to Britain was therefore a matter of American national security. General Marshall then said that the administration must "resist proposals that do not have for their immediate goal the survival of the British Empire and the defeat of Germany."¹⁸¹

Then in mid-November, just after Hitler had invaded Rumania to get control of its oil fields and Mussolini had invaded Greece and taken the war right into the Middle East by bombing Saudi Arabia's oil facilities at Ras Tanura, Hitler welcomed Russian Foreign Minister Molotov to Berlin. The aims of that meeting were to resolve the tensions between Russia and Germany, to discuss expanding the Tripartite Pact into a four-power pact and to discuss another territorial carve up. Ribbentrop told Molotov that under the conditions then prevailing Germany would turn south to gain its Lebensraum in the former German colonies of Central Africa instead of east, towards Russia which was now Germany's ally. Russia, he suggested, should look for its expansion in Iran and India. But Molotov was more interested in Russian security in Europe, the Dardanelles, access to the Baltic and Germany's plans than he was in considering Russian expansion. He pressed Hitler for his plans in relation to Finland, Bulgaria, Romania, Turkey, the Balkans and the Black Sea region and he openly cast doubt on Germany's capacity to defeat Britain so that, as Ribbentrop put it, the Soviet Union could cooperate with Germany in the liquidation of the British Empire and end the rule of 600 million people by a mere 45 million British.¹⁸²

They must have also touched on the matters of the China-Japan war, Russia's relations with Japan, and Japan's freedom to widen its existing action. If they did not, Ribbentrop started drawing conclusions for himself, because shortly after his meeting with Molotov he told the Chinese ambassador in Berlin that China was faced with its last chance to make peace with Japan. That news was promptly brought to Britain's attention on November 19.¹⁸³ Coincidentally, next day, November 20, Shigemitsu met again with Lloyd and Hankey to pursue his mission proposal. At Lloyd's suggestion it was modified to a mission under the auspices of the British Council, of which he was president, with Hankey as mission leader, and it was agreed that he would put it to the Foreign Office. But at the same time that the moderates in the Japanese government were doing all they could to avoid war and to negotiate diplomatic settlements with both Britain and the United States they accommodated the military authorities by authorizing a fall-back position: preparations for general war in the event that diplomatic efforts failed to gain access to South East Asian resources for Japan. The Naval Minister, Admiral Koshiro Yamamoto met the newly appointed commander of the Japanese Imperial Navy informally to discuss the strategy for the opening of hostilities against Britain and the United States and agreed that if it were necessary a surprise air raid on Pearl Harbour should open Japan's offensive. Without realizing it, they were responding to the strategy set out in the McCollum provocation plan.¹⁸⁴

Other people had bombing strategy on their minds at that time, too. Pius XII, fearing that Britain might bomb Rome in retaliation for the bombing of Coventry Cathedral, appealed for the Eternal City to be declared an open city. Whitehall's reaction was firstly that the pope was cooperating as a propaganda front for Mussolini, and secondly that his pressing priority was the survival of the Vatican and the papacy. The Portuguese ambassador made a "grovelling" appeal to the Foreign Office which cancelled pleas for Pius XII to condemn the Coventry bombing and instead suggested that the Vatican lights should be left full on at night so that British bomber pilots could avoid it in raids on Rome. They were saying, in effect, 'if you want to stay there and save your hide you can provide a beacon to steer us to military targets in Rome.' The propaganda and counter-propaganda value of the pope's continued presence in Rome became a major consideration as the war progressed.¹⁸⁵

Hitler, utterly convinced of the correctness of his New Order, with its twin prongs of anti-Semitism and anti-Bolshevism, was disappointed that during his visit to Berlin Molotov, like Franco, failed to share his vision. His staff had also failed to tell him that the Russian minister's wife was Jewish. He later told Martin Bormann that it would be dishonorable for the Third Reich – the defender and protector of Europe – to submit to Soviet blackmail and to sacrifice Finland, Romania, Bulgaria and Turkey on the altar of Communism. Morally and strategically it would be a miserable gambit, he said and, being mesmerized by his own political and military successes, he admitted that he had come to regard himself as a man of destiny, superior to any other human being, whose genius and will power would conquer any enemy. He was the first and only mortal who had emerged into a super-human state with a nature “more god-like than human.” As the first of the new race of supermen he was not bound by any of the “conventions of human morality” and he therefore “stood above the law.”¹⁸⁶ Hitler’s delusions of messianic grandeur had assumed even more frightening proportions than those he expressed on the day of the failed assassination attempt in Munich.

The news from Berlin caused two distinctly different reactions in Whitehall. Churchill, consistent with his reproach of Craigie, increasingly saw the Pacific and East Asia as an American responsibility and even played down the likelihood of it entering the war. On November 22 he wrote to the First Lord of the Admiralty, A.V. Alexander, noting:

*Should Japan enter the war on one side and the United States on ours, ample naval forces will be available to contain Japan by long-range controls in the Pacific. The Japanese Navy is not likely to venture far from its home bases so long as a superior fleet is maintained at Singapore or Honolulu. The Japanese would never attempt a siege of Singapore with a hostile, superior American fleet in the Pacific.*¹⁸⁷

Next day, in sharp contrast, Halifax also wrote to Alexander and urged him to send a naval squadron to Singapore. In his reply, Alexander does not appear to have referred to the note from Churchill but he pointed out that the Royal Navy was so over stretched that it could not afford to send any forces to the East and the only “real deterrent to Japanese aggression (was) the willing and open cooperation of the United States.”¹⁸⁸ That financial situation had been brought into sharp focus by disclosures in New York on the day that Halifax wrote to Alexander, and the policy of dependence on the US was to be brought into question only a few days later.

When he arrived back in the US on November 23 after a break which had been deliberately timed so that he would not be in the country during the final stages of the presidential elections, Ambassador Lord Lothian held an impromptu press conference at the airport. He stunned reporters, triggered headlines and set the newsreel cameras whirring when he told them bluntly: “Well boys, Britain’s broke; it’s your money we want.”¹⁸⁹ He admitted that Britain could pay cash for only another six months to a year and that it had to have financial aid in 1941. The close relationship between Churchill and Roosevelt, and circumstantial evidence suggest that the nature and timing of the disclosure, two weeks after Roosevelt’s casual suggestion of lease arrangements in cabinet, were quite deliberate and were probably initiated by Churchill who complained about the slow response by the Americans only a few days later. However that has never been admitted and it took a lot of effort by Lothian to smooth ruffled feathers in Washington where the administration did not like being put under such public pressure to finalize a finance package.¹⁹⁰ In addition, many America Firsters regarded it as too close to a declaration of war against Germany.

For some months tension had been rising between Thailand (formerly Siam) and the Vichy French authorities in Indochina. Thailand had suffered from European political and religious intrigue, including a French-orchestrated bid to impose Catholicism in place of Buddhism, and had only been able to retain its independence in return for ceding territory to the adjoining British and French controlled countries two generations earlier. The resulting political and constitutional foment had reached a peak only two years earlier, in December 1938, when Phibun Songkhram, then head of government under a constitutional monarchy, seized power as prime minister and virtual military dictator. In 1939 he changed the name of the country from Siam to Thailand and embarked on a strongly nationalistic and chauvinistic policy with Fascist tendencies that was anti-Chinese at home and irredentist and pro-Japanese abroad. Following the fall of France Phibun moved quickly to seek the return of territory in western Laos and northwestern Cambodia that had formerly been under Siamese control.

Britain sat on the fence, unable to intervene either diplomatically or militarily but it tried to prevent Japanese mediation. If it backed France, it forced Thailand closer to Japan and its New Order. If it backed Thailand it undermined France and its tenuous relationship with it, and left the door ajar for Japan. The US opposed appeasement of Thailand and discouraged Britain from taking any initiative except to tighten an embargo on tin and rubber exports to any 'unfriendly country.' The result of indecision and vacillation, lack of any effective international mediation, the reopening of the Burma Road on October 18, and Britain's palpable weakness in the region was a total breakdown in relations and war broke out between Thailand and the French in Indochina on November 28. Immediate intense pressure from both Berlin and Tokyo for the two combatants to accept Japanese mediation gave Whitehall and Washington a clear indication that the Tripartite Pact partners were determined to establish Japanese dominance in the region. It also raised "the disturbing possibility" that Japan might synchronize its actions with a German offensive in Europe, and that tended to be reinforced by reports of German-Japanese collaboration in a number of other matters. These included the provision of intelligence on British merchant shipping movements which appeared to be linked to German raids on shipping and on the island of Nauru, an important source of phosphate for fertilizer, which had been a German territory until 1914 when Australia seized it and later administered it as an Australian mandated territory.¹⁹¹

After a week of intense politicking, and after leaving instructions that means were to be found to finance production plants for the aircraft, ships and munitions which Britain needed, Roosevelt left Washington for a holiday on December 1 and waited impatiently for Churchill to provide a letter with a comprehensive list of Britain's needs. It was eventually transmitted to the British embassy on the night of December 7/8, decoded on the 8th, and handed to the State Department on the 9th and immediately flown to Roosevelt on a naval vessel on holiday at sea.

In Chungking, on December 9 Ambassador Clark Kerr received advice that cabinet had approved a nominal loan of ten million pounds for China. Crumbs compared with Chaing Kai-Shek's request for up to 300 million pounds, but perhaps enough to hold the line. The time difference of eight hours means that the decision had been taken by cabinet not later than the 8th, together with three other decisions which indicate a significant change in emphasis in Britain's China policy. First: the appointment of a new military attache to discuss possible collaboration between Britain and China in the event that Britain found itself at war with Japan. Second: Agreement to secure the Loiwing aircraft factory by allowing the Chinese to relocate it to India. Third: rejection of a formal alliance on the very enlightening grounds that:

*An alliance without the participation of the United States scarcely seems likely to offer political advantages commensurate with the disadvantage that it might simply furnish Japan with a pretext for further aggression. This would not serve our interests in view of our commitments in the struggle in Europe.*¹⁹²

Considering that it was an alliance including the United States which Chiang Kai-Shek had sought and that Churchill was impressing on his diplomats that Britain would be dependent on the US for security in the Asian region in the event of a war, it confirms that Britain's position in China would have been undermined even further if the US had been invited in at that stage.

Late in 1940, while US military strategists were basing their planning on the assumption that the US would be drawn into wars in two hemispheres at once, the State Department asked two American Catholic clergymen with contacts in both business and government circles to visit Japan. Their brief was to ascertain what measures might be necessary to avoid a collision between the two powers and to ensure that the work of the military strategists was made redundant. They were Bishop James Walsh and Father James Drought and they were in Japan at the time that Whitehall feared the US may start separate talks with Japan and the State Department denied that it was doing any such thing. On returning to the US in December, Walsh and Drought prepared a different memorandum for each government, and although they provided a basis for further discussions of a more formal nature they also left the way open for confusion.

The memorandum prepared for consideration in Japan summarized that country's position as a call for a Japanese 'Far Eastern Monroe Doctrine.' Japan would exercise political hegemony over the area of China, Indochina, Thailand, Malaya and the Dutch East Indies. It would do so in such a manner as to prevent political or economic weakness in any significant section of that area which would entice European powers to resume extra-continental imperialism or which would dispose any section towards Communism, "which is not a political form of government but a corroding social disease that becomes epidemic."¹⁹³ But in the memorandum for American consideration, Japan's position was reported as willing to alter her commitment to the Axis, weary of the war in China and prepared to accept American cooperation in a settlement there. A Far Eastern Monroe Doctrine was suggested on the basis of a Japanese-American guarantee of the status quo in the Philippines, Hong Kong, Singapore and Malaya, with autonomous governments in Indochina and the Dutch East Indies. Such an arrangement was supposed to enable the moderates in Japan to hold down the militarists.¹⁹⁴ Their decision to produce two significantly different reports contributed to misunderstanding instead of understanding and compounded the policy of deception which the US administration later pursued at the highest level as the two nations eventually plunged into war.

About the time that the Walsh-Drought Reports were being considered on both sides of the Pacific, Foreign Minister Matsuoka assured Zikman, the author of Japan's policy on Jewish settlement, that Jews from Europe were safe and welcome in spite of the treaty with Germany which, although it naturally resulted in some hardening of attitudes, did not commit Japan to the elimination of its Jewish community. A devious travel plan or 'escape route' had been developed which, given the international relationships involved, was equally remarkable. The Russian authorities facilitated travel arrangements for the refugees from occupied Lithuania, through Russia to Vladivostok where they boarded vessels for Tsuruga on the west coast of Japan and then travelled by rail to Kobe. That system continued until the German invasion of Russia again threw Russia and Japan into opposing camps. Upon arrival in Kobe the refugees were taken in hand by Kobe Jewcom, a committee of the small local Jewish community, which was recognized by the Japanese migration authorities and assisted and funded by the JDC in New York.¹⁹⁵

Matsuoka could not anticipate the problems ahead. Molotov's visit to Berlin in November had not brought Russia and Germany any closer together. In fact it had served as little more than an opportunity for both powers to jockey for position on the basis of deceit, by Hitler, and mistrust, by Stalin. Russia's fears about Hitler's plans were compounded so that on December 16 Stalin ordered the preparation of ground defences against a possible German attack.

Next day, December 17, Halifax, having pondered Lloyd's letter on the Shigemitsu proposal, wrote that such a mission *might be welcomed by those whose views are suppressed and unheard and who may be on our side, but, merging as it would into the political field, it would risk being misunderstood as a gesture designed to conciliate those who every day take steps to prejudice ourselves and our interests ... I am convinced that it is only by showing a combined firm front that we shall restrain the extremist elements from extreme measures.*¹⁹⁶

Roosevelt, having returned to Washington from his shipboard holiday, met Morgenthau to discuss Britain's financial situation that day. He said the idea of dollar signs and loans should not be allowed to dominate US-British relations and proposed instead that the US increase its production of war materials and then give Britain what she needed with the proviso that she return the goods after the war, in kind, properly repaired, with any depreciation also paid in kind. Morgenthau "enthusiastically embraced the proposal" but added that it would be better to appear to be driving a hard bargain. The president then briefed a press gathering, noting that: British defence orders had been "a tremendous asset to American defence"; it would be 'banal' for the Johnson and Neutrality Acts to be repealed to permit loans to Britain; the US should take over British orders and then lease or sell what Britain needed; and that defending Great Britain was in the best interests of American national security. He then rejected the idea that his lend-lease proposal might bring the US closer to war, and the presses were set rolling with enthusiasm after “a masterly exhibition of Roosevelt as politician.”

But Hitler thought otherwise. He was confirmed in his intention to attack Russia as a step towards his conquest of Britain, which had become necessary to enable him to implement his New Order in Europe. Next day, December 18, with broadcast reports of Roosevelt’s press conference ringing in his ears and his own propaganda machine casting doubt on America’s capacity to perform, he issued his directive for preparations for the invasion of Russia, Operation Barbarossa. But he did not tell his allies in the Tripartite Pact and it appears that no intelligence on the matter reached the United States at that stage either. He ordered that preparation for the attack was to be completed by May 15, 1941. Hitler was just two days behind Stalin’s decision to prepare Russia’s defence. To what extent he was influenced by Roosevelt’s announcement and the knowledge that Britain would soon have access to unlimited arms, and probably a back-up army, in deciding to order immediate preparation for an attack on Russia is a matter of speculation. With the knowledge of the Vatican’s efforts to build an anti-Bolshevik alliance he must have harboured hopes that by turning east he could discourage US intervention and perhaps even discourage Britain from a policy of hot pursuit.

The response to Roosevelt’s announcement was mixed. Britain’s English settler-dominated dominions were encouraged – especially Australia. India and the indigenous-majority colonies were not impressed. They didn’t feel that they needed defending and it could only strengthen Britain’s colonial grasp. Matsuoka was concerned that it would enable a British naval build up in the East and mitigate against Japan’s New Order plans. In the Middle East there was disappointment and relations between the Iraqi government and Britain edged closer to breaking point. And Hitler received strong encouragement from the America First Committee (AFC).

Following Roosevelt’s Lend Lease statement and his fireside chat 12 days later, the AFC immediately stepped up its campaign against United States aid to the Allies and the Lend Lease proposal in particular. Some of its organizers were motivated by support for Hitler and his policies. Others by fear of direct American military involvement in the conflict. The committee attracted such leaders as General Robert E. Wood, the aviator Charles A. Lindbergh, and Senator Gerald P. Nye and its membership climbed rapidly to peak at 800,000. Though it failed in its campaigns to block the Lend-Lease Act, the use of the US Navy for convoy protection, or the repeal of the Neutrality Act, its public pressure undoubtedly discouraged greater direct military aid to a Great Britain beleaguered by Nazi Germany during the critical year which lay ahead.

During December 1940 and January 1941, even though the US administration had agreed in principle to a new financing plan, rigid restrictions were placed on British orders from December 19, pending Congress passing the necessary legislation. Drafting only began after New Year and although Roosevelt was assured of the support of House leaders from January 9 – the day before the bill was to be introduced – the negotiations with Britain over how the scheme would work were drawn out and difficult and Britain found itself in a very weak position and very much the junior partner in the new alliance which was taking shape.

COLLISION COURSES

Notwithstanding the fact that it was negotiating a new alliance and supply arrangements with Britain, the US began a further round of informal US-Japanese talks in January. The net result was the preparation of a draft understanding which favored the Japanese position and was less acceptable to the United States. The matter was then left in abeyance for a time, and the decision not to proceed with negotiations can be linked to several developments. On January 10, 1941, in spite of his preparations for the invasion, Hitler concluded an economic agreement with the Soviet Union and renounced his claims to a strip of Lithuanian territory in return for an enormous payment in gold, and on the same day the Lend Lease Bill was introduced in the US House of Representatives. It was Stalin's turn to ponder the impact of territorial changes on population dynamics. Also on the same day Washington received the text of a message from the Acting Japanese Consul in Pearl Harbour to the Imperial Japanese Naval command which had been transmitted and intercepted four days earlier. That message set out the precise numbers of US naval vessels, their type, and some dock-side facilities in Pearl Harbour. It indicated quite clearly that the Japanese Navy was planning some sort of action against Pearl Harbour.¹⁹⁷ The McCollum strategy was now known to be working. Whether that message was among the intelligence shared with Britain is not clear, but from available published works it appears very doubtful indeed. Those circumstances, together, led to very interesting developments in the pattern of Jewish refugee arrivals at Kobe, via Russia, on transit visas; in the pattern of their movement on to either the United States, which had been admitting significant numbers, Palestine or Shanghai; and in Japan's discussions on the subject with each of Germany, the United States and Jewish community leaders in the Far East.

While Stalin pondered, on January 15 the US House Committee on Foreign Affairs began its drawn out hearings on the Lend Lease Bill. Its opponents gave wide publicity to statistics which showed that if the British fleet was destroyed the Axis powers would be stronger in naval combat strength than the US; Lindbergh made a dramatic plea for the US to take the lead in a negotiated settlement of the war in Europe; and Ambassador Kennedy said he believed it was too late to aid Britain effectively, that the Lend Lease arrangements could be misused dictatorially, and that if aid to Britain was going to have any effect it had to be quick and efficient.¹⁹⁸ Music to Hitler's ears. Much better than Roosevelt's statement. At the same time Japan stepped up its diplomatic pressure on Thailand and French Indochina to reach a settlement based on Japanese economic support if they both embraced the New Order concept and ended their war. Thailand agreed; the French procrastinated. To add muscle to its case Japan began a naval build up in the Cam Rahn Bay region on January 19.

Whitehall's concern increased next day when a message from Tokyo to the Consul-General in Singapore was intercepted. It was to the effect that:

*future intelligence and propaganda policy will be 'mainly directed southwards in order to secure supplies of war commodities.' Promotion of agitation, political plots, propaganda and intelligence (particularly naval and military) must be expedited and intensified so that the New Order in greater East Asia may be expedited.*¹⁹⁹

Whitehall could do little except watch and constantly assess the situation and Japan's plans as Britain's position was weakened further, and with no apparent support from either Britain or the US, the Vichy authorities saw the wisdom of a settlement and agreed to armistice talks in Saigon on January 29. They certainly knew nothing about the talks in Washington.

While those negotiations were in progress the decision was taken in Washington that the intelligence sharing arrangements with Britain should be extended and that a 'Purple Machine' for decoding intercepts from Japan should be sent to London so that Churchill could share in the "splendid arrangement." The equipment, accompanied by officers to guard it and train British operators, was despatched from Washington on the first stage of its journey to London on January 24. It was set up and in use some time in February. Machines were also placed with British and US Naval Command and with MacArthur in Manila and the Dutch command in Batavia. A few officials in Whitehall – but indeed very few people at all – knew that on January 27 secret talks authorized by Roosevelt and Churchill would begin in Washington between senior British and American officers to determine "the best methods by which the armed forces of the United States and the British Commonwealth, with its present Allies, could defeat Germany and the Powers allied with her, should the United States be compelled to resort to war." Matters to be discussed even included an eventual "unity of field command in cases of strategic or tactical joint operations."²⁰⁰ If America's politicians had been aware of those talks which went far beyond the policy understanding of Congress, all hell would have been let loose.

The fury would have been even greater if they had known of a message which Secretary of State Hull received from Ambassador Grew in Tokyo on the morning that those staff talks began, and the way in which it was handled. Hull learned that Peru's minister in Japan had relayed to the third secretary of the US embassy a leak that "Japanese military forces planned in the event of trouble with the United States, to attempt a surprise attack on Pearl Harbour using all of their military facilities." Hull passed copies of the cable to both Army and Naval Intelligence where McCollum was asked to provide an analysis. McCollum, having prepared the strategy to lure Japan into exactly that action, discounted the ambassador's report as "rumour," delayed submitting his assessment to the commander of the Pacific Fleet until February 1, and then advised that: "The Division of Naval Intelligence places no credence on these rumours. Furthermore, based on known data regarding the present disposition and employment of Japanese naval and army forces, no move against Pearl Harbour appears imminent or planned for in the foreseeable future."²⁰¹ Why February 1? That was the day Admiral Kimmel took command of the Pacific Fleet, succeeding Admiral Richardson who had deigned to stand up to Roosevelt over the issue and been moved sideways in a restructure of the US Fleet.²⁰² In fact three of McCollum's action proposals had already been acted on. Twenty four submarines had been despatched to Manila (Action E); the US Fleet had been retained in Hawaiian waters (Action F); and the Dutch had refused supplies of oil and raw materials for Japan (Action G). Even two days before McCollum sent his advice to the Pacific Fleet commander, on January 30, a Naval Intelligence report from Manila showing a large build up of Japanese warships in the South China Sea off French Indochina had been relayed to Roosevelt,²⁰³ and on the same day Foreign Minister Matsuoka advised his ambassador in Washington, by radio, that “In view of the critical situation between the two countries we must be prepared for the worst,” and that he should change from publicity and propaganda work to establishing an espionage-gathering network within the United States.²⁰⁴ Washington’s program of deceit, misinformation and concealment of information was at least keeping pace with that in Britain.

About the time that those talks began it was decided in Iraq that Haddad should visit Berlin again in an effort to get Hitler’s agreement to a stronger statement of mutual German-Arab interests which the Mufti had drafted, and to the supply of military equipment. The statement called for the unequivocal independence of the countries occupied by Britain, including Palestine, Transjordan, Oman and Kuwait, but it sought a less binding commitment to the independence of the French-occupied regions of Syria and Lebanon. This appears to have been a deliberate bid to minimize the importance of Germany’s relations with Vichy France and to avoid making Italy’s North African ambitions an issue.²⁰⁵ Shortly after Haddad left for Berlin the government of Rashid ‘Ali al-Gaylani, was forced to resign and a group of pro-Axis army officers took control. Rashid ‘Ali, although anti-Zionist, had previously maintained a low level of cooperation with Britain under the Anglo-Iraqi Alliance. Relations with Britain plunged.

When the Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) submitted its conclusions on the situation in the Far East on February 5 it said:

*Japan will take advantage of her role as mediator in the dispute between Thailand and Indochina so as to gain naval, military and air bases which would enable her to threaten Malaya, the Netherlands East Indies, North Borneo, and possibly Burma. Of these objectives we believe that she will probably select, in the first instance, the Netherlands East Indies, and that she intends to move against the territory in the near future.*²⁰⁶

However the SIS had bugged the telephones of the Japanese embassy in London and a message overheard that day caused shock waves and an overnight reassessment. The SIS operator reported on the 5th that embassy staff had been ordered to cut off all ‘fraternization with British officials’ and be prepared to leave Britain at short notice and, on the 6th, that ‘some sort of action’ was expected shortly. This led the Chiefs of Staff to believe that a direct threat to British interests was possible. On the basis that British forces in Malaya were insufficient to resist Japan and that reinforcement in strength was impossible, it was decided to resort to a mix of propaganda and diplomacy, and to make the interception of Japanese shipping dependent on American approval.²⁰⁷

Britain’s morale was being boosted at that stage by the spectacular success of its North Africa Army in capturing 130,000 Italian troops in a swoop on Cyrenaica, but it had manoeuvred itself into an almost farcical position in the Far East. Because of the arrogant determination of its commercial interests to cling to their privileges in China the British government would not negotiate the phased relinquishing of those privileges at a time when, to do so, could have defused the crises in the Far East and enabled Japan and China to develop a new and workable relationship. It could no longer negotiate on that basis because to do so was contrary to the wishes of the America ally on which it had become totally dependent. Even though its senior services officers were already having strategic planning talks with that ally in Washington it refused to invite that ally into a formal alliance with China which may have relieved the situation as an interim measure because to do so would further weaken its overall negotiating position. And now its position was so weak that it could not even stop a ship to search it without asking for that ally's approval.

Britain's attitude to the Japanese and its lack of appreciation, even at the highest levels, that its own actions over a long period were basic to the crisis are reflected in a diary note by Sir Alexander Cadogan after he and Eden briefed Churchill on the latest intelligence intercept. He wrote: "Instructed H(alifax) to pass on to US government our information about the machinations of these beastly little monkeys." ²⁰⁸ A student of history might ask 'who were the beastly little monkeys'?

Next day, February 7, in an atmosphere of crisis, Eden summoned the Japanese ambassador and delivered a confrontational outburst which dragged Anglo-Japanese relations into even more turbulent waters – unnecessarily. It was later determined by MI2c that the operator who reported the embassy conversations had either misinterpreted them or misrepresented them to exaggerate his own importance and that, being mesmerized by the importance of their 'discovery' the officers of the unit had ignored, or not understood, other intelligence which contradicted the operator's report.²⁰⁹ However, in the meantime massive damage had been done. The government resorted to distortion and propaganda against the Japanese on a grand new scale. It used 'war scare' tactics to coerce Australia into stronger support for Britain, which left long term scars in the Australian psyche, and Admiral Bellairs used it in an unsuccessful bid (which earned him a sharp rebuke from Churchill) to coerce the United States into stationing a part of its Pacific fleet at Singapore. When the irritation which that incident caused had settled, the two governments agreed that in the event that the United States was at war with both Germany and Japan, priority would be given to offensive operations in Europe and defensive operations in the Pacific – the policy which the US strategic planners had proposed in November.²¹⁰

There was relief in Whitehall on February 8 when the US House of Representatives passed the Lend Lease Bill. However there was still a long way to go because Senate committee hearings had been in progress only 12 days and the finance restrictions had to stay in place. The House majority was comfortable but not large for an issue of such international significance, 260:165, (61 per cent in favour) but the party split showed that there was still no consensus across the American political spectrum, (See endnote #136), and what had been approved fell well short of the matters which the US and British officers were then discussing in Washington.

And their approval certainly did not extend to the decision which Roosevelt took at a White House meeting on February 10 which was attended by the Secretaries of State (Hull), War (Stimson) and the Navy (Knox), the Army Chief of Staff (Marshall) and the Chief of Naval Operations (Stark). Roosevelt decided to implement Action D of the McCollum Memorandum – provocative naval intrusions into Japanese waters – and to personally take charge of the action. A naval task force was to be sent into Japanese waters periodically on what he termed “pop-up cruises” as part of the overall plan to step up provocative pressure on Japan.²¹¹ Against the advice of both Stark, who said that such provocation “will precipitate hostilities,” and Kimmel, who insisted when being advised of the decision by Stark that it was “ill-advised and will result in war if we make this move,”²¹² Roosevelt wanted the navy to “keep popping up here and there and keep the Japs guessing.” He said: “I don’t mind losing one or two cruisers, but do not take the chance on losing five or six.”²¹³ The first pop-up cruise took place a few weeks later.

But on February 15, before Action D could be put into effect, the concerns about Britain’s ‘war-scare’ propaganda among State Department officers who were not aware of Roosevelt’s collusion in provocation, were shown to be justified. Ambassador Shigemitsu delivered a letter from Matsuoka addressed to Churchill with a strong protest about Britain’s ‘warlike posturing’ and proposing a substantial change in the international scenario: that Japan should mediate a European peace settlement. Was it possible that Matsuoka might be able to bring Britain and Germany together around a table where the Swedish king had failed? But Churchill regarded the letter as a matter of posturing and replied in that vein, lecturing the Foreign Minister on the consequences of Japan’s alignment with Germany, while he was ‘fishing’ to keep the correspondence alive. Although Shigemitsu saw the exchange for what it was, Matsuoka did not. He continued the correspondence.

By mid February, Stalin had finished pondering Lithuania’s population dynamics which the latest territory-and-people-swap with Hitler had made an issue, and the Soviet Union required the registration of all persons who had become ‘stateless refugees’ within its borders as a result of the series of annexations and occupations of territory, and it introduced a policy of transporting those who were locally ‘unproductive’ to Siberia.

The combined effect of those changes stimulated the flow of applications for transit visas through Japan and at first the Japanese Embassy in Moscow cooperated. From December 1940 to March 1941 there was a sharp increase in the number of refugee arrivals in Kobe, but it was not matched by a similar rise in the number of refugees moving on to the US or Shanghai. This meant that there was a strong net increase in the number of refugees being accommodated in Kobe.

In addition, and in line with his changed attitude to Russia, Hitler changed direction radically from his earlier proposal that Russia should lay claim to Iran and India. On February 17 he ordered that planning begin for a thrust to the very heart of Britain’s Empire – ‘the giant seething with discontent because of its suppressed aspirations for independence’ – India.²¹⁴ This was consistent with both his request for Japan to attack Singapore and the closer links which Germany had been developing with the Arab countries. Intelligence reports were soon flying in all directions. Or almost all. Out in mid-Pacific soon after he took command of the US fleet, Kimmel, who should have been fed with every skerrick of intelligence relating to Japan realized that he was not receiving the flow of reports which was made possible by the establishment of the "Purple" net. He was receiving only filtered information, excluding many items which materially affected his situation, but when he sought assurances from Admiral Stark on February 18 that the situation would be put right he had to wait more than a month to receive the non-assurance that: "Naval Intelligence is fully aware of its responsibility in keeping you adequately informed."²¹⁵ Adequately for what? According to Stinnett, and apparently on the authority of the Assistant Chief of Naval Operations the constraints on the flow of intelligence to Kimmel and the Pacific Fleet at Pearl Harbour were tightened even further. Commanders of each of the other regions in the Pacific remained plugged into the Japanese intercept system but nothing was sent to Kimmel and the Purple machine which had originally been allocated to Hawaii was sent to Singapore in March.²¹⁶ The Pacific Fleet at Pearl Harbour became, in effect, a sitting duck.

On March 4, with the Lend Lease Bill still held up in the Senate, Morgenthau asked Roosevelt to pressure Churchill for a change in chief British negotiator and for a spectacular sale of British assets in the US to prove to Congress how desperate Britain was. Churchill refused. Britain was able to heave a sigh of relief on March 8 when the US Senate finally passed the Lend Lease Bill, subject to amendments which the House then had to consider. On March 11 the necessary amendments were passed and the president signed the bill into law at 3.50 pm.²¹⁷ However, saying that he was still worried about whether he could get a massive appropriation bill for seven billion dollars through Congress, Morgenthau pressed again for a sale such as the Viscose Corporation (97 per cent British owned) which would show that Britain would honour its commitments. Desperation and political expediency then prevailed, the sale was completed swiftly, on March 15 and the appropriation bill was also passed. Churchill later complained in his memoirs that "the great British business of Courtalds ... was sold ... at the request of the United States Government at a figure much below its intrinsic worth ... to emphasize the hardship of our position and raise feeling against the opponents of Lend Lease."

'ALL AID SHORT OF WAR'

The Senate vote in favor of "all aid short of war"²¹⁹ was 60:31 or 66 per cent in favor, a rise of five per cent compared with 61 per cent in the House vote a month earlier. Overall, the congressional voting pattern reflected the public opinion polls reasonably closely. A poll conducted the day before the Senate vote showed 61 per cent in favor, 23 per cent firmly opposed and the balance (16 per cent) less firmly decided. On the basis of those voting patterns it is therefore very doubtful that such a finance and supply arrangement as the Lend Lease scheme would have been possible if Roosevelt, the architect of the proposal, had not retained the presidency. It was his influence on the Democrat vote which carried the day, decisively. [For voting details see endnote ²²⁰] Similarly, given Churchill's admission that Britain could not survive without American aid, one may assume that without Roosevelt Britain would have been forced to negotiate a settlement with Hitler's Germany and the trouble in the triangle would have taken a decidedly different course as already noted. (Pp. 12–14 above.) That is the overriding significance of the Lend Lease Act: not that it was "the most significant of all the steps taken (by the US) towards war before December 1941 (and) a public announcement of the creation of the most productive and cooperative coalition of modern times – the Anglo-American Alliance against Germany." ²²¹

Hitler claimed not to be too concerned about the passage of the Act. He said it would take the US four years to get into full production, by which time Germany would have won the war. But he was very eager to get on and get the job done and he insisted that to do that it was necessary to destroy "the breeding ground of Bolshevism", the main opposition to National Socialism in Eastern Europe, the region which would provide Germany's long awaited lebensraum. This required two orders: one, that before striking at the capital, Moscow, his armies were to destroy Leningrad and Stalingrad;²²² the other that the Soviet corps of Commissars was to be eliminated. For this purpose he prepared special directions for the rigorous conduct of the war in Russia: his 'Commissar Decree.' "The Commissars are the bearers of ideologies directly opposed to National Socialism. Therefore the Commissars will be liquidated. German soldiers guilty of breaking international law ...will be excused. Russia has not participated in the Hague Convention and therefore has no rights under it." ²²³

So Hitler pressed on towards his proposed mid-May launch of Barbarossa, still not confiding in his pact partners. Then in mid-March the Japanese embassy in Moscow suddenly stopped issuing transit visas for Jewish refugees from the occupied territories. Foreign Minister Matsuoka was preparing for talks in both Berlin, with Hitler, and in Moscow, with Stalin. He needed Hitler's support for Japan's plan for a New Order in Asia, and he knew that Hitler wanted Japan's support on the Jewish question. Matsuoka was therefore caught between his personal want to continue refugee admissions and his need to appease Hitler in view of German complaints about Japan's help for Jews. He could not allow Hitler to dictate to Japan on a matter which touched both foreign and domestic policy, ²²⁴ and he did not want a disagreement over foreign relations which could lead to a treaty breakdown. His solution was to stop the issuing of refugee transit visas. Refugee arrivals in Kobe dropped sharply.²²⁵

At that time Hitler was eager to march through Greece on his way to link with the Arabs in his push towards India, but Italy had made things difficult by its failed actions in Albania and Greece. Neither Mussolini nor Hitler knew that it was not a failure of the Italian troops. It just looked that way because the British had broken the Italian codes and knew of every Italian order, troop and supply movement, and tactical plan before they were to be implemented. The British armies just acted first. However the setback meant that Hitler's position had been weakened and he had to gain Yugoslavia's assistance, or at least its agreement, before he could move against Greece. After long negotiations with many threats coupled with the promise of continuing independence, on March 17 Hitler had gained Prince Paul's agreement to join the Tripartite Pact, provided that Yugoslavia was not required to provide an army and that Germany's army would simply march through. But news leaked out and his plans for Barbarossa and the invasion of Greece were, from Britain's point of view, very conveniently confused. On March 20, three months after Hitler issued his directive for preparation of an invasion of Russia, a Soviet intelligence report was handed to Stalin in which the three German army groups which were under development in preparation for Operation Barbarossa, and the names of their commanders, were correctly identified with provisional dates for the invasion given as either May 20 or mid-June. (The Soviet master spy cum journalist, Richard Sorge, had sent his first report to Moscow of an imminent break in German-Soviet relations and an attack on Russia 15 days earlier.) But rumour-mongering and the black propaganda systems of both Britain and Germany were working overtime and Stalin refused to believe the reports. An instruction was sent to all Russian army intelligence units that "all documents claiming that war is imminent must be regarded as forgeries from British or even German sources."

A pact between Germany, Italy and Yugoslavia was finally signed by the Yugoslav prime minister on March 25. Events were going reasonable smoothly for Hitler and he was therefore greatly relieved and in a good frame of mind – until March 27 which proved a particularly busy day. As he prepared to welcome Matsuoka he received a message that Prince Paul had been toppled in a coup by Serbian Orthodox Nationalists, that the new Yugoslav government would not join the Tripartite Pact, and that Churchill had declared in London that the Yugoslavs had recovered their "soul".²²⁶ It rather spoiled his day.

Hitler summoned Ribbentrop, the military commanders and the ambassadors for Hungary and Bulgaria. In a total rage he demanded that the ungrateful Yugoslavia be smashed in a merciless blitzkrieg which would teach them a lesson and humble the Turks and the Greeks into submission. Barbarossa was to go ahead as planned but Yugoslavia was to be dealt with in advance. Then he did his version of a 'Munich', or a bit more trade in other people and their territory. He told the ambassadors that for their cooperation Hungary could have the Banat region back from Yugoslavia, and Bulgaria could have Macedonia. The Balkans religious mixing bowl sitting astride the great triple divide was again being carved up. But this time it was not on the initiative of one faith community or another. This carve up was by Hitler as he, firstly, put into effect his challenge to the church and the amorphous Christian gel through his parody of it, Mein Kampf, and sought his colonial Lebensraum; secondly, sought to destroy the political face of another challenge to the church, Communism; and thirdly, filled the role of the Scourge in the Qur'anic Night Journey – all in one package.

Then, having disposed of that problem, Hitler was able to welcome his waiting guest, Matsuoka. Japan, he said, should immediately seize Singapore in an action designed to persuade America not to enter the war. The United States was not yet in a position to attack Japan, he said, and such a manoeuvre would discourage the US from committing its fleet to either the European or Far Eastern theatres. Matsuoka, supported by the Japanese military adviser who accompanied him, politely declined. Then he added to Hitler's woes by saying he looked forward to making a treaty with Russia in the near future. When Ribbentrop suggested that such a treaty might not be appropriate, Matsuoka did not appear to understand the guarded message that there may soon be war between Germany and Russia, but Ambassador Oshima promptly enlightened him. Then, although Japan was not prepared to invade Singapore, Hitler undertook to do whatever was necessary to support Japan in the event of an attack by the US, in spite of his secrecy in withholding from his Tripartite Pact partner his intention to invade Russia.²²⁷ So the Japanese mission departed, having given Hitler no pleasure at all, and the Fuhrer sat down to sign Directive No. 25: orders for the simultaneous invasion of Yugoslavia and Greece.²²⁸

Hitler soon realized that the new situation required the deferral of Barbarossa and on March 30 he advised his commanders that the revised and final date was June 22. He told them the war against Russia “cannot be fought in knightly fashion.” The struggle is one of ideologies and racial differences, he said, and will have to be waged with “unprecedented, unmerciful and unrelenting hardness.” Barbarossa could not be further postponed because no successor would ever again exercise sufficient authority to accept responsibility for unleashing it. To stop the Bolshevik steamroller he demanded the destruction of the Bolshevik State and the annihilation of the Red Army, and he confirmed, with great zeal, his Commissar Decree.

TREATIES...OR TRICKS?

So, as the year progressed and the war continued to widen steadily with no leaders except Hitler being prepared to discuss the background to it or their motives, the manipulation of ordinary people by their own governments through half truths and propaganda, supposedly in the national interest, was running very strongly – and in parallel with the manipulation which was going on at government-to-government level. Japan was trying to manage its relationships with Britain, Germany and Russia so as to avoid entanglement in Europe’s war. The United States still officially sought a bilateral treaty with Japan which would suppress Japan’s plans for a New Order in Asia and give it, the US, the domination of East Asia which it wanted while in fact it was goading Japan into an attack on it in order to justify entry into the war with Britain against Germany. At the same time it was eagerly trying to dismantle the British Empire without doing it in such a way that it might enable either Germany or Japan to strengthen their positions and move against the United States. That, in its assessment, required it to vigorously support Britain militarily and with resources, in order to prevent a German victory which would pose a threat to its own self-understanding and perceived future role, and it was already having those top-level talks on strategic cooperation with Britain while it planned the ultimate dismantling of its economic base and sought to keep its real socio-political adversary, the Soviet Russia, at arms length. Hitler could not have written a more effective parody if he had tried.

At this point Shigemitsu, concerned that Matsuoka was being manipulated as he continued to respond to Churchill’s posturing, asked for permission to meet Matsuoka during a planned visit to Europe in April. Churchill agreed, on March 31, because he wanted the ambassador to carry yet another letter to Matsuoka. A special connecting flight via Lisbon, neutral territory, was arranged, but when Matsuoka changed his plans the meeting did not take place. Undaunted, Shigemitsu continued to propose new arrangements which he believed could relieve the tension between the two countries.²²⁹

In Iraq, where the Anglo-Iraqi Alliance was now in tatters, the pro-Axis officers reinstated Rashid 'Ali as prime minister on April 2 on the understanding that he withdraw support from Britain, facilitate Pan-Arab contacts with the Axis powers and seek to influence British Middle East policy in favour of the Arabs. He immediately did that by ordering the oil pipeline to the Mediterranean closed. The British-sponsored Regent, Emir Abdul-Ilah, then faced a coup plotted by Rashid, three pro-Nazi military officers and the honorific minister, the Mufti. The Emir fled leaving Rashid in full control of the government.

Hitler's invasions of Yugoslavia and Greece began concurrently on April 6 with a blitzkrieg against Belgrade which killed five thousand civilians. When the Wehrmacht entered Zagreb on April 10 the faithful Catholic Fascist Croats were allowed to declare an independent Croatia. This earned Hitler much kudos within the Vatican because Pius XII had "warmly endorsed Croat nationalism and confirmed the Ustashe perception of history" when a national pilgrimage visited Rome in November 1939 to promote the cause of the canonization of a Croat Franciscan martyr, Nicola Pavelic. The 'perception of history' he referred to was burning resentment against the Orthodox Serbs for past and contemporary injustices – such as restricted educational rights and exclusion from the professions – which had been imposed in retaliation for thirteen hundred years of "loyalty" to the papacy. In responding to a speech by the primate of Croatia Pius XII had described his state as "the outpost of Christianity," with the clear implication that the Serbian Orthodox had no right to call themselves Christian. He added that: "The hope of a better future seems to be smiling on you: a future in which the relations between Church and State in your country will be regulated in harmonious action to the advantage of both."²³⁰

Next day the two adjacent Fascist states, Italy and Hungary, joined forces with their ally to cut up the Yugoslav cake. The process did not take long and on April 12 Hitler issued his Yugoslav partition plan based on his promises to the ambassadors in Berlin. Croatia was granted "Aryan" status and sovereignty over Slovenia, Bosnia, Herzegovina and a large part of Dalmatia with a total population of 6.7 million. There were about 3,300,000 Catholics, 2,200,000 Orthodox Serbs, 750,000 Muslims, 70,000 Protestants and 45,000 Jews. The Ustashe leader Ante Pavelic promptly returned from his safe haven in Italy where Mussolini had provided training camps and logistical support for his disruption and sabotage activities. A Ustashe program of "ethnic cleansing" began immediately, targeting the 2.2 million Orthodox Serbian Christians and smaller numbers of Jews, Gypsies and Communists. Its aim was to produce a pure Catholic Croatia by enforced conversions, deportations and mass extermination, but the Ustashe seemed content to leave the Protestants and the Muslims basically in peace.²³¹ It was far more ruthless than anything Hitler had tried to carry out and even more ruthless than Professor Vosa Cubrilovic's plan for the expulsion of all 'Albanians', meaning, roughly, Muslims, from Yugoslavia (see chapter 20, p. 33) because it did not target one ethnic or religious group, but several, and especially their fellow Christians. Of course in the prevailing

Catholic view they were no better than the Infidels even if the long history of bitter antagonism could be overlooked. They were among the separated brethren who needed to be brought to Rome before they could attain personal salvation. The Catholic Archbishop of Zagreb called personally on Pavelic to welcome him home on April 16; supported his plans for oppression of the Orthodox Church because it was a political organization and not a church; gave a dinner in his honour, confirming his intention to press for the pope to recognize the new state; and wrote a pastoral letter, calling for the clergy and the faithful to collaborate in the work of the leader, which was read from all Catholic pulpits on April 28. Already, three days before that letter was read, Pavelic had banned all publication of the Cyrillic script which was used by Orthodox Serbs whether for private or public purposes.²³²

The savagery of the atrocities carried out over the next seventeen days almost defies description. In the first major incident, on the day the pastoral letter was read, 250 Serbs were forced to dig a ditch, bound with wire and buried alive. At the village of Otocac 331 Serbs were rounded up, forced to dig their own grave, then hacked to death in front of their priest and his son. The priest was then forced to recite prayers for the dying while his son was hacked to death, then he was tortured, his hair and beard torn off, his eyes gouged out and he was skinned alive. At Glina several hundred were herded into their church and asked to show certificates of conversion to Catholicism. Two were carrying certificates and were released. The rest were butchered.²³³ It was a regression to the depraved papal decree, Capitulatio de partibus Saxoniae, which specified death as the penalty for refusing baptism which the papacy and the Holy Roman Empire under Charles had imposed in their bid to "Christianize" or subjugate Scandinavia more than a thousand years earlier. (See chapter 7, p. 13.) The usual anti-Semitic legislation followed immediately, as did the first of the systematic deportations of Jews to a concentration camp at Danica.²³⁴

And Stalin? During this interlude he sought to preserve the political face of the Marxist challenge to the church and the amorphous Christian gel, and he warned his commanders that this was not going to be easy. They could expect wars on two fronts, he said, with Germany and with Japan. Then while he maintained his pact with Germany he proceeded to negotiate a five-year neutrality pact with Japan. In doing so he set such impossible conditions at first that after a week of frustration Matsuoka was about to leave for home without a treaty when Stalin summoned him back to the Kremlin, dropped all the pretence and pressure tactics, and signed on April 13 at the end of the visit which did not include talks with Shigemitsu.

The Russian-Japanese Pact was to be invoked either in the case of a German attack on Russia or a United States attack on Japan. Stalin showed that he saw the new treaty as completing a package of three which would ensure, if not unadulterated friendship, then at least stability and the absence of war in the relationships between Germany, Russia and Japan. There were now treaties between Germany and Russia; Russia and Japan; and Japan and Germany. In an unprecedented move to illustrate the importance he placed on that, Stalin did not leave his diplomats to farewell Matsuoka. He took Molotov with him to the railway station and in a very public display embraced both Matsuoka and German ambassador Schulenburg, and declared for all to hear, to the Japanese, “The European problem can be solved in a natural way if Japan and the Soviets cooperate,” then, to the German, “We must remain friends, and you must now do everything to that end.”²³⁵ Friction between Russia and Japan was further reduced by the cancellation of Japanese concessions in Northern Sakhalin (to eliminate spying) and the joint recognition of both the Mongol People’s Republic and Manchukuo.²³⁶

On the other hand the new treaty added to the friction between Japan and Britain and the United States which both feared that Japan, free of any concern about Russian intentions in Manchukuo, was also free to turn its attention south. Roosevelt was so concerned that on the day the pact was announced he cancelled a plan for aggressive action by US naval ships against German U-boats in the western Atlantic. New orders were issued requiring that German naval west of Iceland should be reported, not shot at, because the Japanese-Soviet Pact made the situation in the Pacific too dangerous to risk too much in the Atlantic.²³⁷ Hitler, although he was in broad agreement with the British-American assessment, saw it from a different point of view. On April 20 Admiral Raeder sought his approval to attack US shipping in order to draw America into the war and thereby encourage Japan to enter it also. Hitler’s response was to deny approval for that plan²³⁸ but to tell Raeder that the Soviet-Japanese treaty had been made “with Germany’s acquiescence,” that he welcomed it “because Japan is now restrained from taking any action against Vladivostok and should be induced to attack Singapore instead.” He did not want to share the rich rewards of the subordination of the Soviet Union with his ally and he did not expect to need its help.²³⁹ Ribbentrop went even further. During pre-treaty discussions on March 29 he told Matsuoka that if Russia forced Germany ‘to strike’ he would ‘consider it proper if the Japanese Army were prevented from attacking Russia.’²⁴⁰ The beacon which the MEW had dropped in the middle of the Sea of Japan was now totally useless.

However the web of intrigue was to be spun tighter yet. About that time, after Matsuoka had refused Hitler’s request to seize Singapore and had travelled to Moscow to negotiate a pact with Stalin, formal talks were opened, on US initiative, between the US and Japanese diplomatic representatives. The starting point was to be the informal draft understanding which had been prepared in January as an outcome of the twin Walsh-Drought reports. But US Secretary of State Cordell Hull then proposed a draft with four principles which were not compatible with the earlier draft understanding. His new principles clearly implied acceptance of the Asian colonial status quo, and as discussions proceeded, with proposal and counter proposal, the peculiarities of the two countries’ domestic politics, their conflicting aspirations in the Asian region and their conflicting alliances with the European belligerents complicated the situation. Hull’s four principles were: respect for the territorial integrity and sovereignty of all nations; support of the principle of non-interference in the internal affairs of other countries; support of the principle of equality, including equality of commercial opportunity; and non-disturbance of the status quo in the Pacific, except as the status quo may be altered by peaceful means.²⁴¹ However there were identifiable but unspoken agendas behind each of the four points and this placed the two nations poles apart, so that they gradually drifted towards war. As they did so, and in the light of both the Tripartite Pact and Britain's inability to finance China's needs, the operation of the Lend Lease Act was extended to China as well as Britain.

Also, about that time, Hitler received some more encouragement from the Middle East which helped to offset his disappointment with Japan. Farouk advised him through his Ambassador to Iran that he had strong admiration for the Fuhrer, that he sincerely desired a German victory over England, that the Egyptian people longed for German occupation and liberation of their country, and that he would come to their aid at the decisive moment.²⁴² However the first British brigade landed at the head of the Persian Gulf on April 18 to secure the oil fields at Basra and Abadan and the refinery.

Whitehall, sensing that it was being outmanoeuvred in the Far East, not finding the fruits of diplomacy to its liking, but being impressed with the impact of a policy of rumour spreading which had been approved by the JIC in October 1940 (including its 'war-scare' program), now opted for greater use of the black propaganda weapon. A detailed policy proposal was put to the JIC on April 28 for it to develop.²⁴³ Two days later, April 30, there was a sharp disagreement in cabinet over whether Britain should agree to an American proposal to move a large part of its Pacific fleet to the Atlantic. It provided a rich field of intrigue for the JIC to work on. Eden, Cadogan and Pound (Admiralty) argued against the fleet movement because it would weaken the level of deterrence against a Japanese move south. Churchill argued that the military value of the plan was secondary: what mattered was the political expediency of agreeing with the US president. Churchill won.²⁴⁴ While that matter was being resolved the man who commanded the US Pacific Fleet, now firmly based at Hawaii and the most directly affected, was cut out of the "Purple" intelligence loop altogether. The other regional commanders in the Pacific were not.²⁴⁵

A few days later, while the JIC was still working on its proposals, Kobe Jewcom received an order from the Chief Secretary of the Imperial Navy for two representatives to attend for military interrogation in Tokyo. Fearful that Japan may in fact have been drawn into Hitler's anti-Semitic campaign, two rabbis and an interpreter made the journey. The interrogation by three admirals opened on the basis of German hatred of the Jews and would have turned swiftly to the Protocols of the Elders of Zion and supposed Zionist plans for world domination. However by skillfully shepherding the discussion to the theology of Judaism and Shinto, reports of early historical contacts between the people of Israel and Japan, and Hitler's misinterpretation of race, the rabbis were able to avert a potential crisis and actually enhance the relationship between Japan and its Jewish community. They left Tokyo with the instruction ringing in their ears: "Go back to your people. Tell them they have nothing to fear: we Japanese will do our utmost to provide for your safety and peace; you have nothing to fear while in Japanese territory."²⁴⁶

In Berlin, Haddad, had obtained from the German Secretary of State, Weizsacker, a warmly worded confidential note of support for the Arabs. Weizsacker actually went no further towards a commitment to the Arab cause than was contained in the earlier rather innocuous Italo-German declaration, but he promised prompt delivery of military supplies. Rashid Ali thereupon sealed off the British air base at Habbaniya on April 28, trapping 2,200 troops and 9,000 civilians, then despatched 9,000 troops on May 2 to counter the British Indian brigade and seize control of the Basra oil fields. He appealed to Hitler for the military support which Weizsacker had promised and the Fuhrer ordered that advisers be flown in and that arms be supplied from Vichy-controlled Syria.

But Rashid was not the only person to make an urgent appeal for foreign help that day. Churchill, very depressed about the possible loss of the Middle East, sent a message to Roosevelt insisting that “the United States must range herself with Britain immediately as a belligerent” and saying “if you cannot take more advanced positions now, or very soon, the vast balances may be tilted heavily to our disadvantage.”²⁴⁷ Fearful that a German leap-frog by air into Iraq via facilities on both the Mediterranean and at Basra²⁴⁸ on the Persian Gulf would cost Britain control of Iraqi oil supplies, Churchill requested that additional forces be made available for the Gulf. Indians en route to Malaya were re-directed to Iraq along with forces from Palestine.

And that was not the only reason Churchill had for feeling depressed. Press and diplomatic reports during April made it quite clear that the British war cabinet was still divided over Churchill’s leadership and morale was low. Without identifying themselves a group of ministers and MPs, including Lloyd George, Emanuel Shinwell, Nye Bevan, Hore-Belisha and Lord Winterton, had actually looked for ways of negotiating peace with Hitler during April, being fearful of the haphazard direction of the war under Churchill’s rigid one-man rule in cabinet.²⁴⁹ Morale fell so low that Churchill had to face a vote of confidence in the House of Commons on May 6 and his task in defending his position was made even tougher when he received a report that day from the Chief of the Imperial General Staff, Field Marshal Sir John Dill. Dill said he believed “we have gone to the limit, if not beyond it, in respect of the security of Great Britain;” that the available resources in Britain were not sufficient to defend the country against invasion; that although the loss of Egypt would be a calamity it would not end the war; that even the security of Singapore comes before Egypt; that “we must not fall into the error of whittling away the security at vital points;” querying the decision to pursue the war in North Africa; and saying “if need be, we must cut our losses in places that are not vital before it is too late.” It was a discreet but devastating critique of the political direction of the war, but Churchill steeled himself for worse to come, faced the extended debate next day, and won.

It was also an open secret that Whitehall was doing all it could to encourage a wider front against Germany and to incite Hitler to turn against the Soviet Union, aided and abetted – and spurred on – by the Vatican, and Stalin must have had reason to think that Molotov might respond to overtures to join the push against Hitler. He implied as much on May 5 when he told senior military officers at a banquet that there was an imminent danger of war with Germany. Next day, while Churchill faced his detractors in the House, Stalin assumed even greater dictatorial powers than he already wielded by relieving Molotov of his posts as head of government and chairman of the Council of People’s Commissars, taking both posts himself while continuing as general secretary of the Communist Party. Molotov remained Foreign Minister and became deputy chairman of the council. Ambassador Schulenburg told Berlin that in his view Stalin had taken this step “of extraordinary importance” with “the object of preserving the Soviet Union from a conflict with Germany.”²⁵⁰

It is now known that on August 15, 1940, a month before his ‘final offer’, Hitler had ordered Hess to prepare for a special task ²⁵¹ and then, on September 1, Hess learned of a friendship between Albrecht Haushofer (the son of one of his confidants) and Lord Hamilton, which was seen as possibly providing a further point of contact with the British Peace Party. It is now widely believed that this contact led directly to Hess’ flight to Scotland only a few days after the vote on Churchill’s leadership in the Commons. On May 10 he secretly flew alone from Augsburg, landed by parachute in Scotland and asked to see the Duke of Hamilton. The duke was “so impressed” that he arranged to fly to London and asked Cadogan to meet him and take him to see Churchill. However Churchill changed the arrangement, sending a driver to meet the duke and telling Cadogan he was not needed. Cadogan’s diary notes confirm that Hess came with peace proposals, demanding a free hand for Germany in Europe and the return of former German colonies as compensation for Germany’s promise to respect the integrity of the British Empire. They indicate that Hess maintained he had come on his own initiative and not at the request of Hitler, and they confirm that cabinet decided to ban press speculation, to manipulate press statements about his arrival and the content of his statements, and that the “PM agreed we ought to draw Hess by pretending to negotiate, and he came out with my idea of J. Simon (Lord Chancellor) for the part.” ²⁵²

In view of the timing and in view of the steps taken on Churchill’s orders to ensure that there were no substantive reports of Hess’ interrogation and debriefings ever published, it is reasonable to assume that he made the flight to carry out whatever ‘special task’ Hitler had ordered. That ‘special task’ for Hess must have been a last ditch effort to make direct personal contact with the ‘Peace Party’ which had forced the confidence vote in the House only four days earlier, in a bid to bypass or to help unseat Churchill and to reach agreement on a means of achieving mass Jewish resettlement. [See above, pp. 32–33.] Hess was left to languish in prison and to eventually face a war crimes trial.²⁵³

Churchill did not get his hoped for response from Washington – troops for Iraq – but Berlin made immediate arrangements with Vichy France for German planes to use Syrian airfields and for three quarters of the war materials held in Syria to be transferred to Iraq. Rashid Ali also anticipated the arrival of German airborne forces. However, even though Hitler saw Iraq as the key to wrecking the English position between the Mediterranean and the Persian Gulf, and even though both Ribbentrop and Mussolini urged him to, he would not release units from the equally critical battle for Crete for ten days.

With regard to the Far East, the conclusion of the Japanese mediation between Thailand and Vichy France – the ceding of territory from both Laos and Cambodia to Thailand under the French Treaty of Peace on May 9 – went almost unnoticed in Britain in view of the Hess ‘defection’, and the Kobe Jewcom delegates were hardly home from Tokyo when, on May 12, the JIC approved two rumours for circulation. The first, that the United States Navy would blockade Japan at the first sign of trouble, was to offset the weakening of the US naval presence in the Pacific and it soon got Whitehall into trouble with the State Department which said that speculation about US intentions could lead to a backlash against it. The second, described German aims in Asia as clashing with those of Japan, especially in regard to the control of resources in the Dutch East Indies. This involved a series of articles on the activities of a German fifth column operating in Japan and naturally put the Jewish refugees under suspicion. Craigie later reported that it had 'an effective result.'²⁵⁴

CONTROL OF THE MIDDLE EAST

With so much manoeuvring in Europe and the Far East and with the British Government's heavy censorship of news from the Middle East it was easy for the general public to overlook the importance of the battles which had begun for control of the Middle East and its oil. Only some of them were on the ground with guns, and on May 12 Hitler ordered two bombers to Iraq to help Rashid Ali in what was proving a rather unequal bid to throw out the British. That day, a message from the Japanese ambassador in Baghdad to Tokyo advising that the Iraqis could only hold out for a few more days was intercepted by the British. It was immediately relayed via Churchill to the commander in chief, Middle East, and next day, to make sure that the ambassador was right, units of the Arab Legion, commanded by British Major Glubb, and the Transjordanian Frontier Force were ordered to cross the frontier and relieve the British forces at Habbaniya. The Transjordanians mutinied. They objected to the British using Arabs to fight Arabs. The lead units of the Arab Legion arrived five days later having crossed 300 miles of desert.

On May 15 Sorge advised Moscow that the date of Germany's invasion of Russia was set for June 22. He was spot on, but rumours were flying so thick and fast that Stalin still refused to believe the invasion reports.²⁵⁵ Hitler knew that on the question of an invasion of Russia he had an ally in the Vatican who was acting quite consistently in his bid to build an anti-Communist alliance of the West with which Hitler's Germany could be integrated, and Stalin knew equally well that he had an enemy there. But neither knew how determined the Vatican was that Hitler's venture – and his bid for secrecy – should succeed or that Hitler had a fifth column in his service who may have succeeded in destroying that secrecy except for Vatican intervention. According to author Avro Manhattan, the fifth column, and a conspirator against Hitler, was Hitler's chief of Secret Police, Admiral Canaris, who was on intimate relations with Franco and who had been very influential in ensuring that both Germany and Italy provided the troops and arms which turned the Spanish Civil War in Franco's favor. Manhattan maintains that Canaris advised the Vatican of Hitler's Barbarossa invasion plan, including the date, and in a bid to prevent it and to bring Hitler down, he intended to advise the Allies and Russia also. Manhattan wrote:

(Canaris) posted one of his most trusted agents at the Vatican, from where his information was eventually transmitted to British Intelligence agents, also with headquarters at the Vatican. When the Vatican got wind of Canaris' wish to inform Soviet Russia also of the approaching invasion, it promptly blackmailed him with the threat that, should he notify Soviet Russia of the date of the coming attack, the Vatican would inform Hitler of Canaris' betrayal. ... The Vatican, like Hitler, wanted Russia to be taken by surprise, surprise in war being accounted almost half of total victory.²⁵⁶

We cannot be sure whether Canaris ignored the blackmail and pressed on, or whether Sorge received his information from some other source. There were so many people involved in planning Operation Barbarossa that it would be extremely surprising if there were not other people of like mind to Canaris. The date, June 22, had already been reported in diplomatic circles by April 24, because on that date the German naval attaché in Moscow alerted the navy high command in Berlin to the fact that: "The British Ambassador predicts June 22 as the day of the outbreak of war."²⁵⁷ Either Cripps had discussed it with a third party through whom the leak was passed to the naval attaché, or German intelligence had intercepted a message between Cripps and Whitehall. The source of the leak does not matter. It simply means that Churchill was also aware of the planned invasion date no later than April 24. But Stalin knew the black propaganda system so well – and that it was stacked against him – that through his inflexibility he had become a victim of it.

Around that time the Vatican was having a steady stream of visitors. Among them was Pavelik who arrived back on May 18 after only a month away, well entrenched as 'Poglavnik' or Fuhrer in Croatia. He had two errands. The first, at Hitler's urging, was to make a gift of a clutch of Croatian districts and Dalmatian coastal cities to Italy and sign a state treaty with Mussolini which was to be the basis of international recognition. The second was to receive de facto recognition of the Independent State of Croatia from the Holy See during a "devotional" audience with Pius XII – fully four days after the ghastly massacre at Glina. He had a papal blessing for his "bastion against Communism," his totalitarian dictatorship which was set up by courtesy of Hitler and Mussolini jointly, and his efforts to eliminate Jews, Gypsies and Orthodox Christians alike in which both clergy and Catholic laity often took a leading part.²⁵⁸

In London, in spite of the effects of the black propaganda which Britain was spreading in Asia, Shigemitsu sought to keep the Tientsin and trade negotiations going, especially in view of the fact that Japan's negotiations with the Dutch authorities in Batavia also appeared to be grinding to a halt. It should have been clear that, in the circumstances, if Britain assisted Japan to maintain its domestic economy through negotiations with the Dutch authorities the pressure and incentive for it to make greater demands on Thailand and French Indochina would have been lessened. However, in a cabinet meeting on May 15, Churchill maintained that Japan would only make a dramatic move if Britain suffered a major reverse in the European conflict. His assessment in military terms may have been reasonable, but he was not making sufficient allowance for political and economic factors. Next day Butler formally advised Shigemitsu that the government could not see any purpose served by continuing the Tientsin and trade talks.

They were at an end. Even so, Shigemitsu made one last desperate attempt to revive them, telling Butler that “the Payments Agreement (provided) the only opportunity for maintaining discussion of any sort between our two governments in a period of crisis.”

Whitehall, and Churchill in particular, do not seem to have understood that every move they made was not just making economic life more difficult for Japan: it was boosting the pressure in the boiler of its anti-colonial aspirations, forcing it further into a corner and restricting any options it had other than to strengthen its questionable alliance with Germany.

One more day on and, on May 17, Hull briefed Halifax in Washington on the fact that he had been having discussions with Japan’s ambassador in the US, Nomura, since March. It was what Whitehall had feared and suspected but it was the first official confirmation, and four days later, the 21st, Eden instructed Halifax to tell Hull of Britain’s concerns that Japan may use those talks to drive a wedge between Britain and the US. In view of Britain’s actions, what else did he expect? Hull was to be told that “only a policy of firmness would detach Japan from the Axis.” Next day, the 22nd, with Whitehall somewhat less fearful that Japan was about to seize bases in Thailand and Indochina, but with the US suspicious of any concessions which Britain might make to Thailand, the cabinet Far Eastern Committee (FEC) agreed that Britain should supply Thailand with oil in return for rubber and tin, thus denying those commodities to Japan and tightening the screws a bit further.

On the same day, not being aware of that decision but even in the face of Britain having called off the Tientsin and trade talks, Matsuoka asked Craigie whether it would be possible to use Britain’s good offices to rescue the talks between Tokyo and Batavia. This was a remarkable opportunity for Britain to recover some of the prestige it lost when it had to watch Japan negotiate a settlement between Thailand and the French in Indochina, but the Foreign Office didn’t see it that way. They would not even act on Craigie’s suggestion that it was an opportunity for three-way discussions on Japan’s needs and whether it would agree to accept supplies with a guarantee of no re-export to a belligerent country. They rejected it out of hand because “talks only encouraged Japanese aggression” and the preferred way ahead was restrictions on Japan’s access to East Indies resources.²⁵⁹ At least they were being consistent in their policy of denial.

There were very few bouquets for Britain’s foreign policy for the next few days. Hull, who did not receive Eden’s message until May 24, was greatly angered, claiming that Eden was accusing him of being naïve. Eden had to apologize to avoid a serious downturn in Anglo-US relations.²⁶⁰

The Syrian action also gave the Jewish para-military forces an opportunity to be more directly involved in the war. The government relaxed its policy towards Haganah and in turn this gave Churchill an opportunity to keep the Jewish cause before Cabinet. The British Army needed every assistance it could get and senior Haganah officers were invited to collaborate in preparing lists of bridges and tunnels which were vulnerable to sabotage in Lebanon, Syria, Turkey and Iran. A special strike company, the Palmach, was then set up to strike against pro-

Nazi Arab groups, to disrupt communications, sabotage transport and airfields and protect both British posts and Jewish settlements in Palestine from attack by such groups.²⁶¹ On May 19, noting those efforts in a Cabinet paper on Syria, Churchill argued that Britain should negotiate with King Ibn Saud towards a Jewish State of Western Palestine with “the fullest rights of self government, including immigration and development, and provision for expansion in the desert regions to the southward, which they would gradually reclaim.”²⁶²

The Iraqis had largely been left to act on their own for six weeks. At that point the combined pressures on Roosevelt, including Churchill’s appeals, had some effect and on May 27 he proclaimed an unlimited national emergency, warning Americans that if, in modern times, you “wait till you see the whites of their eyes you will never know what hit you.”²⁶³ British forces reached Baghdad on May 30, Rashid Ali fled to Iran with the former Mufti and the German and Italian Ministers. The Regent was reinstated. The immediate threat to Britain’s oil supplies from Iraq had been quashed.^{264 265 266} The Iraqis had held out for 18 days and then had to throw in the towel because neither Germany nor Italy were in a position to send any more aircraft and fuel. The Japanese ambassador had been only half right. But his colleague in London, Shigemitsu, was very close to the mark when he showed his total frustration in a final conversation with Butler that day, complaining that British economic policy towards Japan was ‘vindictive.’ He was recalled to Japan shortly afterwards.²⁶⁷

However, as a result of the Iraqi episode Britain had to contend with the presence of German aircraft in Syria for a time. In addition, intelligence obtained while the Iraqi uprising was in progress revealed the collaboration between King Farouk and senior Egyptian officers, and the Nazis. A former Inspector General of the Egyptian Army was intercepted by the RAF en route to Beirut from where he planned to defect to Germany with vital data on British troop strength. Those facts increased the threat to Britain’s control of the Suez canal and brought the major Abadan oil refinery at the head of the Persian Gulf, as well as Basra and the Mediterranean oil terminals, within Germany’s range and illustrate further the extent to which Britain’s support for the Zionist cause in Palestine had undermined its strategic position.

The loss of Crete, which was being evacuated under great pressure, and with very heavy naval losses in the Scandinavian campaigns and the threat of the loss of the Middle East had brought Britain to yet another point of great crisis and Whitehall was doing all it could to gain diplomatic support from countries not involved in the war, and to draw Russia into the war and, in opening an additional front, relieve the pressure. After discussions with Eden on May 30 Cadogan noted:

*Fact is that our military weakness and the sensational ineptitude of our commanders, diplomacy is completely hamstrung. For instance – Russia. You can’t do anything nowadays with any country unless you can (a) threaten (b) bribe it. Russia has (a) no fear of us whatever and (b) we have nothing to offer her. Then you can juggle with words and jiggle with drafts as much as you like, and you’ll get nowhere.*²⁶⁸

Then next day:

Chiefs of Staff have come to conclusion that Germany is prepared to attack Russia. I agree, but I believe that Russia will give way and sign on the dotted line. I wish she wouldn't, as I should love to see Germany expending her strength there. But they're not such fools (as our general staff). But we must consider how we can use threat of fact of bombing to Baku.
[Emphasis in original.]²⁶⁹

It was decided that day, Saturday, that Eden should meet Russian Ambassador Maisky the following Monday, June 2, and that morning he met with Cadogan and Butler to discuss what approach to take. Cadogan noted: "Germans are evidently ready to attack Russia. And they will do so if they don't get what they want. I think they will get what they want. I hope they won't because that would give us time, and it must be some effort for them." He later noted that it "seems to have been quite a useful interview."²⁷⁰

The threat to Abadan had to be eliminated. However, the problem involved the thorny question of Britain's relations with each of the Vichy French Government, the Free French forces, the Arabs of Syria, Lebanon, Palestine and neighboring countries, and the Jews. And although Churchill was not prepared to discuss constitutional change with India he found it necessary to use both independence from France and internal partition on the basis of religion as a carrot to obtain Lebanese and Syrian support against the Vichy French and the Germans. It was the manipulation of World War I all over again. The attitudes were the same and the broken promises were much the same. There had just been a time lapse. When the Free French took control they refused to grant immediate independence and, against Churchill's wishes, appointed governors instead. Thus, on the eve of the joint invasion of Syria by British and Free French forces Churchill wrote to De Gaulle on June 6 saying "we have sought no special advantages in the French Empire, and have no intention of exploiting the tragic position of France for our own gain." [Presumably he had not kept De Gaulle informed on Britain's discussions with Franco over his 'Moroccan ambitions' and the future of Gibraltar.] He went on to write: "I welcome therefore your decision to promise independence to Syria and the Lebanon, and, as you know, I think it essential that we should lend to this promise the full weight of our guarantee. I agree that we must not in any settlement of the Syrian question endanger the stability of the Middle East. But subject to this we must both do everything possible to meet Arab aspirations and susceptibilities." He added: "I must ask you in this grave hour not to insist on declaring Catroux High Commissioner for Syria."

And to Roosevelt he wrote on June 7:

*We enter Syria in some force tomorrow ... De Gaulle's Free French outfit will be prominent but not in the van. He is issuing a proclamation to the Arabs offering in the name of France complete independence and opportunity to form either three or one or three-in-one free Arab States. Relations with France will be fixed by treaty safeguarding established interests somewhat on the Anglo-Egyptian model.*²⁷¹

The other battles for control of the oil fields were shielded from public scrutiny by the closed doors of embassies and company board rooms. Concessions were negotiated in each of Syria, Bahrain and Qatar during 1940 but drilling operations were shut down for the duration of the war.

In Saudi Arabia, where production had commenced only months before the outbreak of war, the war had dramatically cut the scale of the pilgrimage and King Ibn Saud was in financial difficulty as a result. Britain responded with financial assistance. In view of the nature of its long term involvement with the kingdom and the sensitivity of the political relationships resulting from the Balfour Declaration it was natural for it to do so, even without the added complications of World War II and Hitler's anti-Semitic intervention. However Socal and Texaco could only see the situation in terms of the bitter commercial and political competition for oil concessions and they feared increasing British influence in the region. They therefore made an advance of $US3,000,000 to the Saudi Arabian Government through their jointly owned operating company, the California-Arabian Standard Oil Company, as a loan to be offset against future royalties. They also promised to obtain a further $US3,000,000 in loans through the United States Government and sought the support of the US State Department in their battle for control of future oil concessions. The loan, which proved to be only the first of many which totalled about $US100,000,000 by 1947, was channelled through the British Government under the Lend Lease arrangements which took effect on March 11.^{272 273}

Just as the British and the Free French invaded Syria, about June 7, Zorach Warhaftig, a Polish refugee lawyer who had arrived in Kobe in October 1940, approached the Japanese naval commander in Shanghai, Captain Inuzuka, to discuss the Jewish refugee issue. He gained Inuzuka's agreement that in the event that it became impossible for the refugees in transit in Kobe to remain there, and if they were unable to gain entry to another country, they would be allowed entry to Shanghai. Warhaftig was involved with several of the major Jewish organizations in the United States including the Jewish Agency, the World Jewish Congress and the Joint Distribution Committee. He recognized that the international situation was deteriorating and that relations between Japan and the United States could soon be disrupted. A few days later the United States tightened its immigration laws, using the possibility of Nazi infiltration in the same way that Britain had, to justify barring entry to any refugee who had relatives in enemy occupied territory. It thus barred virtually all of the refugees in Kobe.

It was just as well Warhaftig did not bother approaching France. The Vichy government had just introduced the first of its Jewish Statutes. The cardinals, archbishops and Reformed leaders in France jointly made known their strong disapproval, but the Vichy Ambassador to the Holy See had reported favourably after his discussions with Vatican officials. The Vatican did not consider such laws in conflict with Catholic teaching, he said. The Holy See merely counselled that no provisions on marriage be added to the statutes and "that the precepts of justice and charity be considered in the application of the law."²⁷⁴ They were the views that counted.

On June 10 Maisky returned to give Eden Russia's response to the request for intervention he had made a week earlier. No negotiations, either economic or political, were in progress between Russia and Germany. Russia regarded its relations with Germany as being regulated by the Nazi-Soviet Pact of 1939 and “felt no anxiety about Hitler’s military intentions.”²⁷⁵ Not content to leave it there, Cadogan also saw Maisky and dictated a detailed account with dates, numbers and names of the German troops deployed along the Soviet frontier and this was passed on to Moscow.²⁷⁶ It brought a quicker response. On June 13 the Soviet newsagency Tass broadcast a statement which is believed to have been written by Stalin personally. “Responsible circles” had authorized Tass, it said, to refute foreign press reports of an impending war between Russia and Germany as “a clumsy propaganda manoeuvre of the forces arrayed against the Soviet Union and Germany which are interested in a spread and intensification of the war.” Rumours of Russian preparations were “false and provocative”, Germany had made no demands on Russia, and both countries were fulfilling the terms of the Nazi-Soviet Pact to the letter.²⁷⁷

Next day, June 14, while Stalin’s commanders sought to persuade him to let them put the army on alert, Hitler was holding final briefings with his commanders for Operation Barbarossa. He could not have known that while he did so his plans were being decoded in Washington for Roosevelt from a “Purple” intercept of Ambassador Oshima’s report to Tokyo of his personal conversation with Hitler. Roosevelt is thought to have received the decoded message at 11.38 AM Washington time on June 14 from his naval aide, Captain Beardall.²⁷⁸ In spite of that the Japanese government appears to have accepted Stalin’s statement because it had not been officially briefed by Hitler on his preparations, and ministers had other matters on their minds: the British trade restrictions. At a Japanese Liaison Conference (cabinet and services chiefs) on June 16 the army Chief of Staff, General Sugiyama Gen, with the support of the navy chief, insisted that South Indochina must be occupied by the end of July so that Japan would have the option of a military advance later in the year if the present level of economic pressure had not ceased.²⁷⁹

During those critical days in mid June the Soviet Government knew very well what to expect as it watched the ominous build up of Hitler’s forces. It had been party to the partition of Poland and it had been well aware of the work of Heydrich’s brainwashed and highly trained ‘special duty groups’, the Einsatzgruppen, which had shown remarkable coolness and calculated efficiency in the mass slaughter of Jews. It also had a very clear understanding of Divini Redemptoris and the Vatican’s wish to absorb the Russian Orthodox Church as it helped Hitler rescue the people of the Soviet Union from the clutches of its hated enemy, Communism. It is quite likely that the Soviet Government and its religious authorities were aware that the Vatican had already drawn up plans for an ecclesiastical ‘new order’ in the occupied territories of Russia and neither the religious or secular authorities would have welcomed that.²⁸⁰ In any event, regardless of their personal beliefs and their antagonism towards the church and its historical influence, Stalin and his government were well aware of the dramatic potential which the church had to either stimulate national morale and cohesion or to undermine it.

In spite of a setback in Iraq and Syria, and the interception of his deputy Rudolph Hess’s supposed ‘defection’ to Britain in search of a peace treaty on May 11, Hitler was in a powerful position. German forces had captured Crete, swept through Libya to Egypt, forced alliances with Finland and Rumania, and occupied Yugoslavia and Greece. He was ready to meet his target date of mid-June for the invasion of Russia. After carefully concealing the purpose of his troop build up in eastern Europe over three months he had more than three million troops mobilized along the 930 mile Russian border by June 20. This mass movement had involved about 250 trains each day for more than ten weeks, but Stalin's distrust of Britain and America was so deep seated that he still regarded all reports of such movements as part of their effort to involve Russia in the war. With such a lack of response from Russia, Hitler was supremely confident that he would avoid Napoleon's mistakes and that after a sharp campaign of a few weeks he would be master of Russia. He would then be ready to turn south, to the Middle East, and to return west where total victory would be only a matter of isolating Britain.

There was tension in the air in several capitals on Saturday June 21 1941 as those 'in-the-know' waited for Germany's massed forces – 120 divisions with another 26 in reserve – to burst across the Russian border. During the morning Stalin received reports from his border commander that "German aircraft with loaded bomb racks" had violated Russia air space, wire barricades had been moved, and engine sounds were heard in the woods, and a submarine commander reported a convoy of 32 German troop carriers at the entrance to the Gulf of Finland. Then he received advice from Maisky who had been told by his counterpart, Cripps, home for consultations, that Germany's invasion was expected next morning, or if not, by the 29th.²⁸¹ Only then, at two o'clock that afternoon, with his commanders pressing him to order a full mobilization, Stalin agreed to order the Russian armed forces to 75 per cent battle readiness. But he refused to go any further. Molotov was actually meeting with Schulenburg to enquire of Germany's position and why it had not responded to the Tass statement of June 13. It might incite Hitler to a retaliatory action.

At his country home, Chequers, Churchill entertained the US ambassador as his weekend guest and waited to hear of the action, having been told of Roosevelt's decision to support his planned announcement "welcoming Russia as an ally" ... and relaxed while he waited to make a broadcast next evening, having decided to defer it by 24 hours "as a result of (his) reflections" as he drove to Chequers from London on Friday evening, the 20th.²⁸² That decision raises many questions. Why did he defer the broadcast? What were his 'reflections'? Why had he previously planned to broadcast on the eve of the invasion instead of after the event? What did he hope to achieve by it? He had known the planned date of the invasion since at least April 24, (p. 46R, above) and he knew there was very little prospect of a deferral only hours before the deadline, but at least the Russia armies could have been put on full alert, ready to repulse the invasion. He knew that Stalin was being irrational in his refusal to believe the intelligence which had been passed to him from many sources, including Cadogan ten days earlier. If he was serious about either enabling the Soviet Union to prevent the invasion by a diplomatic 'sledgehammer', or to repulse it with minimum destruction, was this not the time for a direct contact, even by phone, with Stalin? Did he want the greatest 'shock value' from the invasion before a carefully planned diplomatic intervention? Or was he fearful that even a last minute alert might stop Hitler in his tracks and cause him to continue within the framework of his German-Soviet Pact, to revert to his earlier plan and to throw everything at Britain? Similar questions can be asked of Roosevelt's motives in allowing Hitler to proceed unhindered.

In Singapore the British commander received advice from the Admiralty, which (in view of his insistence that he see the originals of significant intelligence so that he could assess them for himself) must have also been seen by Churchill, that:

Japanese Govt: considers it essential to obtain without delay further information for the establishment of air bases in Southern Indo China and freedom for Naval and merchant ships to use harbour in that area.

Berlin is being asked to obtain Vichy's consent to these facilities. Berlin is to be told that Japan has of course no southern ambitions but only wishes to protect Indo China against British aggression and the De Gaulle movement. Japan intends to obtain these facilities with or without Germany's assistance. ²⁸³

It was about the same time that the British commander in Damascus was accepting the formal surrender of the Vichy French forces after the failed Arab revolt in Iraq.

A TREATY BROKEN: BRITAIN'S RELIEF

In Berlin, Hitler sat down to write to Mussolini to explain the decision he had taken. Then late at night, Ribbentrop sent word to the Russian embassy that he would see the ambassador at 4.00 am. Their exchange was very brief. Fifteen minutes later, 4.15 am on June 22, the invasion officially began, even before the ambassador could get word to Moscow. The surprise, the shock, was total. Most of the Russian units had not even received the partial mobilization order. German scouts had cut their telephone lines.

But even earlier, at 3.30 am, Stalin had been woken with news that bombing had taken place at three points. He met his two commanders and the full Politburo at 4.30 am at the Kremlin, but still refused to believe it was war. It must have been provoked border incidents, he argued. There had been no formal declaration of war, no negotiations, no meetings of foreign ministers. He ordered that the German ambassador be phoned. The caller was told that at that moment the ambassador was seeking a meeting with Molotov. A few minutes later he read a brief diplomatic note which left Molotov having to ask: "Is this a declaration of war?"

Stalin then agreed to the army being ordered to fight, but not to cross the frontier. There had to be negotiations. The foreign office was instructed to stay in touch with Berlin, but there was no point. He immediately asked Japan, through its ambassador, to urgently mediate between Germany and Russia. It was the third power in a series of three interwoven treaties which Stalin had been confident would preserve peace for him. But what could Japan do?

The Russian people were told that afternoon, by Molotov, not by Stalin, that they were at war with Germany. Stalin was in a state of shock. It was Russia's Saints Day. Metropolitan Sergius took an uncompromising stand. He called for whole-hearted support for the war effort in the crisis ahead. He did not do it in the context of support for one political, religious or irreligious system or another. He did it out of concern for the people of the nation. His appeal to patriotism galvanized the remnant Russian Orthodox Church and brought such a popular response that churches overflowed with worshippers praying for their suffering nation.

By the time the first Russian directive of the war was issued some hours later the Russia front was in chaos and the German advance was rapid. The chaos in Moscow initially was no less than that on the front. The Defence Commissariat prepared a decree naming Stalin as Commander in Chief but he directed that it be held back for discussion with the Politburo. Then for several days he was depressed, nervous and off balance,²⁸⁴ and it is now suggested that he suffered a form of breakdown. But it is also apparent that he knew he should take full responsibility for the situation and that he expected to be purged in the manner that he had applied so ruthlessly. In despair and with no idea what to do, he fled the city, leaving the government virtually rudderless, and went into hiding at his dacha at Kuntsevo, out of contact with the Kremlin. And in spite of the lack of a clearly spelled out command structure, Stalin's desertion, and the quarreling and competition between ministers and between generals which was inevitable in the circumstances – and the destruction of one quarter of the entire Soviet air force (much of it on the ground) by midday on the day of the invasion – the resistance shown by the armies at the front was determined and creditable.

On June 23 an Evacuation Council was set up to organize the dismantling, removal and re-assembly of more than 1,500 armament factories in Western Russia and the Ukraine to safety in the east. On the 26th Beria ordered the establishment of special home defence units, 'destruction battalions', to prevent sabotage and to guard against German parachute landings and on the 27th Krushchev ordered the organization of small partisan detachments to infiltrate the German lines and do what Beria was trying to prevent on their side of the frontier. No Russian leaders seemed too concerned that day when Finland, Hungary, Rumania and Albany were all found to be at war against them in alliance with Germany. By the 28th the German column which had advanced through the centre of occupied Poland had reached Minsk, 40 kilometers inside Russian territory on the Berlin-Moscow railway in blitzkrieg fashion and was one third of its way to Moscow.

During those critical days Hitler and the Vatican were each trying to exploit the other and the question of religion was prominent in everyone's propaganda. Only a few weeks before Barbarossa the church presses had been ordered closed, all minor religious sects were disbanded and their clergy or leaders were consigned to concentration camps, and the expropriation of church properties and monasteries had been stepped up. On May 31, notwithstanding Hitler's comments to his commanders that he admired the Catholic Church for its influence on discipline and stability,²⁸⁵ Bormann, issued instructions that the influence of the church was to be curtailed because National Socialism and Christianity were irreconcilable.²⁸⁶ The Christian church was built on ignorance, he said, while National Socialism rests on scientific foundations and the Fuhrer holds the spiritual reins.²⁸⁷ But now, within days of the invasion, the man 'holding the spiritual reins' personally directed that a temporary halt should be called to the expropriations of church property and, while the Soviet authorities facing him across the battle fields made full use of the call by Metropolitan Sergius, the German newsreel and print propaganda focused on the restoration of “freedom of religion” in the East. They showed churches which had been used as atheistic museums, warehouses and club rooms being restored to religious use and widespread religious renewal by the Germans in the wake of Soviet defeats.

If they had ever been in any doubt, Roosevelt and Churchill did not have to wait long for confirmation of what the pope thought of Hitler’s move against the Soviet Union. They had to tread very carefully. Pope Pius XII had no criticism at all. He did not release a formal statement at the time of the invasion but he let it be known that the Nazi fight against Bolshevism was “high minded gallantry in defence of the foundations of Christian culture.” [Emphasis added.] And Franco was one who responded to the Vatican’s encouragement to show the same ‘high minded gallantry’ and to side openly with the Nazis, even though he had to consider that “the flames of civil war were still smouldering under the surface” in Spain and his response was informal. He permitted the organization of an anti-Bolshevik force of 17,000 persons, presumably volunteers, to fight with Nazi forces on the Russian frontier. These troops became known as the ‘Blue Division’ and it is said that most of them wore prints and medallions with the image of Our Lady of Fatima. Shades of World War I. [See chapter 18, p. 5L] Spain was officially neutral. It is not listed as a belligerent in the war and it is not normally listed among countries providing forces or suffering casualties, but Franco is reported as saying: “If the road to Berlin were opened, then not merely would one division of Spaniards participate in the (anti-Communist) struggle, but one million Spaniards would be offered to help.”²⁸⁸

The pope’s sentiments about “high minded gallantry in defence of the foundations of Christian culture” sat uncomfortably with his statement at the time of the invasion of Holland but they were in close accord with the stand of the church when Hitler invaded Poland. His stand against support for the Soviet Union was echoed by a number of Catholic clergy in Germany, some of whom saw the invasion as a European Crusade, but the Nazis were clearly disappointed that they did not get the same supportive and compliant blessing from the Catholic bishops in conference that they got from the German Evangelical Church. The G.E.C. executive sent Hitler a telegram thanking him for his inspiring call “to take up arms against the deadly enemy of all stability and of our Christian Western culture,” and saying that “since British policy now aligns itself as an ally of Bolshevism against the Reich, this is an ultimate sign that it [Britain] is not concerned about Christianity but only with the annihilation of the German nation.”²⁸⁹ That response was more in keeping with the blessings which Hitler had received from both of the recognized churches on the outbreak of war. (Chapter 22, pp. 31R, 36L).

Naturally the church’s supportive response to the invasion of Russia again raised concern about which way the pope may jump in future and caused added strains within the Western Alliance so that Roosevelt promptly sent Taylor back to the Vatican to re-establish the office of the President’s Personal Representative. The stark contrast between Sergius’ call for Russian patriotism, and the support by the Catholic Bishops Conference for the Nazi invasions of Poland and the pope’s support for the invasion of Russia, attracted widespread diplomatic attention. The pope’s support was clearly given with an eye to the collaborative control of the churches in both countries under concordats with Hitler. It therefore illustrated very clearly the impossibility of pastoral guidance being given and decisions being made strictly on the basis of consistent religious principle under the system of Ultramontanism which the Vatican continued to espouse. The conflicts of interest and the inevitability of interference in national affairs through the power of the clergy over highly disciplined congregations which every country recognized and feared – and which had forced Roosevelt to reopen his personal representative's office at the Vatican – simply could not be ignored.²⁹⁰

The Western powers were in bind over how to exploit the situation and the general public was confused. Perhaps the nasty atheistic Communists were not so bad after all, and didn't "we" have to support them if Hitler was to be brought down? On the other hand Hitler had his concordat with "the Church" which had sought to exploit that relationship to build a coalition against Communism. Britain in particular had to handle the matter very delicately because if it antagonized the Vatican the weight of Catholic nations could be thrown behind Hitler's campaign – not only against Soviet Russia but, by implication and through the early release of German forces to divert to the west, against Britain as well. And both Britain and the United States, fearful for their own hides, had to persuade the Vatican to change sides and accept the provision of military support for the Soviet Union. Its hopes for the Catholicization of the East, and Soviet Russia in particular, were in disarray.

Or were they? In spite of Nazi opposition the evangelization plan of the Congregation for the Eastern Churches was being put into effect and, at first, Hitler could do nothing about it because it was consistent with Nazi propaganda about the restoration of religion as Germany's armies swept all before them. As the German juggernaut rolled across the Ukraine priests of many nationalities from the Russicum and the Ruthenian College in the Vatican, plus volunteers from Poland, Hungary, Slovakia and Croatia went too, in a variety of roles. Some travelled as military chaplains, others as civilians in the army's employ, others in whatever guises they could find to use until they came to a community in which they could engage in pastoral or missionary work. They took enormous risks. They found large numbers of people who had a deep yearning for the sacraments, but there were also large numbers for whom a religious experience was simply release from the circumstances in which they found themselves. They had a range of target groups: former Roman Catholics, Eastern Rite Catholics, Latin Rite Catholics, the Orthodox of various national persuasions, the un-churched, and a few of competing faiths. But they also planned to support the remaining Catholic Eastern Rite communities with resources, including liturgical and teaching books, whenever they located them. But when they were identified by the current occupying power it did not matter much whether it was the Nazis or the Communists. Neither side welcomed them. The death rate was high. Many were shot as either spies or deserters, while others had to survive the rigors of concentration camps or gulags. Heydrich set out a somewhat garbled version of the Tisserant Plan in a memo for the Foreign Ministry ten days after the start of the campaign, saying that the undercover clergy would be engaged in intelligence gathering and looking for opportunities to establish Catholicism in the wake of the German advance and that it was necessary “to prevent Catholicism from becoming the real beneficiary of the war.”²⁹¹

However it was still very early days in the German-Russian war which would run for four years and later be described as the longest, most intensive and brutal conflict between two nations in history²⁹² but although Hitler was supremely confident that it would be over very quickly, Ribbentrop realized it was going to be very difficult unless a second front was opened against Russia by another country. His strategy was now exactly the same as Churchill’s against Germany. He completely reversed the sentiment he had expressed to Matsuoka three months earlier. On June 28 he turned to Matsuoka again and appealed for Japan to strike at the Soviet Union in the Far East. This was the best way, he said, of keeping the United States neutral, because it would see “the utter futility of entering the war on the side of Great Britain” when it was isolated and confronted by the most powerful alliance in the world.²⁹³ It was Hitler’s view that the United States had to be destroyed to prevent its intervention in both Europe and Asia and he invited Japan to enjoy the spoils of Russia by occupying the Far Eastern Territory.

But Ribbentrop was not the only person who was trying to focus attention on Japan at that stage. There was no consensus in Whitehall about whether Japan would strike north against Russia or south against Britain, nor about which would be to Britain’s greater disadvantage. There was consensus that both would be to Britain’s disadvantage, that it was in Japan’s interests to go one way or the other, and that it was not likely to accept being placed at a disadvantage – losing trade, regional influence and the opportunity to lead Asia out of colonial subjugation and into a New Order – which would be the effect if it remained neutral and did not respond to one or other of its treaty obligations. The Joint Intelligence Committee (JIC) discussed Japan’s situation in the light of the invasion and on June 25 concluded that Britain should try to deter it from moving south into Indochina by opening up a vigorous press campaign against it, such as “has already succeeded once in January/February of this year – and may succeed again.” The black propaganda system was activated immediately. It did not seem to matter that the consequences for international race relations would be devastating, plunging them to new depths, or that Whitehall could neither assess Japan’s likely decision, or that it had no constructive initiatives to offer, and apart from the propaganda program “British policy was left in a state of limbo.”²⁹⁴

On the 29th, in the light of the rapid German advance to Minsk, the Russian government issued a policy directive that only scorched earth was to be left for the Germans. Everything usable and movable was to be removed as the Russians withdrew to new defensive positions. A plan for the immediate evacuation of over 200,000 children from the Leningrad region was also announced. Then next day, June 30, eight days after the invasion, when Molotov and other members of the Politburo went to find Stalin he was sitting in an armchair in his dining room. He looked up in surprise and asked, as if expecting to be arrested, “What have you come for?” Molotov suggested setting up a State Defence Committee, GOKO, and that Stalin should be chairman. The broken strong-man of the Communist World looked surprised and simply said “Fine.” From that point he began to recover his composure and returned to the Kremlin. [At a victory dinner two weeks after VE Day he confirmed his fear of being overthrown, saying: “A different people would have said to the government: ‘You have failed to justify our expectations. Go away. We shall install another government which will conclude peace with Germany.’”^{295]}

On July 3 Stalin, having been enticed back by his colleagues and still being, in the mind of the masses, their indispensable leader, broadcast to the Russian people. He told them what the rest of the world already knew: that Lithuania, Latvia, Western Byelorussia (now Belarus) and large parts of the Western Ukraine had already been lost. He called on the people to leave scorched earth behind them if they had to retreat, but to stand their ground and wage a relentless struggle against the enemy. It is not clear whether, at that date, he knew of the decision that Japan would not attack Russia.²⁹⁶

NO MENTION OF POLAND

Stalin does not appear, however, to have mentioned the loss of the annexed areas of Poland. This was an omission which the Polish government in exile and Churchill were eager to put right. Perhaps the omission was very deliberate, because there had been continuous discussions in London between Whitehall and the Polish government-in-exile which was in touch with the underground and had been receiving reports of the German build up on the Russian frontier ever since March.²⁹⁷ The situation was being monitored closely and the Poles in London and therefore the British government must have known of two particular incidents involving the mass murder of Polish Jews as the Russians retreated under Hitler’s onslaught across the region which they had annexed.

The first was at Kovno in Lithuania, which had come under Russian control on the signing of the German-Soviet Pact in August 1939. The Lithuanian Soviet Socialist Republic had then been proclaimed on July 21, 1940, and many Lithuanian politicians and government officials were arrested and jailed. When German troops swept into the town on June 24 they were welcomed as liberators. What happened then is somewhat confusing. Gilbert notes that within 48 hours, on June 26, elements of the local population set about attacking the Jewish community of 35,000, which included a large proportion of refugees from Poland, and more than 1,000 people were killed. No doubt they were encouraged and assisted by Hitler’s Einsatzgruppen. But later, referring to discussions at Hitler’s headquarters on July 5, Gilbert also notes that according to a German Special Task Force report some 2,500 Jews had been killed in Kovno even before the Germans had occupied the city. Subsequently the slaughter in Lithuania reached 200,000 during the period of the Nazi occupation. Of that total 165,000 were Jews.²⁹⁸ But the distinction is that in the ‘incident’ of June 26 and in the previous episodes it was not the Nazis who did the killing: it was Lithuanians of the dominantly Catholic community.

The other incident occurred at L’vov in eastern Galicia, another centre with a checkered history, on June 29. It was at L’vov that the Republic of the Western Ukraine had been declared on November 1, 1918, in a Western-supported bid by the White Russians to remain independent of the Ukrainian Soviet Socialist republic. But, in quick succession, the region came under Soviet domination two years later before being ceded to Poland under the Treaty of Riga. Then in 1939 it was part of the region annexed by the Soviet union under the German-Soviet Pact and, with great friction, it also suffered repression for two years until the Nazi invasion. When the onslaught of the invasion broke over them the Russian NKVD massacred 3,000 Ukrainian political prisoners – many of whom would have been Jews – before retreating under the German assault. Like the Lithuanians at Kovno, the local Ukrainian nationalist population then continued the task, slaughtering large numbers of Jews in the streets.²⁹⁹ Again, the distinction applies. Although the region soon became a base for massive Nazi atrocities against the Jews, this initial slaughter was by the Russians and the Ukrainian Nationalists who encompassed a wide range of active and nominal Orthodox and Catholic Christians.

On July 4, while the Western powers were pondering the implications of Stalin's broadcast, British intelligence intercepted a message from Tokyo to Berlin. Although Matsuoka was prepared to immediately turn against Russia, his colleagues were not. Japan had already been asked by Russia to intervene as mediator between it and Germany under the Pact of Neutrality, and it was not convinced that a lightning victory was likely in any case. The Japanese government therefore rejected Ribbentrop's appeal to launch an attack on Russia and had decided that while it would 'carefully monitor' the situation in Siberia it would push to obtain bases in French Indochina instead.^{300 301} This relieved the British anxiety that 'treacherous' Japan would strike against Russia and in doing so make Hitler's task easier³⁰² by increasing the likelihood that Russia would sue for an armistice, and it strengthened Britain's hand in anticipated negotiations with Russia over the Polish question, but it deepened Britain's crises in other respects. It had to 'restrain' Japan's move south.

A meeting between the Polish government in exile and the Soviet ambassador in London took place on July 5, so whether Stalin approved it after his return to the Kremlin or whether it had been approved by members of the Politburo in his absence, Stalin must have known about it at the time of his broadcast. Britain had given both the Polish government and Jewish organizations guarantees which actually precipitated its declaration of war against Germany. It was therefore under pressure to secure the safety of those who were now trying to flee before the onslaught into Russian territory; the liberation of all Poles who had been deported to the labour camps of Russia after the occupation, whether they were prisoners of war or civilians; and agreement that Russia would annul its claim to the annexed territory to enable Poland to be reinstated after Germany had been defeated.³⁰³ That was to be no easy matter in view of the fact that Stalin had made it clear to Hitler – and to the world – after the partition of Poland that he was not interested in either a rump state or the re-establishment of the country. A history of assaults against Russia from the West and the insidious alliances which the Vatican was intent on manipulating to bring down the Soviet system made it vital for Russia to retain control of the region as a buffer zone. Nothing had changed. There was a bitter stand-off.

Britain therefore had a very difficult task as it tried to negotiate an Anglo-Soviet agreement. It wanted to honour its obligations to Poland and the Jewish organizations, but it could not do so at the risk of losing an Anglo-Russian agreement. Britain would be of no help to Poland either then or in the future if its failure to achieve an agreement contributed to Russia making a separate peace with Germany and withdrawing from the war. Poland would certainly be erased from the map and Britain would face an even graver danger of defeat as well. Churchill wrote:

... we could not admit the legality of the Russian occupation (but neither could Britain) force our new and sorely threatened ally to abandon, even on paper, regions of her frontiers which she had regarded ... as vital ... There was no way out. The issue of the territorial future of Poland must be postponed until easier times. ... I sincerely hoped for my part that with the deepening experience of comradeship in arms against Hitler the major Allies would be able to resolve the territorial problems in an amicable discussion at the conference table. In the clash of battle at this vital point in the war all must be subordinated to strengthening the common military effort." ³⁰⁴

On July 6, the day after that first round of Polish-Russian talks, and two days after the British government learned of Japan's plans, Richard Sorge was able to radio the dramatic news of Japan's decision to Moscow from Tokyo, Russia was immediately able to begin moving forces from the east to reinforce those in the west.³⁰⁵

Hitler's expectation of a quick victory against Russia was mirrored by Churchill's fear of the same thing. It was that fear rather than his want to fight in tandem with Russia against Hitler's Germany which was fuelling its efforts to secure an Anglo-Russian accord and Churchill's determination to keep Russia in the war. It was a re-run of 1918, except that it was not Tsarist Russia that Britain was determined to keep in the war, but its successor, Communist Russia. If Russia made a separate peace with Germany, Hitler need only leave a security force in the east and he could immediately turn three quarters of his armies against British interests – about three million instead of less than one million – and mount the cross-channel invasion which he had deferred after the unsuccessful air Battle for Britain.

By the time the Russian government had learned of Japan's decision not to intervene, Ambassador Cripps had been able to have preliminary talks and had relayed a request to London that Whitehall receive a Russian military mission, but there had been no other contact. So, noting the "oppressive" silence at the Soviet top level which he was astute enough to link with his intrusion against the Bolshevik government in 1918, Churchill decided to take advantage of Cripps's reports and wrote direct to Stalin on July 7. He referred to British action in the Arctic to prevent Germany servicing its invasion force in Russia, said the government would welcome the arrival of the Russian mission "in order to concert future plans", and pressed, through Cripps, for a reciprocal mission to visit Moscow and for agreement for a joint Anglo-Russian declaration.

At this point the US administration, well informed on the moves in all directions, was becoming concerned at the prospect that America might be drawn into conflicts in two regions as a consequence of Hitler's invasion of Russia, even though, in its view, any responsibility which it had for the origins of the conflicts was minor and peripheral. On July 9 Britain learned through Halifax that the Under-Secretary of State, Welles, had advised Roosevelt that if Japan made another move the US should impose a complete economic embargo against it without any forewarning. Eden's response was that while Britain was "reluctant to discourage the United States from strong measures provided they are prepared to face the consequences," he felt that a one-blow embargo would force the Japanese government to either reverse its policy completely or exert maximum pressure to the south.³⁰⁶ If it reversed its policy it was not likely to simply pigeon-hole its plan for a New Order in Asia. It was more likely to respond to Germany's encouragement and appeals, and strike north against Russia.

Churchill was well aware of the importance of getting a joint Anglo-Russian declaration as quickly as possible because he expected that Germany would continue to apply pressure for Japan to enter the war. He was right. Ribbentrop contacted the German ambassador in Tokyo on July 10, just when the German advance was gaining momentum and when the Japanese ambassador in Moscow had already reported that Russia was, in effect, close to collapse. He noted that Japan must solve "the matter of Vladivostok and the Siberian area" as soon as her military preparations are complete and told the ambassador to insist on Japan's entry into the war against Russia at the first possible date. "The sooner this entry is effected the better it is," he said. "The natural objective still remains that we and Japan join hands on the Trans-Siberian railroad before winter starts."³⁰⁷

Similarly, Churchill freely admitted to his colleagues the urgency of sustaining Russia's defence to keep it in the war but he continued to deny to Stalin that this was his motive in suddenly turning friendly and he consistently tried to play down the significance of Russia's resistance instead of submission. He wrote to the Admiralty on the same day that Ribbentrop appealed again for Japanese support, saying that the effect upon Russian resistance of the arrival of a small British naval contingent "might be of enormous value and spare a lot of English blood." Then: "The advantage we should reap if the Russians could keep the field and go on with the war, at any rate until the winter closes in, is measureless. A premature peace by Russia would be a terrible disappointment to great masses of people in our country."³⁰⁸ And on the same day he proposed to Stalin a joint declaration by the British and Soviet governments that they would "mutually undertake to render each other assistance of all kinds in the present war against Germany (and) during this war ... neither negotiate nor conclude an armistice or treaty of peace except by mutual agreement."³⁰⁹ He might as well have simply sent a copy of the documents from 1918.

In his memoirs the inconsistency in Churchill's statements is obvious. He said "the entry of Russia into the war was welcome but not immediately helpful to us (and) the German armies were so strong that it seemed that for many months they could maintain the invasion threat against England while at the same time plunging into Russia." 'Entry' was hardly an appropriate term in the circumstances. Russia did not 'enter.' It sought to remain aloof from it. Either 'Russia's enforced involvement' in the war or its 'refusal to submit' would have been better terms but they would not have made the sentence any more accurate. Churchill even claimed that the diversion of armaments to Russia under the joint accord had imposed “most heavy sacrifices and drains” upon Britain. But in the same passage he admitted that “Russian entry into the war diverted the German air attack from Great Britain and diminished the threat of invasion (and) gave us important relief in the Mediterranean.” Similarly, while he did not want to challenge “the conclusion which history will affirm that the Russian resistance broke the power of the German armies and inflicted mortal injury (on Germany)” he claimed it was, for more than a year, a burden and not a help, even though “we rejoiced ... that even if the Soviet armies were driven back to the Ural Mountains Russia would still exert an immense and, if she persevered in the war, an ultimately decisive force.”³¹⁰ She just had to work through the chaos of the first few weeks after the invasion.

RUSSIA’S CRISIS OF LEADERSHIP

The causes of that chaos were many but either directly or indirectly they were all linked with the self-understanding and conduct of the amorphous Christian gel as we have already seen: right back to the development of Marxism and the Bolshevik Revolution in Tsarist Russia. Stalin’s pathetic failure to act on the advice of his army chiefs and diplomats, which meant that there was no warning of the invasion at all for the forces at the frontier, was one. The fact that its communications system had been virtually destroyed before a shot was fired, and the concentration of the massed German forces, highly trained and well equipped, were others. But there were more important ones. There was Stalin’s unyielding belief in his treaties, even though he realized that war between the opposing political philosophies of Hitler’s National Socialism and Fascism on one hand and Marxist Communism on the other was virtually inevitable. Then there was the effect of Britain’s black propaganda program coupled with the fact that Britain was, at the same time, trying to manoeuvre Hitler into an assault on Russia, and trying to coerce Russia into joining the war against Hitler’s Germany.

Those linked efforts had very little to do with political philosophy. Britain would not have gone to war to eliminate either of those philosophies. It had no love for them because they were both challenges to its established socio-economic system and its self understanding as the shining example of the White Western Christian power. But it would no longer go to war to put them down as it had in its bid to usurp the Russian Bolshevik Revolution in 1918. The only reason it would go to war was to prop up its position of privilege as an imperial power. It would use the church’s opposition to Communism to justify and to generate public support for actions against Communist powers when it wanted to take action for other reasons but, regardless of the Vatican’s endless pressure for such action, it would not go to war against them for simply philosophical reasons. When the interests of the major components of the Amorphous Christian gel coincided there was a synergism or perhaps a symbiotic cooperation – or catastrophe. This was being confirmed by Britain’s bid to bring Soviet Russia into its war with Germany and by the volte face which Churchill was very happy to make in supporting Soviet Russia once it was drawn into the war. And it is illustrated very clearly by conversations at Chequers during the evening of June 21 while Churchill and his guests waited for news of the German invasion. Churchill quotes from a note by his private secretary, Mr. Colville, thus:

During dinner Mr. Churchill said that a German attack on Russia was now certain, and he thought that Hitler was counting on enlisting Capitalist and Right Wing sympathies in this country and the USA. Hitler was however wrong and we should go all out to help Russia. Winant said the same would be true of the USA.

After dinner, when I was walking on the croquet lawn with Mr. Churchill, he reverted to this theme, and I asked him whether for him, the arch anti-Communist, this was [not] bowing down in the House of Rimmon. Mr. Churchill replied, "Not at all. I have only one purpose, the destruction of Hitler, and my life is much simplified thereby. If Hitler invaded Hell I would make at least a favourable reference to the Devil in the House of Commons." ³¹¹

But there was yet another factor which Hitler recognized and took full advantage of in the planning and early operational stage of the invasion. That factor was the near-complete elimination of a generation of leaders of the country's armed forces in the second phase of the massive and brutal purges which Stalin ordered during the 1930's, the total subordination of the army command to him which those purges ensured, and his grab for absolute dictatorial power. After he replaced Molotov as Chairman of the Council of People's Commissars and head of government on May 6, only six weeks before the invasion, he held absolute power in the same way as Hitler from the moment the Reichstag voted to give him personal executive power without reference to a cabinet seven years earlier. But the army leadership had been destroyed during the two years leading up to that assumption of the dictatorship and, in fact, Hitler had played a major part in triggering it sometime towards mid 1936 as part of his plan to destabilize the Soviet union. [See chapter 20.]

Over two years, 1937–1938, of armed forces purges 36,761 army officers and 3,000 navy officers of company commander rank or above were either shot, sent to the labour camps (the vast majority) or simply dismissed. That is an average of 55 officers each day for two years. By the time of Operation Barbarossa the total, all services, had reached 43,000 and included 436 out of 494 (88 per cent) top ranking commanders, administrators and policy makers. ³¹² [See endnote for details.] The officers and planners purged had all been recruited and trained since the Revolution to establish a modern army and a professional command structure capable of meeting the demands of mechanized warfare. With all of their capacity and experience lost to the nation at the time that it faced possible war with either Germany or Japan, or both, the command of all three services had to be rebuilt around the lower ranks of younger, less experienced officers.

Hitler had exploited the knowledge of this command weakness, the total subordination to Stalin and the widespread fear of his regime as he harangued his own commanders to overcome their doubts about the wisdom of attacking Soviet Russia when they were already at war with Britain. He had insisted on 84 percent of the army – 3.2 million persons out of a total of 3.8 million – being concentrated on the eastern front to achieve a spectacular and quick knockout blow before regrouping them back towards Britain and south east to India. However he badly underestimated the determination of the Russian people, their fear of his Nazism and Russia's ability to recruit and train a corps of commanders "as talented ... as any shot in 1917–19" in such a short time and he over estimated the importance of the factor. He allowed his own obsession to over-ride reason, yet again; he became sidetracked, insisted on diversions to suit his political agenda, and in doing so gave Russia time to regroup while his diversions delayed the German advance and caused the exhaustion of his own forces.³¹³

The purge of the Soviet armed forces was actually only the tip of the iceberg. The scale of the purges which had been carried out in Russia was not fully recognized or understood by the rest of the world. The suppression of information coming out of the Soviet Union was one reason, but another was the fact that most of the criticism of Russia's internal affairs came either from the Vatican or the right wing of British and American politics. In the atmosphere of the late Depression period this made it somewhat suspect. The scale of the purges, overall, was quite mind-boggling. Estimates for the number of deaths of Russians at the hands of either their own government or the Communist Party under Stalin from the beginning of 1930 to the beginning of 1939 range from 16 million to 20 million. There is little doubt that they were humanity's greatest systematically organized slaughters. Reputable estimates put the number of deaths before 1937 at 11 million and for the years 1937–1938 an additional seven or eight million. There were seven million persons in jails and labour camps at the start of 1937; an additional seven million arrests in 1937–1938; and about six million were still in jails or camps at the beginning of 1939.³¹⁴ If we accept those figures – and they correspond reasonably with published figures for population changes over that period – then the number of 'state murders' averaged 5,800 per day for nine years. Considering that in 1939 prior to the Polish and Baltic annexations the population of the Soviet Union was 171 million, of whom 111 million lived in the European region,³¹⁵ the figures are truly nauseating. In total they compare directly with the number of casualties in the Soviet Union during the next four years of devastating warfare: 11 million service personnel killed or missing and 6.7 million civilian deaths and casualties.³¹⁶ The difference was that the war casualties occurred at more than twice the rate for less than half the period: an average of 12,200 per day.

These figures make the Holy Roman Empire's Scandinavian massacres, the Crusades, and even the slaughter of the Incas and other pre-Columbian civilizations look like curtain raisers. They were carried out by a ruthless dictator under a system which most people rejected. But that dictator was just as much a product of his time and circumstances as was Hitler. He had been – at least until his near breakdown – absolutely convinced that he was the only person who could run the system: he saw shadows of people trying to bring down the system all around him; he blamed outside influences and the sabotage of some of his colleagues for that; and like many before him – including the papacy during the era of the Holy Roman Empire – he believed that the end (retaining power) justified any means.

THE TIES THAT BIND

So: Churchill tried to bind Britain's new ally, Soviet Russia, into an alliance which, if Britain had entered into it when Russia had proposed it a couple of years earlier, may have discouraged Hitler from precipitating it, or may have made it easier to contain. He continued to try to draw the United States into the war as a participating ally in addition to being the financier and supplier which made it possible to pursue the war, and now he had to consider Japan's situation in the light of dramatically changed circumstances. It is apparent that as it went through its machinations over Far East policy the British government did not give adequate consideration to the consequences for Japan of a German invasion of Russia, and the options which it, in turn, would have to consider.

Japan desperately wanted to end European colonial and economic domination of Asia and it wanted an empire based on control of regions of East Asia then under Chinese rule. It had already gone to war to claim sovereignty over regions of mainland East Asia but it had shown by its actions that it preferred to end European domination and establish its New Order for Asia by negotiation and through the development of a new regional trading block under its leadership rather than by going to war. But it had also shown that it was prepared to go to war if negotiation failed and if the Western powers sought to restrain its ambitions by an extension of their well established economic methods.

Two of the European powers no longer needed to be taken too seriously: France and Holland. They were now both under German rule and Germany was sympathetic to Japan's aspirations and in a firm alliance with it. One, Portugal, had only minor colonial interests in Asia. That left two: Britain and the New World offspring of mixed European parentage, the United States, working in an ill-defined and somewhat uncomfortable alliance in which Britain wanted to retain its colonial privileges while the United States wanted to expand its privileges and influence at the expense of the 'old' European powers and restrain Japan's aspirations.

As Britain's fortunes changed it had, at first, sought to restrict Japan's ambitions and to prise it out of its alliance with Germany, then it sought to involve Japan in an alliance against its enormous neighbour, the Soviet Union, and now, with Japan in alliances with both Germany and the Soviet Union which were at war with each other the rules of the game had changed. Japan could not mediate between Germany and Soviet Russia, and it had no wish to go to war with Soviet Russia, at that stage, even though Germany was giving it every encouragement to claim its 'breathing space' in Siberia in the same manner that Hitler was claiming his Lebensraum in the Ukraine. Japan could no longer trade with Germany because the frontier between them, through which any of its goods had to pass, was closed by the war between them and it no longer had secure sea access because of the British blockade of Germany. It could trade with Russia, but to do so would prejudice its relations with Germany, therefore it could not. Logic now dictated that with Britain under great strain in its war with Germany and with both Britain and the United States having great difficulty supplying China, Japan should turn south and relieve the European powers of their Asian colonies as it strove to set up its New Order in Asia. But Germany was eager to encourage it to strike in two directions at once. This would ensure that both Britain and the United States were engaged on two fronts, in the Asia-Pacific region as well as in Europe, and that Russia was also engaged on two fronts. The war would thus become a struggle between two titanic alliances but Hitler was confident that in that scenario Russia would be nullified first so that he could turn his full attention west and that the German-Japanese Alliance, aided by Italy in the Mediterranean, would be victorious.

Churchill was, by now, equally conscious of that scenario and it was therefore vital that Japan not open a second front against Russia. This would ensure that Germany was kept occupied to the maximum extent against Russia while Britain, with help from the United States, built its strength against Germany in Europe. Thus we have the short answer to the question: why did Churchill not intervene personally to tell Stalin to prepare his armies to repel the invasion on June 21 instead of waiting quietly for confirmation of the invasion before he broadcast to the nation? It was in Britain's interests, as Churchill perceived them, for there to be the biggest possible battle between Germany and Russia. And Roosevelt's motive in similarly not intervening would have been simply to let the two great threats to Western Capitalism – or the amorphous Christian gel – tear themselves apart.

At this point Britain's options with Japan were to starve it of resources so that it could not fight a war on either front, or, by applying the 'starvation strategy', to draw it south into an engagement with Britain and the US which was controllable or winnable for them, so that it did not engage Russia as well. This amounted to an admission that the opportunity to make peace with Japan by concessions in South East Asia and in China, which might then provide a basis for a settlement between Japan and China, had passed. Such a settlement would free Japan of a war commitment in China and provide great encouragement for Japan to join Germany against Russia with a view to claiming substantial areas of Soviet Eastern Asia. That could lead either to a Soviet armistice which would enable Hitler to pursue his ambitions elsewhere, or to the freeing up of a portion of Germany's armies for the same purpose. It was therefore in Britain's interests, as Churchill saw them, to provide support for Soviet Russia at such a level that it would not seek an armistice while Britain built its capacity and sought to restrain Japan by the 'starvation strategy.' But that strategy was also fraught with dangers. To accept starvation of resources would mean that Japan must forgo all of its ambitions for a New Order in Asia, admit military and political inferiority to the Western powers, and accept a position of subordination similar to that of the other Asian countries and from which it had only gained relief after a dynamic effort over nearly three generations.

The great power game had degenerated into a can of worms ... all because the powers of the amorphous Christian gel had failed to see that the root cause was the trouble in the triangle. They were therefore unable or unprepared to tackle 'the Jewish question' by reassessment and renewal, and they were not willing to forego their colonial privileges in the interests of world stability. To ride slip shod over the question they were still resorting to the only means they understood. Politics and warfare.

However in dire circumstances leaders turn to desperate measures – even religion – and the Soviet Union was in dire circumstances. It was clear that freer expression of religious feeling would unite believers and non-believers behind their government. Stalin therefore decided to take much the same path as Constantine with his vision of a cross before the battle of Milvian or numerous other national leaders through the ages. He relaxed the state policy on churches. During the following months there was a strong revival of religious practice, recruitment for the priesthood and monasteries, and, in spite of the demands of defence construction and the armaments industries, an upsurge in church building. By September all anti-religious propaganda had ceased and in 1942 the government produced a lavishly illustrated book with the forward looking title The Truth about Religion in Russia. This was followed by a major development in September 1943 when Stalin met a delegation from the church and agreed to restore the Patriarchate of Russia. The church would remain nationalistic and isolated from the mainstream of world religious life for a long time. But so would a lot of other churches.³¹⁷

Churchill's volte face on Communism is in the same class and the way he went about announcing it provides a study in pragmatism. We have already noted that his direction for the roundup of 'aliens' in May 1940 included the instruction that: "Action should also be taken against Communists and Fascists, and very considerable numbers should be put in protective or preventive internment, including the leaders." In his memoirs, he wrote at length about the accumulation of intelligence during April, May and June which indicated a pending German attack on Russia. Britain was very advanced in code breaking and radio interception; it had a sophisticated intelligence network, and the Polish underground was remarkably effective in reporting troop movements and related matters. Churchill was scathingly critical of Stalin's failure to act on the available evidence and made much of his effort to warn Stalin of the likelihood of an invasion in a personal message which was to be delivered by the British ambassador on April 3 but which, due to diplomatic confusion or deliberate decision, was not delivered until about April 22. It can be assumed that Cripps, knowing the depth of antagonism which Stalin felt towards Churchill because of his influence in the counter-revolution in Russia, decided to handle the message in his own way. We know that Maisky took Cadogan's briefing on troop build up seriously even though Stalin did not, and Churchill makes no direct reference to any prior knowledge of the date of the invasion, but this could be either because he did not know or that he was intent on protecting his sources.

It is therefore especially significant that he was 'on edge' about the impending invasion for some days before it occurred; that he planned to broadcast on the subject on the evening of June 21; that only on that afternoon he decided to defer the broadcast until the evening of the 2nd; and that he had gained Roosevelt's support – in advance – for a statement declaring Russia to be an ally to which every possible aid should be provided in the common struggle for the survival of the West. It is patently clear that Churchill was nervously waiting for Hitler's declaration of war against Russia on the night of June 21/22 and for the tanks to be rolling before dawn. Manhattan's claim that Canaris' agent had informed British Intelligence cannot, therefore, be discounted lightly.³¹⁸

That speech proved to be one of Churchill's most stirring. He announced a policy of immediate aid for Russia, saying that in spite of historic animosity between Britain and the Communist power and the strain which Britain was under:

We have but one aim and one single, irrevocable purpose. We are resolved to destroy Hitler and every vestige of the Nazi regime. From this nothing will turn us – nothing. We will not parley, we will never negotiate with Hitler or any of his gang. We shall fight him by land, we shall fight him by sea, we shall fight him in the air, until, with God's help, we have rid the earth of his shadow and liberated its people from his yoke. Any man or state who fights on against Nazidom will have our aid. Any man or state who marches with Hitler is our foe ... That is our policy and that is our declaration. It follows therefore that we shall give what ever help we can to Russia and the Russian people. We shall appeal to all our friends and allies in every part of the world to take the same course and pursue it, as we shall faithfully and steadfastly to the end ...

When I spoke ... of Hitler's blood-lust and the hateful appetites which have impelled or lured him on his Russian adventure I said there was one deeper motive behind his outrage. He wishes to destroy the Russian power because he hopes that if he succeeds in this he will be able to bring back the main strength of his Army and Air Force from the East and hurl it upon this Island, which he knows he must conquer or suffer the penalty of his crimes. His invasion of Russia is no more than a prelude to an attempted invasion of the British Isles ... then the scene will be clear for the final act, without which all his conquests would be in vain – namely, the subjugation of the Western Hemisphere to his will and to his system.

The Russian danger is therefore our danger, and the danger of the United States, just as the cause of any Russian fighting for his hearth and home is the cause of free men and free peoples in every quarter of the globe... ³¹⁹

Churchill made no mention of Jews. No mention of the Vatican. Neither did he indicate whether to try to organize an anti-Communist alliance involving Germany was the same as 'to march with Hitler' and therefore to be 'our foe.' But he made the task of the America Firsters to keep the US out of the war very much harder, and he made it very hard indeed for the Vatican to justify and to continue a pro-Hitler-anti-Bolshevik policy. Churchill had what he desperately wanted: a second front to take the pressure off Britain. And it had happened in a manner which had helped to isolate Japan and to draw the United States closer to direct involvement – and the Vatican had been out-maneuvred.

Roosevelt now had the same basic issues to consider and some urgent decisions to make but in spite of the decisive manner in which circumstances had changed he could not afford to run foul of the politically potent Catholic hierarchy. He immediately consulted the general secretary of the National Catholic Welfare Conference, Msgr. Michael J. Ready, but the best that he could achieve, from the administration's point of view, was that at a meeting of archbishops and bishops on June 24 it was agreed to delay the convening of a conference on United States policy towards Russia. Ready was certain that such a conference would record its opposition to the US Government giving aid in any form to the Soviet Union. His advice was that before the debate became more confused "it would be most effective if the President could find an occasion to demand of Russia, as a condition of United States aid, a declaration of adherence to the Four Freedoms.” The world was expected to interpret that as freedom to worship – or at least freedom of Christian worship. In reality it was ‘diplomatic-speak’ for “if the West was going to team up with Russia against Hitler and prevent a takeover of the Russian Orthodox Church by conquest, after the style of Pilsudski’s Poland, then the least the Vatican can expect is pressure for Russia to allow the establishment of a Catholic Church structure to enable it to compete.” As we shall soon see, Roosevelt responded.

Quite coincidentally, a Gallup Poll was conducted in the United States immediately after Barbarossa and 73 per cent of those polled preferred to see a Russian victory while only four per cent preferred a German victory. Other factors being equal, that poll should have strengthened Roosevelt’s hand sufficiently for him to declare in favour of a formal alliance with Britain. But other factors were not equal. There was the weighted Vatican factor to consider.

THE VATICAN FACTOR – AGAIN

The Pope’s attitude in 1941 has been debated, defended and decried by numerous writers, each of whom have no difficulty in finding evidence to justify their particular stands and to contradict others, all of which illustrates yet again the nature of the parody. As already noted, only weeks before Barbarossa the church presses had been ordered closed, all minor religious sects had been disbanded and their clergy or leaders consigned to concentration camps, and the expropriation of church properties and monasteries had been stepped up. Then, while the Pope talked about ‘high minded defence of Christianity’ and continued to defend the concordat, the man ‘holding the spiritual reins’ personally directed that a temporary halt should be called to the expropriations of church property. In the midst of the stresses and strains of the Russian campaign Hitler was concerned to avoid the mood of the people being unsettled by such extraneous problems.³²⁰ However it was not long before he confirmed his real “spiritual intentions”, saying:

*The evil that is gnawing at our vitals is our priests of both denominations. I cannot at present give them the answer that they have been asking for, but it will cost them nothing to wait. It is all written down in my big book. The time will come when I shall settle my accounts with them and I shall go straight to the point ... I shall not let myself be hampered by juridical scruples. Only necessity has legal force. In less than ten years from now things will have quite another look, I can promise them.*³²¹

The pope’s real and potentially disruptive influence was only one of many factors which was bothering Roosevelt as a result of Hitler’s invasion of Russia. The idea of an Anglo-Russian alliance had not been widely canvassed in the United States until the invasion. Quite the reverse. The US had been party to the discussions on an embargo, not an alliance, and the implications of an Anglo-Russian victory over Germany without formal US involvement – even if it was with massive US material aid – were of major concern. The US would have only a minor role in the peace process. It would certainly not enjoy the dominant role in determining post war economic policies and patterns while the status of world wide Communism would be greatly enhanced. That could not be allowed to happen and the United States therefore had to be formally involved in the coming stage of the operation to oppose Communism's philosophical challenge to the amorphous Christian gel.

Without even a declaration of a change of relations, Roosevelt approved the occupation of Iceland by US forces, ostensibly to relieve British forces for duty in the active war zone and the first Americans landed there on July 7. Then on July 12, five days after both that landing and Churchill's initial overture to Stalin, Britain and Russia signed a mutual assistance agreement with an undertaking that neither would make a separate peace with Hitler. Roosevelt then 'did a Churchill,' approved a declaration by the US State Department that to give aid to the Communist power would benefit American security, and despatched his emissary, Harry Hopkins, and a military mission to London to discuss the military and political situation with British authorities, Lend Lease requirements, and an invitation for Churchill to meet him for consultations. Their historic meeting was set for August 9 at sea off Newfoundland.

Churchill soon found that the Chief of the Imperial General Staff was not the only person to cast doubt on whether its available forces could defend the British Isles against invasion: the US military mission was of the same view. Although they said the president was inclined to support the battle in the Middle East "because the enemy must be fought wherever he is found" the action in the Middle East was, in their view, "indefensible" in the circumstances and Britain's capacity to withstand an invasion was dependent upon the outcome of the battle in the Atlantic. The American military assessment of priorities was: first, the defence of the United Kingdom and the Atlantic sea lanes; second, the defence of Singapore and the sea lanes to Australia and New Zealand; third, the defence of the ocean routes in general; fourth, the defence of the Middle East.³²² The chaos which had gripped the Soviet leadership following the invasion and the uncertainty about whether Russia may yet seek an armistice with Hitler undoubtedly influenced the American strategic thinking as well as Sir John Dill's.

The enormity of the issues which were involved in those major regions tended to make all other issues recede into the background, almost to the point of being a distraction, but a decision taken in the Croatia, the hot bed of religious conflict, on July 14 was of such long term consequence that it has shaken the West out of some of its complacency during the closing years of the twentieth century. In the wake of the savage massacres of Orthodox communities by the Catholic Croatian Ustashe in April, the Catholic clergy had enjoyed a field day of "conversions". The Serbs had been confronted by the question: "If life is unbearable as an Orthodox Christian, why not convert to Catholicism?" and they had almost queued up at the church doors as the Catholic clergy beckoned them in. The government decided that had to stop! It was contrary to the purpose of the terrorist policy which had been put in place at first and it threatened to dilute the benefits for Croatian Catholics. Catholic baptism for purposes of conversion was no longer acceptable. The Ministry of Justice instructed the nation's bishops that "the Croatian government does not intend to accept within the Catholic Church either priests or schoolmasters or, in a word, any of the intelligentsia – including rich Orthodox tradesmen and artisans – because specific ordinances in their regard will be promulgated later, and also so that they shall not impair the prestige of Catholicism.”³²³ The fate of the balance was clear: deportation or extermination. The Vatican remained silent. There were no complaints about disregard for canon law or an attempt to usurp the church’s authority. Its central concern was the appropriation of churches “vacated” by or requisitioned from the Orthodox communities by the Catholic Croats. The Curia discussed the issue and drew up rules of conduct. There was no question of its authority to requisition the property of another church. It was in complete accord with the brutal totalitarian state which had been placed in power, and with the forces which had set up that state. It was virtually at one with the state. How else could the state have said who would, and who would not, be accepted into the Catholic Church? If any state was going to freely acknowledge Catholic Canon law as sacrosanct surely this was it.

But already the propaganda of Germany restoring freedom of religion as it swept across the Ukraine had served its purpose and it was time for the Nazi authorities to implement Hitler’s real design for the church. The idea of the Vatican riding piggy-back into Russia with his armies had to be quashed. “Christianity is the hardest blow that ever hit humanity,” he said. “Bolshevism is the bastard son of Christianity: both are the monstrous issue of the Jews.”³²⁴ And even before the Ustashe-controlled government in Croatia had issued its decree to enable the Catholic Church to sweep everything before it across Yugoslavia, Heydrich had issued his memorandum calling for measures to be taken so that Catholicism would not be the real beneficiary of the war in Russia.

In London on July 15, coinciding with the US military mission’s visit, the special committee which had been appointed by the British government to examine the feasibility of the development of an atomic bomb submitted its report. It concluded that “the scheme for a uranium bomb is practicable and likely to lead to decisive results in the war,” and it recommended that work should continue on the highest priority and on the scale necessary to produce a weapon in the shortest possible time.³²⁵ Britain was about to join the nuclear arms race. It was simply 17 months behind the US. Its aims were very similar to those of the United States, but in both cases the motive which prompted consideration of the proposal became submerged by the political dynamics of the governments concerned. The motive in both cases was to develop a means of delivering a knockout blow to Hitler before he could fully implement his policy of expelling all Jews and eliminating their influence. The justification for the initiation of the US program was to be the delivery of a knockout blow against Hitler, but this served to conceal the more fundamental aim: to develop a means of assuming and maintaining a position of world economic and political dominance. In Britain’s case, its dire circumstances and the very real fear that Hitler may win the race determined its aim: the delivery of a knockout blow against Hitler before he could deliver his own. Even if the great powers were to be struck by a great bolt of inspiration and suddenly see the fundamental cause of the crisis – the self-understanding of the amorphous Christian gel and the resulting trouble in the triangle – it was too late to put up a ‘pause’ sign and say ‘let’s change direction.’ The plot of the parody of Mein Kampf and the Qur’anic Night Journey had just about reached the point of no return.

On the same day the Chiefs of Staff approved a memo prepared by the Joint Planning Committee (JPC) which showed that war with Japan must be avoided and that the best way to achieve this would be for Britain, the United States and Holland to issue a joint declaration of the consequences if Japan were to seize Indochina, rather than try to “prise them out afterwards through sanctions.” The memo was forwarded to Churchill who, in the words of Antony Best, “did not share his subordinates’ concerns and indeed did not even seem to understand the issues involved.” Next day, July 16, Churchill advised Eden that he was still convinced that Japan would not declare war and that even if it did, Britain would find the United States by its side.³²⁶

Over the next few days there were a series of critical exchanges between Washington and London. The United States had been consistently intercepting and breaking Japan’s coded messages and knew fully its intentions. On the 17th Welles told Halifax that the US intended to freeze Japanese assets in that country, and Roosevelt’s cabinet discussed its detailed response on the 18th but without advising Britain. On the 20th Eden spelled out to the British cabinet the alternatives which a complete embargo would force Japan to consider, as already noted: to back away from its alliance with Germany and to reverse its foreign policy or “to move to the point of war with Netherlands East Indies.” He indicated that “to lag behind the United States” in its dealings with Japan could seriously weaken the ties between Britain and the US. He did not need to say that that would be catastrophic for Britain, but he said that “as an insurance policy” Britain should ask Washington to give the Dutch a cast-iron guarantee and also provide one itself. Cabinet agreed with Eden’s conclusion that it had no alternative than to follow the American example, and it decided that if Japan occupied Indochina all Japanese assets within the empire would be frozen and all remaining trade would be brought under licence, but it rejected the idea of a guarantee simply because Britain did not have the military capacity.

Next day, July 21, cabinet learned of the full details of the US plan to bring all trade with Japan, including petroleum exports, to a close. It also learned that Japan had issued an ultimatum to the Vichy French authorities in Indochina. The French could agree to a mutual defence pact giving Japan the right to occupy bases in Indo-China, or it would do so anyway. On the 23rd Vichy capitulated to the demands and agreed to the landing of 40,000 Japanese troops. Next day, the 24th, the first of 125,000 Japanese troops landed.³²⁷

Roosevelt thereupon announced the US trade and asset freezing order against Japan on July 25, freezing all Japanese assets in the United States and the Philippines, closing the Panama Canal to its ships, and imposing a virtual economic blockade and an oil embargo against it. A new commander was also appointed to the US forces in the Philippines. General Douglas MacArthur. Britain had to follow suit, but within days Japan was master of all of Indo-China including the major cities of Hanoi and Saigon. The Japanese government, not having the benefit of a US-type intelligence system, had been shocked by the sudden imposition of the trade and asset freeze, especially as it had just engineered a cabinet reshuffle to appoint Admiral Toyoda Teijiro as Foreign Minister in place of Matsuoka. It sought another round of discussions but there was a stalemate. This led to further insecurity and indecision in London while Japan pressed Thailand to allow it access to bases as well.

Irrespective of Churchill's show of confidence, the British government had been feeling increasingly insecure, partly because Australia, having been greatly influenced by Britain's black propaganda exercises, was feeling very insecure and was pressing Whitehall to get better guarantees from the US for Singapore and Australia's sea routes. Thus, on the same day that the trade freeze was imposed, July 25, Britain and Russia – allies of two weeks standing – moved to jointly occupy the oil regions of Iran in anticipation of another German leapfrog in the Middle East.

At about that time, unknown to Britain and in spite of the Anglo-Russian agreement of July 12 under which the two countries had agreed not to seek or to enter into separate peace arrangements with Germany, Stalin, Beria and Molotov discussed the possibility of an approach to Hitler for an armistice. Hitler, who had told some of his subordinates that his aim was to get to the Ural Mountains, was to be 'bought off' with a large part of the Ukraine, Byelorussia and Moldavia plus control of the Baltic States in return for an armistice. Beria was asked to approach the Bulgarian ambassador in Moscow, Ivan Stamenov, whom the trio would ask to act as an intermediary to get the message to Hitler. However, with Stalin saying nothing throughout the conversation, Stamenov refused to act as an intermediary and told Beria and Molotov that even if they had to retreat to the Urals they would still win in the end.³²⁸ Perhaps he was buoyed by the fact that towards the end of July the German forces had to pause in their hot pursuit of the Russians to refit and regroup.

A COMPLETE SOLUTION TO THE JEWISH QUESTION

July closed with two momentous decisions: one involved the Polish government in exile, the British and the Russians; the other was made by Hitler.

Many bitter discussions had followed the initial talks in London between the Poles and Russia's ambassador, Maisky, on July 5, but on July 30 an agreement was finalized. Diplomatic relations were restored between the Soviet government and the Polish government in exile. It was agreed that the Soviet-German treaties of 1939 under which Poland was partitioned and Russia annexed Eastern Poland were no longer valid. And it was agreed that a Polish Army would be established "on Russian soil" and would be subordinate to the supreme command of the Soviet government. But there was no definition of territorial boundaries except to the extent that the agreement was underwritten by Britain which did not recognize any changes from the prewar boundaries.

When he announced to the House of Commons "the signature of the Soviet-Polish Agreement of today" Eden read a note addressed to the Polish government which referred to the Anglo-Polish mutual assistance agreement of August 25, 1939, and said the British government had entered into an undertaking towards the Soviet Union "which affects the relations between that country and Poland." The note also said, without any reference to Germany, that the British government "do not recognize any territorial changes which have been effected in Poland since August 1939." He then referred specifically to the first paragraph of the Soviet-Polish

Agreement concerning territorial changes under the Soviet-German treaties as “having lost their validity.” The implication was that while Britain expected the postwar reinstatement of Poland with its prewar boundaries, Russia was agreeing only that the treaty boundaries were not valid. Russia was not agreeing that the prewar boundaries were valid. Neither was Britain agreeing to guarantee those boundaries. Eden was at pains to make that clear. His concluding remark was: “The exchange of Notes which I have just read to the House does not involve any guarantee of frontiers by His Majesty’s Government.”³²⁹

Clearly there was tension ahead. If the Soviet Union survived the war in one piece then it still wanted a security corridor of some sort between it and the West, and that would surely have to be at Poland’s expense. However there was no certainty that it would survive in one piece. It was only a few days since Stalin, Molotov and Beria had sought to make contact with Hitler to propose an armistice which would have required it to surrender the heartland of Western Russia as well as the portion of Poland which it had annexed. In that situation there would have been no role for Soviet involvement in any postwar discussions of Polish boundaries. There would have been none to discuss anyway. Hitler was intent on seeing to that. On the other hand, if the Soviet Union was going to fight on, as it was committed to – at least on paper – under the Anglo-Soviet Agreement, then its best prospects for survival lay in full collaboration with both Britain and its detested backer, the United States. In that case there was nothing to be lost by agreeing in principle to the restoration of a Polish state, provided that the Soviet Union could have a say in determining its boundaries. In the meantime it would strengthen the Soviet Union’s position to transfer some tens of thousands of Polish dissenters and resisters from the Siberian labour camps to an new and very determined Polish army unit. That unit would certainly strengthen Soviet resistance against Germany. Its members would have everything to gain and nothing to lose – except their place in the labour camps – and there was the knowledge that British-American aid would equip that army anyway, so there would be no drag on the suffering Soviet economy. It was a win-win situation for both countries: Poland and the Soviet Union. On that point, as Churchill put it in his memoirs, “the Russians were prepared to agree in a guarded fashion.” He wrote:

In the clash of battle at this vital point in the war all must be subordinated to strengthening the common military effort. And in this struggle a resurgent Polish army based on the many thousands of Poles now held in Russia would play a noble part. On this point the Russians were prepared to agree in a guarded fashion.

*There the matter rested, and during the autumn the Poles were occupied in the grim task of collecting those of their nationals who had survived captivity in the prison camps of the Soviet Union.*³³⁰

On that basis the Poles and the Russians were happy to be working in tandem harness for the time being. However Hitler didn’t like what he heard of Eden’s speech in the House that day at all!

Only two weeks before, on July 16, Hitler had called Goering, Keitel, Rosenberg, Bormann and Lammers (head of Chancellery) to his headquarters in East Prussia to remind them of his aims in the newly conquered lands. Germany would dominate the Russian territory up to the Urals and no one except Germans would be permitted to carry weapons in that vast space. The procedure following occupation was; first, dominate it; second, administer it; third, exploit it. The entire Baltic was to be incorporated into Germany; the Crimea was to be evacuated by all foreigners and settled by Germans only, as Reich territory; the Kola Peninsula and its large nickel mines would be taken by Germany; Finland would be annexed, with caution, as a federated territory; Leningrad would be raised and the area then handed over to the Finns; German colonies on the Volga would be annexed outright; and the Baku oil fields would become a German concession. Hitler had done his homework very well indeed. It was as if every expression he used, every operation he proposed, was straight out of the Western colonial 'code of practice' and 'book of modern history.' His subordinates even argued over whether rioters would be 'pacified' by armoured cars or bombs.³³¹ He had already insisted that the army was to be assisted by the specialist Einsatzgruppen in the task of eliminating Commissars and rounding up the Jews for transport to the labour camps or for any appropriate treatment, and they were doing their work with vigour and enterprise.

But after Eden's speech on the Anglo-Polish-Soviet accords Hitler had had enough. They had tried his patience for too long. The Jews wouldn't go away. No one would take them off his hands. They were leading the push to bring the United States into the war against him. They, and the other Partisans, were putting up enormous resistance behind the battle lines, and now even the detested Jews whom Stalin had rounded up and sent to the salt mines were to be rescued, trained, armed and hurled into battle against him in a bid to recover the heartland of his Lebensraum!

Next day, July 31, apparently acting on a verbal order – no written order from Hitler has ever been located – Goering issued a special directive to Heydrich. It became known as 'the Fuhrer Order on the Final Solution.' The extended order, as quoted by Yahil, reads:

In completion of the task which was entrusted to you in the Edict dated January 24, 1939, of solving the Jewish question by means of emigration or evacuation in the most convenient way possible, given the present conditions, I herewith charge you with making all necessary preparations with regard to organizational, practical, and financial aspects for an overall solution of the Jewish question in the German sphere of influence in Europe. Insofar as competencies of other central organizations are affected, these are to be involved. I further charge you with submitting to me promptly an overall plan of the preliminary organizational, practical and financial measures for the execution of the intended final solution of the Jewish question.*³³²

That earlier 'edict' was midway between the failure of the Evian Conference and the invasion of Poland and the British declaration of war, and two and a half years before the date of this order. [Emphasis added.]*

The Fuhrer Order on the Final Solution embodied a concept which Hitler had nurtured from the beginning of the war. It was one which he had been moving towards probably since World War I, and certainly since the beer hall putsch and his spell in gaol when he had begun writing Mein Kampf. It was the elimination of all Jewish influence in Germany and the expulsion of all Jews from Germany. The concept had gradually been broadened, as the resistance against it grew, to encompass all of Europe and not just Germany. Heydrich was now ordered, through Goering, to make "all necessary preparations with regard to organizational, practical, and financial aspects for an overall solution of the Jewish question in the German sphere of influence in Europe."³³³ Hitler had progressively stepped up his pressure against Jews with his personal writings, speeches, appeals for the Western powers to arrange mass resettlement programs if Britain wouldn't let them go to Palestine; 'Crystal Night', deportations to concentration camps and the Madagascar Plan; confiscation of property, compulsory identification and denigration through the wearing of yellow stars of David, and other simple administrative measures like exclusion from higher education, business and professions, culminating in torture and group murders in cold blood. Most recently he had established the Einsatzgruppen or special duty groups for the mass slaughter of Commissars, a high proportion of whom were Jews caught up in the Bolshevik push for social change, as his armies moved through Poland and Russia.

But until now Hitler had allowed various escape routes to remain open and had continued to permit some exit visas to be granted in the forlorn hope that the Western powers may still permit mass refugee resettlement. He now shut such ideas from his mind. His invasion of Russia led to the closing of the border between Russia and his ally, Japan, which had been very happy to accept Jews for resettlement, even though it had a non-aggression pact with Russia as well as its treaty with Germany. Japan had been taken by surprise just as much as Russia, and it had advised that it would not join the war against Russia. No more refugees from the Baltic states, or elsewhere, would be able to make the journey. Those already in Kobe were certainly safe, and by September they had all been relocated in Shanghai.

So: there was a vital difference between this order and all previous orders. It opened with a virtual admission that the plan to cleanse Germany and the occupied territories of Jews by coercive measures, forced emigration and deportation had failed and required that any measures which may be necessary, without restriction, could be included in the new plan. Although it is not explicit, in view of the fact that Hitler had previously issued an amnesty "against any actions carried out in the occupied Polish territories from September 1 until now [October 4, 1939], [which were carried out] to express resentment of atrocities committed by the Poles, are not to be investigated as criminal acts"³³⁴ and that these acts had included mass murders, the order implies that Goering would approve a plan including mass murder for the purpose of genocide. It was a pathetic document; not only because of what it said, not only because of what it indicated about Hitler and his control of Germany, but because of what it indicated about the self-understanding of the Christian church and about the amorphous Christian gel within which it had been composed and in which the order was about to be carried out.

The Fuhrer knew that most of his German citizens of which ever Christian persuasion, as well as a large proportion of Christians beyond Germany, accepted as a natural matter of theology much of the persecution of the Jews at the level at which he had so far applied it. Why should they doubt it? It was basic to the church's teaching. Between his messianic ravings he was happy to confirm from time to time that he was still a Catholic in good standing, that he would always remain so, and that he was simply exercising the avenging hand of God.³³⁵ But he was also aware that his Christian brethren might rebel when he extended the program beyond coercion, emigration, evacuation and the occasional murders to mass slaughter, and that it would play into the hands of the propagandists and Jewish lobbyists of the Western Alliance. It was therefore necessary to maintain secrecy and to avoid controversy as much as possible.

Clearly the operation of the Einsatzgruppen were far too labor intensive for the scale of operations now envisaged. The groups went into a town with, or immediately behind, the occupying troops, identified the Commissars and others who had been listed for elimination, confiscated their valuables, marched them or bussed them to a conveniently obscure site some distance from their town, lined them up along the rim of an especially deep anti-tank trench, mowed them down with machine gun fire, pushed them over the edge and covered them in preparation for the next batch. Einsatzgruppen had been used in Austria and Czechoslovakia at the time of their pre-war occupation but on a relatively small scale.³³⁶ For the invasion of Russia a total of 3,000 men were selected for special training and divided into four groups which ranged from 800 to 1,200 men. One was attached to the army groups operating in each of the Baltic region; White Russia and east towards Moscow; the Crimea and the southern Ukraine; and the balance of the Ukraine.³³⁷ However at that stage they were basically a political force to eliminate the Commissars and other selected targets as Field Marshal Keitel's directive of March 13 1941 makes clear: "In the area of army operations, the Reichsfuhrer SS will be entrusted, on behalf of the Fuhrer, with special tasks for the preparation of the political administrations – tasks entailed by the final struggle that will have to be carried out between two opposing political systems. Within the framework of these tasks, the Reichsfuhrer SS will act independently and on his own responsibility."³³⁸

Such methods as the Einsatzgruppen were using were inefficient and likely to lead to controversy, and Hitler required an alternative procedure without their built-in disadvantages. Factory production line efficiency was to be introduced using the technology developed for the discredited euthanasia program. From euthanasia it was a very short step technically and in organization to the final solution. Hitler had already issued a decree setting up civilian administration for his portion of Poland, with SS chief Heinrich Himmler given the additional role of Reich Commissioner responsible for the elimination of 'harmful influences' and 'alien populations.' The rounding up, isolation and degradation of the Jews was in full swing very quickly. In Hitler's terminology 'emigration' was synonymous with expulsion and 'evacuation' was a cover for deportation to a place of death.³³⁹ When the final solution program was put into effect the following year there were a few churchmen who spoke up against it although members of the clergy and laity of the Catholic Church are given credit for doing more than most to harbour Jews and to assist them to escape. However there is more evidence of general acceptance of the program and of apathy towards it than there is of intervention against it with vigour. The final solution – the fate of the Jews – did not touch the same tender nerve as euthanasia. In fact the Evangelical Church Chancellery urged leaders of provincial churches to exclude baptized Jews from the life of the church as a consequence of the ‘breakthrough of racial awareness’ strengthened by the experience of the war.³⁴⁰ That action can only be described as collaboration in the final solution and supports the contention that: “The large majority of the very people who had been outraged when their sons and daughters, brothers and sisters had been put to death, failed to react in the same manner when their Jewish neighbours were deported and eventually killed in the very gas chambers designed for, and first tried out in, the euthanasia program.”³⁴¹

Himmler decided that Auschwitz was to be the first site for a large scale Jewish death camp. It was conveniently placed in Poland on the border between the annexed region of Upper Silesia and the Generalgouvernement, with space for measures which required isolation.³⁴² Six death chambers were eventually constructed. The first four used engine-produced carbon monoxide, but because this process was relatively slow the last two were designed to use the pesticide Zyklon B. However it took quite some time to plan and organize that program. Because of its importance we must trace its progress, but the existence of the order was not confirmed until the Nuremberg War Crimes Trials in 1945, so we shall pause at this point and pick up the threads of other events running in parallel.

By coincidence, on the same day that the Fuhrer Order on the Final Solution was issued, the third operation of the US Navy taken in accordance with Action D of the McCollum Memorandum and Roosevelt’s direction of February 10, triggered a strong protest from Japan that the United States was violating its territorial waters. As already noted (this chapter, p. 44) Roosevelt had personally taken charge of Action D by periodically sending a naval task force into Japanese waters on what he termed “pop-up cruises” as part of the overall plan to step up provocative pressure on Japan. This cruise was mounted right into the heart of Japan’s main naval operational area, and on the night of July 31, Japanese navy ships at anchor in Sukomo Bay at the mouth of the Bungo Channel, the main access to the Inland Sea between Japan’s mainland island of Honshu and Shikoku, picked up the sound of propellers approaching from the east. Duty destroyers investigated and sighted two darkened cruisers which disappeared towards the south behind a smoke screen when they were challenged. The naval ministry protested to Ambassador Grew that “Japanese naval officers believe the vessels were United States cruisers.”³⁴³ But America’s combined actions to that stage were still not enough to provoke Japan into a first-strike action.

August opened with a rush of blood for the British and the Russians when they considered the measures which might be necessary to ‘secure’ Persia’s oil fields and supply routes from the Persian Gulf to southern Russia, and to forestall the establishment of a German base because the Shah had friendly relations with Germany and had refused to expel all Axis legations. This compounded the insecurity which Whitehall felt as Australia continued to press it for an assurance of support from the United States; the JIC produced an assessment that Japan was likely to occupy the Kra Isthmus which stretches south to Malaya; the US did nothing – perhaps Roosevelt was reflecting on the Japanese protest at the Bungo Channel incursion which Britain was not aware of; and Churchill prepared to sail aboard H.M.S. Prince of Wales. He was to meet Roosevelt on August 3 aboard the US Augusta in Placentia Bay, Newfoundland, the territory with a history of Anglo-French competition, dispute and gross exploitation which had eventually fallen to British control. At that time it was being administered by a commission appointed by the British government. Over the next few days, in the absence of their strongman, the British cabinet decided not to do anything such as a pre-emptive occupation of the isthmus without a firm guarantee of support from the US. The ‘normal’ horrors of the war just continued and ordinary Germans found, like Hitler, that Russian resistance was far stronger than they had expected. Casualty rates on both sides of the war in Russia were enormous. Mind-boggling. In fact one of the critical points of the war had been reached in the first week of August 1941 when Churchill sailed with his retinue of ministers and senior service advisers for their meeting in the Atlantic with Roosevelt and their opposite numbers from the ‘neutral’ United States.

Hitler was determined that those who worked to help the Vatican enjoy the fruits of war in Germany’s new Lebensraum should also understand the ‘normal horrors of war’ and on August 6 he issued the first of a series of orders over two months forbidding all Catholic Church activity, in order to safeguard the interests of the indigenous people, and requiring commanders to report to high command any “signs of the activating of Vatican Russian work.”³⁴⁴ But in Japan the government, being unaware of the virtual total interception of its diplomatic exchanges and the game of collusive manipulation which Britain and the US were playing, still clutched to the belief that war was not inevitable. Following the immediate reaction of shock when the government learned on July 26 of the Anglo-American trade sanctions against it, the prime minister, Prince Konoye, was prompted to renew diplomatic talks with the US. On August 6 Ambassador Nomura handed the State Department a proposal for a general settlement of disputes. Japan would agree not to advance, militarily, any further into South East Asia and would evacuate Indochina when the ‘China incident’ was resolved, in return for the United States renewing trade relations and helping Japan find, within the South-West Pacific region, the raw materials which it required. Roosevelt then sailed for Newfoundland armed with that information but in spite of the fact that the US and Britain were supposed to be sharing all intelligence – at least from the Purple machines – and planning together, Britain was not immediately advised of it.

THE ATLANTIC CHARTER

On August 9, the day Churchill and Roosevelt met, Churchill’s colleagues and Australia’s prime minister, Robert Menzies, pressed him as a matter of urgency to get such an assurance of support in South East Asia from the president. They said that if Thailand was occupied the security of Singapore would be at risk.³⁴⁵ But Roosevelt had other priorities. The conference between the two heads of government provided an excellent means by which Britain and the United States could improve their policy co-ordination and move towards joint planning for the war which they both knew they were about to fight together. In fact, in view of the near-fantasy circumstances, it was vital if dispute and fragmentation was to be avoided.

Roosevelt therefore would consider nothing else until he had broad agreement on the basis of continuing wartime cooperation between the US and Britain – at America's price. It was an ultimatum. Churchill had no option. Britain could not fight on for very long at all without US support. The implication of Britain having to seek an armistice with Germany, either in association with its new ally, Russia, or on its own; the fate of Europe as the Soviet Union automatically withdrew and forfeited much of its heartland to a frighteningly powerful Hitler who would be fanatically riding the crest of the wave after knocking out both of his rivals; and the automatic dominance of Japan in its New Order for Asia, was that the United States would then be left in not-very-grand isolation. This was quite unthinkable for both powers, Britain and the United States, but Roosevelt held the whip handle and Churchill knew it. Perhaps if the Western Powers of the amorphous Christian gel had thought that the pattern of world relationships could or would change so dramatically in only three years they might have made a greater effort to resolve the Jewish resettlement question at Evian. Perhaps. But even if they had resolved, or deflected, the immediate problem it cannot be assumed that they would have understood the trouble in the triangle. That would have remained, latent, to be brought to a head at some later date. So: the situation in South East Asia was not specifically discussed at the Churchill-Roosevelt meeting until broad agreement to a draft Atlantic Charter had been reached, on August 11.

After the first day of discussions around the pattern of international relations and the nature of a joint commitment, Churchill prepared a draft statement and handed it to Roosevelt on the 10th, but the key issues were quite contentious. Debate continued and messages shuttled backward and forwards between The Prince of Wales and Whitehall while British cabinet ministers and civil servants on two sides of the Atlantic determined what they were prepared to say about the future of British colonial policy and trade.

Churchill's draft was of five clauses, including one to the effect that the two leaders:

"respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live. They are only concerned to defend the rights of freedom of speech and thought, without which such choice must be illusory."

"will strive to bring about a fair and equitable distribution of essential produce, not only within their territorial boundaries, but between the nations of the world." ³⁴⁶

These were not acceptable to Roosevelt who saw the sentences of the first clause as somewhat contradictory and the second as not properly reflecting the principle of free trade. He handed Churchill revised drafts on the 11th, which called free choice of government for all peoples, not only those whose rights had recently been forcibly removed, and for non-discrimination in trade. Churchill and his colleagues saw these as quite clearly undermining the basic fabric of the British Empire and its colonial system, so they worked frantically to prepare less threatening amendments. Roosevelt also proposed two additional clauses, one of which read:

they believe that all the nations of the world must be guided in spirit to the abandonment of the use of force. Because no future peace can be maintained if land, sea, or air armaments continue to be employed by nations which threaten, or may threaten, to use force outside of their frontiers, they believe that the disarmament of such nations is essential. They will further the adoption of all other practicable measures which will lighten for peace loving peoples the crushing burden of armaments.

After more strong debate, with some degree of agreement emerging but with the British negotiators still struggling to find more acceptable expressions, Roosevelt and Churchill eventually turned their attention to specific matters and some decisions were reached. Next morning, the 12th, Churchill handed Roosevelt a revised draft declaration. The contentious trade issue seemed to have been addressed satisfactorily and Roosevelt accepted a clause which acknowledged “existing obligations.” However the matter of self determination was certainly not resolved, with Churchill’s revised draft reading:

... they respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live; and they wish to see self-government restored to those from whom it has been forcibly removed.

According to his son, Elliott, Roosevelt told Churchill:

I can’t believe that we can fight a war against fascist slavery, and at the same time not work to free people all over the world from a backward colonial policy [and] peace cannot include any continued despotism. The structure of peace demands and will get equality of peoples. Equality of peoples involves the utmost freedom of competitive trade.³⁴⁷

He insisted that the clause be changed to read:

... they respect the right of all peoples to choose the form of government under which they will live; and they wish to see sovereign rights and self-government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them.³⁴⁸

It is therefore clear, both from available reports of that conference and subsequent decisions by the US Government, that when Roosevelt changed the wording of Churchill’s draft charter to refer to “sovereign rights and self government restored to those who have been forcibly deprived of them,” he was referring to people under colonial rule throughout the world and not only to those in countries occupied by Hitler.

Although Roosevelt maintained strong pressure on Britain through conference negotiations, private discussions and public statements he could not get a commitment from Churchill that the imperial trade preference system would be dismantled. On one occasion Churchill responded: “Mr. President, I believe you are trying to do away with the British Empire.” And when he addressed the Lord Mayor's luncheon at the Mansion House, London, more than a year later, on November 10, 1942, that matter was still uppermost in his thinking. He said: "We mean to hold our own. I have not become the King's First Minister in order to preside over the liquidation of the British Empire."³⁴⁹

In fact he had no other course. Because of the policies which Britain had pursued for a long time and the response to Hitler's actions which he, as Prime Minister, insisted upon, the dismantling of the empire was inevitable if Britain fought on without American aid. But the dismantling of the empire was the basic price for that aid.

However, Roosevelt had gone most of the way to a commitment to enter the war in Europe and the Atlantic and that necessarily involved maintaining the imperial status quo outside of Europe while the key issues flowing from the parody were resolved within Europe. But because the parody had not been understood, and because the key issues of religious self understanding, human rights and colonial exploitation were issues for the whole world and not localized within Europe, it was impossible to isolate the war in Europe from the issues smouldering in Asia and about to erupt into general war. The consequences of Christian Europe's self-understanding and colonial policies were finally coming home to roost in no uncertain manner.

The Atlantic Charter served notice to the world that the United States intended to be a dominant player in any peace plan, and that empires imposed and sustained by military and political means were no longer acceptable – including those of Britain, France and Holland. It stopped short of a declaration that the United States intended to be the policeman to the world and the new economic imperial power. That would come as the war dragged towards its close. But it served notice to Hitler that, as in World War I, the Western Alliance would insist that there be no end to the war except through the total defeat of Germany or, as it was stated in the charter, "after the final destruction of the Nazi tyranny." It was therefore certain that unless Hitler was overthrown in a coup which the Allies were intent on provoking, the war would have to drag on to its murderous conclusion.

But perhaps the most important immediate function of the Atlantic Charter was in serving Roosevelt's domestic purposes in manoeuvring the American public into support for the war. Roosevelt knew that the American people were not going to be persuaded to fight in another European war, much less hang around to keep the peace, unless they had good reason and a noble purpose, and there was no better purpose than those provided by the principles of Wilsonian idealism.

As the price for a joint statement and United States' support Roosevelt therefore insisted on a clause guaranteeing self determination for all peoples living under imposed rule, whether that rule was imposed by Hitler or by any other power – Britain included. Churchill and his fellow ministers fought that clause but to no avail. It was a case of agree, or fight on by yourself. Britain had become dependent on US support for its own survival, but the price of that support was not compatible with the survival of the British Empire in its form at that time.

The clause had certain important practical implications. Self-determination meant that political and territorial settlements between the Great Powers that did not have the support of the people they directly affected had to be avoided. And since people under occupation or fighting for their lives could hardly be expected to take time out to agree to border changes or choose their future form of government, the Allies had to be prevented from doing it for them. Thus, in securing British commitment to self-determination the United States also aimed to prevent any secret political and territorial agreements by Britain and the Soviet Union along the lines of those between the British and French in W.W.I. In American eyes such agreements had sowed the seeds for World War II. They had distracted the Allies from fighting the common enemy, had disillusioned the American public when they had become known, and their sudden revelation was regarded as one of the main reasons why President Wilson had had so much trouble writing a just peace.³⁵⁰ If Roosevelt was going to gain and maintain support for his war policies from the American public, secret agreements would have to go.

Roosevelt still wanted the dismantling of imperial trade preferences which he had sought during the Lend Lease negotiations, but that too could be cast in Wilsonian terms as ‘free trade.’ Indeed, free trade had no more forceful and persistent advocate than Roosevelt’s Secretary of State Cordell Hull, a committed disciple of Woodrow Wilson and Wilsonian liberal internationalism, leader of the One World’ movement in the Democratic left, and a consistent internal critic of the United States’ own trade policies during the depression. As Hull later attested in his memoirs, reflecting on the impact of the First World War on his intellectual development:

Toward 1916 I embraced the philosophy I carried through my 12 years as Secretary of State...From then on, to me, unhampered trade dovetailed with peace; tariffs, trade barriers, and unfair economic competition, with war. Though realizing that many other factors were involved, I reasoned that, if we could get a freer flow of trade – freer in the sense of fewer discriminations and obstructions – so that one country might not be deadly jealous of another and the living standards of all countries might rise, thereby eliminating the economic dissatisfactions that breed war, we might have a reasonable chance of lasting peace.’³⁵¹

In others words, the kind of economic nationalism represented by the Sterling Bloc was at the root of the world’s problems, and if the world was ever going to learn to live in peace then economic nationalism had to go. And, of course, the prime beneficiary would be the United States.

Roosevelt therefore demanded a clause in the Charter calling for complete free trade. However, British cabinet was able to hold that ground. Roosevelt agreed to a qualification: access to trade and raw materials for all states, great or small, on equal terms “with due respect for their existing obligations.” In return Britain was able to extract one concession from the United States: agreement that Roosevelt’s general call for disarmament be amended to read “pending the establishment of a wider and more permanent system of general security” through a body to succeed the League of Nations (which was not referred to by name) as the policeman of the world.

In sum, the Atlantic Charter was Roosevelt's ultimatum to Britain and his antidote to American isolationism: if the United States was no longer going to turn its back on the corrupt politicking of the world, the only alternative was to take the corruption out of world politics. No more exclusive power blocs and discriminatory trade agreements, no more 'spheres of influence', no more secret diplomacy – in short, no more power politics of any kind. A 'One World' ideal, with freedom and equality for all. It all sounded remarkably like Maimonides' vision of the Messianic Age. It wasn't, of course. For a start, the US certainly was not going to open up its interests in Latin America to the world. But in addition it was determined to carve out a new sphere of influence for itself in East Asia and the Pacific and it was well on the way to achieving that goal, provided it could restrict Japan's bid to do the same. And of course, when the time came none of that high sounding stuff about 'self-determination' would prevent the United States from cutting its own secret deals when they served its interests in the Pacific. But already Roosevelt had played up the Wilsonian rhetoric with the so-called 'Four Freedoms' – the freedom of speech and opinion, freedom of religion, freedom from fear, and freedom from want – and now the American public was getting another dose.³⁵²

Before the war was out, however, the use of the Atlantic Charter as a propaganda tool would come back to haunt US policy makers, and none more so than Roosevelt himself. As the war progressed, and as the strategic situation in Europe and the Far East unfolded, pressure for post-war political and territorial deals from the United States' eventual Allies increased dramatically. Roosevelt's success in mobilizing the US public behind the ideals of the Atlantic Charter – necessary if they were going to accept a post-war international role for the United States – became a public straight jacket in his peace dealings with the other great powers, and none more so than the Soviet Union. A latent conflict had been set up between public expectations and Roosevelt's private dealings with his Allies which would eventually have enormous implications for the world as the Allies attempted the difficult transition to peace. And the principles would be jettisoned altogether when it suited the United States to support particular territorial groupings in South East Asia.

But on August 11, with the Atlantic Charter in the final stages of resolution the British and American leaders could settle down to consider other matters. A surprising decision, and one which was to have enormous consequences for Portugal more than 30 years later, was their agreement at the request of the Portuguese Premier, Dr. Salazar, that either one or the other would provide protection for the Portuguese Government at either the Azores or the Cape Verde Islands if it was forced to flee a German invasion.

A major matter was the need to support Russia with massive military aid now that it was an ally of Britain in the war. Britain was already dependant on US financial assistance for its own war effort so it was quite impossible for it to finance or supply a major portion of the armaments required by the Soviet Union for a very much bigger war. The vast bulk of the funds and armaments had to come from the United States. Britain could, in theory, receive more aid and simply channel, or divert, a proportion of it to the Soviet Union. But an arms-length or third party relationship of that nature would have been quite unacceptable to the American people. Roosevelt therefore indicated that he would ask Congress to approve an additional five billion dollars in Lend Lease aid to go to Russia. This meant that there also had to be formal agreements involving all three parties, but there could not be a declaration of an alliance because the United States was not at war. The Atlantic Charter contained the statement that “after the final destruction of the Nazi tyranny (the leaders) hope to see established a peace which will afford to all nations the means of dwelling in safety within their own boundaries” and it was therefore the next nearest thing to a US declaration of war against Germany which Roosevelt could make. But the US was very deliberately still a non-belligerent aid provider and interested party – now in a position to pull most of the strings. And if Britain and the United States thought that such a united front might encourage the pope to make a statement supporting the fight against Hitler and acknowledging the Soviet Union as a legitimate partner in that fight they were to be disappointed.³⁵³

When the Far East reached the top of the agenda Churchill was able to advise Eden and Atlee that Roosevelt had agreed to a warning to Japan that any advance in the region of the south-west Pacific, including Thailand, would lead to conflict. That agreement was linked to a decision by the US services chiefs to change policy on the defence of the Philippines and to place a number of B-17 Flying Fortress bombers at the Clark Field which would provide capacity to bomb places as far as Formosa.³⁵⁴ However Roosevelt’s proposed warning to Japan did not form part of the Atlantic Charter which was agreed to in its final form on August 12 and broadcast to the world by Clement Atlee, as Privy Seal, on August 13.

QUICK REACTIONS

Hitler’s reaction to the words “the final destruction of the Nazi tyranny” was quite predictable. So was the reaction of the German people to the statement that “the disarmament of such nations is essential.” Defeat was to mean a repeat of the treatment of Versailles – or much worse – and that was unthinkable. Few words could have been chosen to ensure the more effective cohesion of the German people if the drafters had tried. They did not undermine Hitler’s position. They strengthened it. And they also emphasized the need for close collaboration between Germany and its treaty partners, notably Japan. But Japan’s situation and its reaction to the Charter was more complex. It wanted to maintain its treaty obligations to Germany, but it also wanted assured access to the resources of South East Asia which it required both for its own security and to honour its treaty obligations, and it wanted to avoid war if that was still possible.

Next day, August 14, acting on intelligence reports from around the world that Japanese merchant sailings were being cancelled, Stark advised the US Navy commanders in the Pacific and on the US west coast that: “Japanese rapidly completing withdrawal from world shipping routes. Scheduled sailings canceled and the majority of ships other than (those in) China and Japan sea areas are homeward bound.”³⁵⁵ The unspoken meaning was quite clear. Japan’s merchant vessels were to be converted for service as supply carriers and troop carriers to support its battle fleets in invasion operations. According to Stinnett, that was the last meaningful message based on communications intelligence that Stark sent to Kimmell. As commander of the Pacific Fleet based at Hawaii he was left to collate intelligence of foreign shipping movements from the resources at his disposal. Stinnett demonstrates that even some intelligence gathered in Hawaii was withheld from Kimmell although it was relayed to Washington and he establishes a strong case that this could only have been done on instructions from, or in collaboration with, Washington. The decoy was being prepared.³⁵⁶

Upon his arrival back in Washington, Roosevelt promptly acted on the first of his special undertakings: he put a request to Congress on August 15 for a five billion dollar extension of the Lend Lease program for Russia. But he did not adhere to the second: a warning to Japan that any further moves south would lead to conflict. He invited the new Japanese ambassador, Nomura Kichisaburo who had previously been Foreign Minister, to see him informally on August 17. Armed with the latest intelligence on Japanese shipping movements Roosevelt was able to play a double handed game. By coincidence, although it should have been no surprise following publication of the Atlantic Charter, Japan was eager to resume the talks with the United States which had been broken off in July, and on the same day the Japanese government had already decided to propose a meeting between Roosevelt and the Japanese Premier, Prince Konoye, with a view to a separate peace settlement. [Washington is 14 hours behind Tokyo time.] Therefore, at their meeting, Nomura proposed to Roosevelt that he and the Japanese prime minister, Konoye, should meet at a summit, like that which Roosevelt and Churchill had just completed, “at which the two men would solve the differences that existed between their respective countries.”³⁵⁷ It is not clear whether Roosevelt had already decided to ‘water down’ the warning which he had agreed to with Churchill or whether he responded immediately to the Japanese initiative. Neither is it impossible, given the speed with which US intelligence was then able to decode some categories of messages, that Roosevelt may have already had an indication of Nomura’s instructions. But, whatever the basis of his decision, he advised Nomura only that if Japan made any further advances the US would take whatever steps were necessary to protect its interests. He did not say that it would lead to conflict.³⁵⁸ According to Churchill, the agreed passage read:

*Any further encroachment by Japan in the South-West Pacific would produce a situation in which the United States Government would be compelled to take counter measures, even though these might lead to war between the United States and Japan.*³⁵⁹

That change could be interpreted in various ways, but one definite implication was that the US would defend its position as the colonial power in the Philippines, but that it would not oppose Japan’s interests elsewhere. If that was not Roosevelt’s intention then it was a shockingly sloppy choice of words for a diplomatic communication of such international importance. It weakened the positions of each of the European colonial powers considerably by encouraging Japan to believe that its New Order in Asia was acceptable to its new chief competitor, the United States, and that it could, or should, pursue its demands on both Britain and Holland as well as the French who had already virtually capitulated.

The impression that this was Roosevelt's intention was strengthened when Halifax learned the same day that Nomura had proposed a US-Japan summit at which Roosevelt and Konoye would "solve the differences that existed between their respective countries." Then next day, August 18, it became clear from a Foreign Office review of trade patterns that the US had already weakened the terms of the trade embargo which it had imposed on July 25 and which Britain had immediately followed against its better judgement. Although Anglo-Japanese trade, including oil and Indian cotton exports, had come to a standstill, the Americans were:

*apparently prepared to allow quantities of these commodities [oil and cotton] to go to Japan on approximately the same scale as in recent months, except that some of the higher grades of petroleum products will be excluded. The whole question is whether Japan can obtain dollars to pay for them and in particular whether the United States will release dollars from Japanese assets frozen in the United States for this purpose. We await a definite answer on this.*³⁶⁰

Roosevelt had told Churchill at their summit meeting that he was only pursuing talks with Nomura "as a means of gaining time in order to improve American defences in the Pacific," but with the latest evidence Whitehall had to review the extent to which it could rely on the United States in the Far East and, in fact, what that indicated about the entire Anglo-American relationship. Negotiations and manoeuvring in the Far East can best be described as a can of worms, but it was little different in Europe and the Middle East. The oil supply question was still particularly sensitive and on August 25, having received an "unsatisfactory reply" to their demands, and with "Britain and Russia ... fighting for their lives," Anglo-Russian invaders began a three-day "brief and fruitful exercise of overwhelming force against a weak and ancient state" in which they partitioned Persia to their satisfaction – more or less – and felt reasonably secure in their control of petroleum resources and supply routes from the Persian Gulf to the Caspian.³⁶¹ Then on August 29 Churchill was shown intercepts which suggested that Japan was having second thoughts about its relationship with the Axis powers. When German officials had learned of the proposal for a Roosevelt-Konoye summit there was some embarrassment for Japan, which sought to show that it was consistent with Hitler's request that Japan's actions be planned to keep the Americans out of the war in Europe. Thus the Atlantic Charter had caused complex ripples in Europe and between the Tripartite Powers as well as in Japan, and Hitler's advisers could now sense the ground shifting slightly under their feet. They were looking for issues which would ease tension between Berlin and its allies, not aggravate them, and such an issue had just come to their notice.

When the Vatican had objected to the procedures used in the Reich's euthanasia program at the time it was introduced, October 1939, Catholic doctors were excused from the procedure, but some criticism continued because church members were rather upset when relatives were consigned to the gas chambers. The euthanasia gas chamber program had commenced on an experimental scale in January 1940. It was extended to the concentration camps in August that year and by mid August 1941 more than 70,000 mentally or physically infirm, aged, criminal or sexually deviant persons had been killed in five special “curative institutions” across Germany.³⁶² Then there was an adverse public reaction after a vigorous sermon against the euthanasia program by the Catholic Bishop of Munster, Clemens Count von Galen, in the same week that Churchill sailed to meet Roosevelt. The Nazis regime had been able to ignore a wave of protests from the Confessional wing of the Evangelical Church and had stepped up harassment against it. It had also ignored previous detailed written protests from the Evangelical Bishop Wurm of Wurttemberg, but Goebbels and Hitler were in agreement that the nationalistic and conservative Catholic prelate and the protests and court appeals by relatives which followed his sermon could not be ignored. The bishop had touched a very sensitive nerve in his congregations and fears that wounded soldiers and loved ones who fell temporarily sick or simply fell out of favour with the authorities may have been ordered into the gas chambers flashed through the region.³⁶³ The Nazi leaders feared that the Catholic masses could be alienated from the greater Nazi cause. This would be most unfortunate in the wake of the Atlantic Charter and just at the time that the Vatican was entering a new phase of its relationship with the United States. The Vatican may shift its position and support US intervention against Germany – just when the techniques of the euthanasia program were to be adapted to the mass murder of Jews under the top secret ‘Fuhrer Order on the Final Solution.’

Hitler was not anticipating any objections from the Vatican about the fate of the Jews. Nothing which had happened to that point suggested that he had any reason to. Especially the church’s policy in Croatia since, with Hitler’s support, the Ustashe were in firm control. Far from being upset at the limits which the Croatian government had placed on conversions of convenience for security, for safety or to avoid terror and possible death, the Vatican was being very supportive. It insisted that potential converts to Catholicism should be turned away when they were “patently seeking baptism for the wrong reasons.” As we have seen from its actions over the centuries, that was a consideration which had never bothered the Vatican before. With the full fury of the Ustashe unleashed against Jews in Croatia, the president of the Union for the Israelite Community of Alatri (in central Italy) wrote to Maglione on August 14, pleading on behalf of the thousands of Croat Jews. He described how residents of Zagreb and other centres of Croatia had been arrested without reason, deprived of their possessions and deported, and how six thousand had been dumped on a barren, mountainous island without shelter, food or water. All attempts to help them had been forbidden by the Croat authorities. He pleaded for the Holy See to intervene with the Italian and Croatian governments. There is no record of a response.³⁶⁴ So the Vatican’s attitude was well established, but there was a real possibility that if the same techniques were to be used for both the ‘medically-justified’ euthanasia programs and the final solution programs there could be flow-on criticism of the final solution programs which would raise world awareness and make it difficult to carry them out. In addition Hitler needed to improve his damaged image within the Catholic community and he was now in a position to make a gesture which could help offset the new mood of Vatican-US cooperation by removing a point of friction. A decision to discontinue the euthanasia program would show the Nazi regime to be responsive to the wishes of the Catholic church at a critical time. In any case there would be no real disadvantage because the euthanasia program had served its purpose and largely run its course. How convenient. The whole euthanasia program was discontinued from August 28. It was a highly successful public relations exercise. No more. No less.

At this point the intrigue between the United States and Britain relating to the Far East was getting thicker. Ever since January 10 (see above, this chapter p. 44) Roosevelt had known that the Japanese Navy was studying US Navy movements to and from Pearl Harbour, but by the end of August he had absolute confirmation that it was being targeted by the Japanese Navy for an attack in the event that relations between the two countries collapsed irrevocably. A special watch had been placed on an intelligence officer named Morimura who arrived in Hawaii early in the year with the official post of chancellor at the Japanese Consulate General. Every message he transmitted was tracked and decoded. On August 21 he transmitted a coded message via the normal RCA commercial channels to the Japanese ambassador in Washington with the request that it be relayed to navy command in Tokyo. It contained the survey map coordinates for fifty three of the US Navy's docks, piers and anchorage areas with a letter code designating each one, and the berth of the flagship US Arizona was especially marked. Decoded, that message was soon in Washington – followed by a police report which was received by the FBI on August 27 that Morimura had been apprehended “roaring drunk” as the result of a drinking binge during the evening after he had transmitted the message.³⁶⁵ Much of Morimura's message traffic was transmitted through the British-owned McKay Radio and Telegraph and because of certain intelligence arrangements in place, Churchill was promptly provided with his key messages and McKay's Washington office also provided copies of spy reports to the White House. On the other hand, because Morimura sent his message of August 21 via RCA it was not picked up by British intelligence but US intelligence had double access to it. The US Army Signals Corps also picked it up when the ambassador in Washington relayed it by radio to Tokyo.³⁶⁶ However it appears that, whether by deliberate omission or thoughtlessness, Roosevelt did not share that particular intelligence with Churchill.

On September 1 US intelligence learned that the Japanese Navy had recalled all its units from Chinese waters to home waters when an open radio message sent by the commander-in-chief of Japan's naval forces in China to a subordinate fleet commander was intercepted. He acknowledged that the fleet was detached from his command and encouraged the officers to “work even harder toward increasing your fighting ability, in view of the critical times which we are facing.”³⁶⁷ From Stinnett's description of how this message was handled it is unclear whether it would also have been picked up by British intelligence or whether it was or was not relayed to them.

However Whitehall was not advised that on September 3 Roosevelt told Nomura that a precondition for a summit meeting with Konoye was that Japan must commit itself to his

Atlantic Charter ‘Four Principles.’ Nor did Whitehall learn that the Japanese Imperial Conference considered the matter on September 6, determined that talks with the US would continue, reaching the level of president and prime minister if possible,³⁶⁸ and that if talks with the US failed, Japan would have to prepare for war. Two documents were approved. One was a statement of essentials for carrying out the empire’s policies. The other provided for minimum demands and maximum concessions on Japan’s part if they became necessary. The firm decision was made that if Japan’s minimum demands were not met through diplomatic negotiations within the first 10 days of October it would immediately decide to commence hostilities against the United States, Britain and the Netherlands. Preparations for war were to be completed within the last 10 days of October.³⁶⁹

Notes attached to the minutes of that meeting indicate that the oil embargo was the critical factor in both Japan’s decision to go to war and the timing of the action. Officials believed that if a negotiated settlement was not reached the limits of the national stockpile were such that Japan’s capacity to wage war would fall progressively while the capacity of its enemies to do so would increase.³⁷⁰ The notes also set out the purposes of war with the US, Britain and the Netherlands as:

*to expel the influence of these three countries from East Asia, to establish a sphere for the self-defence and self-preservation of our Empire, and to build a New Order in Greater East Asia. In other words we aim to establish a close and inseparable relationship in military, political and economic affairs between our Empire and the countries of the Southern Region, to achieve our Empire’s self-defense and self-preservation, and to build up at the same time the New Order of coexistence and co-prosperity in Greater East Asia. Accordingly, we must resolutely expel the hostile powers of the United States, Great Britain and the Netherlands, which interfere with the above purpose.*³⁷¹

There is no indication that Japan had any interest in either Australia or New Zealand except to break their imperial and economic links with Britain and the United States in order that they would become a part of the Greater East Asian co-prosperity sphere. But it was noted that Australia had already sent some troops to Malaya, that both countries were expected to provide some forces to assist the enemy and that Australia’s bases were expected to be used by the enemy.^{372 373}

Japan had got itself into a very difficult position with its conflicting relations with Germany, Russia and the United States concurrent with its own ambitions to drive the European powers and America out of its Asian sphere of influence. Prime Minister Konoye invited US Ambassador Grew to meet him in secret at his house immediately after that meeting. Over dinner the prime minister told Grew that he could accept the “Four Principles” and he believed a meeting with Roosevelt “could turn the corner.”³⁷⁴

Clearly the United States was also in a bind. The similarity between Japan’s war aims, the Monroe Doctrine and the Atlantic Charter was quite remarkable and at the level of principles the United States was hard pressed to justify its opposition to Japan’s war aims. In The Struggle for Europe historian Chester Wilmot explained America's position under Roosevelt's leadership in these terms:

*Roosevelt was determined to prevent the destruction of England, but he was equally determined that American aid should not be used to bolster up the British Empire. With him the inborn American prejudice against Imperialism assumed the force of a principle, and he saw, in the fluidity of the world situation brought about by the war, the opportunity for extending throughout the colonial world the revolution that had started in 1776*³⁷⁵

However on September 8 Whitehall received reports from its Far East ambassadors, first from Kerr, that the Chinese Foreign Minister was worried that Britain and the United States would betray China, and second, from Craigie, that the moderates were regaining control and that Japan's link with the Axis was steadily growing weaker, but "the tenets of the (Atlantic) Charter seemed to contrast strongly with the policy that Britain and the United States were currently pursuing towards Japan."^{376 377 378} Then next day, September 9, Craigie relayed to Whitehall the contents of a telegram which Grew was sending to Washington to the effect that Konoye and his foreign minister were sincere in their wish for peace, that they were hindered by the rest of the cabinet, and that the US should try to encourage the peace process by explaining to the Japanese people the advantages which would accrue from a policy of friendship with the democracies. This was an implied suggestion that Roosevelt should offer Konoye the 'advantages' of further trade concessions.

NEW ORDERS OR OLD?

Churchill must have been aware of that message later that day [London time is nine hours behind Tokyo] when he reported to the House of Commons about the drafting of the Atlantic Charter. He said, in part, that the British delegation had in mind:

the restoration of the sovereignty ... of the states ... now under the Nazi yoke," and that this was "quite a separate problem from the progressive evolution of self-governing institutions in the regions and peoples that owe allegiance to the British Crown.

That is in sharp contrast to what Roosevelt had told Churchill during the conference, according to his son, Elliott, [p. 64, above]that:

*"I can't believe that we can fight a war against fascist slavery, and at the same time not work to free people all over the world from a backward colonial policy [and] peace cannot include any continued despotism. The structure of peace demands and will get equality of peoples. Equality of peoples involves the utmost freedom of competitive trade."*³⁷⁹

Roosevelt did not want wars to his east and west at the same time any more than did Russia, Germany, or Japan. He wanted to end the old European Imperial presence in Asia, probably just as much as Japan did, but he did not want to relinquish his grip on the Philippines any more than the old European powers wanted to relinquish their grip on their Asian colonies, concessions and territorial 'rights', and he had to keep faith with Britain with which he had an unratified mutual defence pact in the Pacific and which was under pressure from a multitude of forces.

A note preceding the war aims quoted above indicates that the Japanese understood American thinking very well.

Our Empire's plan to build a New Order in East Asia ... is a firm policy [and] ... the building of the New Order will go on for ever, much as the life of our State does.

However, it appears that the policy of the United States towards Japan is based on the idea of preserving the status quo; in order to dominate the world and defend democracy, it aims to prevent our Empire from rising and developing in East Asia. Under these circumstances, it must be pointed out that the policies of Japan and the United States are mutually incompatible; it is historically inevitable that the conflict between the two countries, which is sometimes intense and sometimes moderate, will ultimately lead to war.

It need not be repeated that unless the United States changes its policy toward Japan, our Empire is placed in a desperate situation, where it must resort to the ultimate step – namely war – to defend itself and to assure its preservation. Even if we should make concessions to the United States by giving up part of our national policy for the sake of a temporary peace, the United States, its military position strengthened, is sure to demand more and more concessions on our part; and ultimately our Empire will have to lie prostrate at the feet of the United States.³⁸⁰

The discussions continued and draft understandings were shuttled backwards and forwards between Washington and Tokyo, but without agreement being reached. The Japanese Government's deadline passed.

Although there was a strange quietness in the Asian arena there was a great deal of action in Europe and the Middle East. Bitter debate had erupted in the United States. Roosevelt had gone most of the way to a commitment to enter the war in Europe and he was endeavouring to move Congress and the public along with him, but the debate still raged and the United States faced the prospect of deep division if he moved too quickly and too far ahead of public opinion. His 'unofficial declaration of war' in the Atlantic Charter had antagonized the America Firsters, the German-American Bund, the isolationists of the Mid West and anti-Communists in general. They whipped themselves into a lather in the press, especially over the plan to disarm Germany yet again which they saw as destroying any reasonable chance of peace.³⁸¹ At a rally organized by the America First Committee the famed aviator Charles Lindbergh told an enthusiastic crowd that the Jews were the most dangerous force pushing the United States into war³⁸²

The Lindbergh line was a strange twist to the old cry about Jews being a fifth column working for the interests of a foreign power. Their anti-British feelings because of the White Paper on Palestine were being swamped by their fear and loathing of Nazi Germany which drove their efforts to take the United States into the war. The national home about which there were such mixed feelings didn't yet exist and certainly could not until the outcome of the war had been settled. What they really wanted to fight for was the principle of humanitarian compassion for an entire ethnic community which was at risk. Yes, it was certainly their own community, but that should not have affected the issue in the public mind. The principle had supposedly been enshrined in the American constitution, but it had taken a frightful battering almost from the day it was proclaimed, so much so that Hitler had been happy to incorporate the battering rams in “Mein Kampf.” And the people beating the anti-Semitic drum, themselves part of the enormous gel of Western Christianity, still couldn’t see that it was they themselves who were forcing Jews into the stance which they were adopting. They were no different to their counterparts in Europe.

On September 13 Churchill was handed a guarded message which had been sent from Tokyo to its ambassador in Berlin on September 10 but which could not be decrypted immediately. It implied that a US-Japan accord was a real possibility and noted that:

*The object of the Three-Power Alliance was the restoration of peace and this has been announced by the governments of the other countries. The Japanese-American talks had this for their object, and were therefore not essentially opposed to our Axis diplomacy.*³⁸³

There were two key issues for Whitehall. Would such an accord protect Britain’s interests or only those of the US? And, in Eden’s words, how could Britain make the Japanese feel that “we are in a position to play our hand from strength?”³⁸⁴ However at this time Whitehall learned that, under its diplomatic pressure, the US had actually implemented a virtually complete embargo on trade with Japan and, for Japan there was a much deeper philosophical issue. It believed the Atlantic Charter and Hull’s Four Principles which were closely related to it were “an exercise in hypocrisy” and that there was little likelihood that a permanent mutually acceptable understanding could be reached. This was reflected in a caustic observation to Craigie by a senior foreign office negotiator, Amo, on September 15. Amo reminded Craigie that he had lived in Japan for some years and had observed the conditions and daily lives of the people, then said:

*I wonder if you think these people are really adequately compensated for their capacity and effort. Though they work from morning to night, still they are only barely at the level of subsistence, whilst virtually every Englishman, working less than the Japanese, enjoys a life of relative ease. In a word, whilst the Japanese are in a life and death struggle, the English give their thought to how they may live more luxuriously.*³⁸⁵

This was not a reflection of greed for the wealth of another. It was an indication of the Japanese world view that all peoples are equal and that all peoples have the same needs, the same obligations and the same rights of access to resources. Amo was, without necessarily naming the contrast, contrasting that world view with that of Britain and the White Western Christian World that the rest of the world existed for the benefit of those who were part of the amorphous Christian gel. He was reinforcing the case for a New Order in Asia. He might as well have saved his breath.

Although Britain and the Soviet Union had gained control of Persia’s oil fields they were still feeling somewhat insecure about their relationships with that ‘weak and ancient state’ in the Middle East in which they had too many troops tied up in security operations. So: exercising their 'right' to call such countries to order, they forced the Shah to announce his abdication on September 16, occupied Teheran with little resistance on September 17, set up a puppet government under the 'gifted' new 22-year old Shah, Muhammad Riza Pahlevi, who was required to sign a tripartite pact with Britain and Russia, in which he agreed to the 'protective occupation' of his country until six months after the end of the war and the use of Persian facilities for wartime supply to Russia. He was also required to agree that all resistance would cease, and that Persia would adopt neutrality and do nothing during the occupation period which was inconsistent with the interests of the alliance – like supplying Germany with oil or allowing German agents to remain in the country. With that settled, Britain and Russia were able to redeploy most of their occupation forces elsewhere.³⁸⁶ Craigie was informed on September 18 that the time was not right for making concessions to the Japanese.³⁸⁷

At that time the arms supply discussions which Churchill and Stalin had personally been pursuing for some weeks were being taken over by an Anglo-American arms supply mission, set up as a result of Churchill-Roosevelt discussions on August 12 and jointly led by Lord Beaverbrook for Britain and Avril Harriman for the US. Because it was painfully clear that Britain's security depended on the Soviet Union continuing to keep the German forces occupied, Britain's service chiefs had already consented to very large diversions of American supplies which they needed themselves. Thus when he appointed Beaverbrook, Churchill told him that long term supplies to Russia "can only be achieved almost entirely from American resources."³⁸⁸ But the urgency of avoiding any unnecessary strain on Russia is even better illustrated by the pressure applied to Finland not to take advantage of Russia's difficulties to redress the territorial wrongs of its invasion in December 1939. The valiant peace loving country which Britain and France had been so eager to supply with planes, tanks and volunteers to through against the brutal, destructive Russians and on whose behalf the Vatican had pressed for a system of war damage reparations (chapter 23, pp. 15 ff.) was now threatened with invasion by Britain – as desperately short of arms as it was – if it so much as raised a finger to recover territory from Russia and distract it from its war against Germany.³⁸⁹

The arms supply mission was already working in London on a possible schedule of supplies from the US and Britain for the Soviet Union and was about to travel to Moscow for detailed talks on how these could be related to Roosevelt's agreement to extend the Lend Lease plan to the Soviet Union when the Vatican became very concerned at the turn which events had taken. It was especially concerned at Roosevelt's agreement to extend the Lend Lease plan to the Soviet Union, and on September 19 a host of bishops in Germany made up for their earlier silence – and that of the pope – with a flood of pastoral letters in support of Hitler's attack on Russia's anti-Christian Bolshevism.³⁹⁰ Hitler appreciated it greatly. But he did not appreciate their request that German Jews who had converted to Catholicism should be exempt from the "devastating, stigmatizing, and demoralizing" requirement to wear a yellow star which he had just decreed, and which brought them into line with Poland's Jews. The request was refused.³⁹¹ Neither did he appreciate Churchill's announcement in the Commons on September 30, two days after the mission arrived in Moscow to a very restrained welcome, that the previous week's production of tanks was to be sent to Russia. He would have been even more upset if he had known that because of its desperation to keep Russia in the war Beaverbrook had agreed on behalf of Britain that the whole of its forthcoming supplies from the US under Lend-Lease would be diverted to Russia. That included 1,800 fighter aircraft, 2,250 tanks, 500 anti-tank guns, 23,000 "tommy guns" (automatic rifles), 25,000 tons of copper, 27,000 tons of rubber and 250,000 greatcoats for soldiers.³⁹²

Hitler could have done with those greatcoats himself, because on the same day, against the advice of his generals that the onset of winter was imminent, he ordered the delayed assault on Moscow to be resumed and the advance began on October 2, the day that an Anglo-US-Soviet protocol was signed listing arms to be provided between October 1941 and June 1942. The massed German Panzers surged forward, overwhelming the Russian front which disintegrated, leaving a road open towards the capital. Russia certainly needed the British tanks. Churchill had not told the House that the decision was purely pragmatic, but there was no hint of altruism towards the survival of Britain's Communist brothers-cum-allies in Russia. The Russians knew as well as the British that it was more important to Britain's security to keep Russia in the war by showing some practical support for it, than to send those tanks to the North African campaign. They made their feelings abundantly clear to the mission and Beaverbrook advised Churchill that he did not regard the military situation as safe, but the promise of supplies had strengthened morale immensely and "might make it safe" although "the maintenance of this morale will depend on delivery."³⁹³

It was Hitler's turn for another speech on October 3. He told a huge crowd in the Berlin Sportpalast that an operation of such a scale had begun two days earlier that it would lead to the destruction of the enemy in the east, that the enemy was already being routed and that it would never regain its strength. And he added some colorful references to a war of extermination for good measure. Twice in the next few critical days, on October 4 and 6, Churchill advised Stalin direct of the details of three armaments convoys which were to arrive at Archangel between October 12 and 22: 360 heavy tanks, 293 fighter aircraft, 200 bren-gun carriers, 200 anti-tank rifles and 50 heavy guns.³⁹⁴ ³⁹⁵ The morale boosting effect of Churchill's announcement, together with his advice to Stalin of the convoys, may well have helped to tip the balance, but it was touch-and-go.

The situation was so desperate that on October 7, with no Russian troops between one leading German column and Moscow, Stalin again ordered Beria to approach the Bulgarian ambassador to act as an intermediary to seek terms from Hitler. He was reported as saying that he was ready to accept a "new Brest peace" as Lenin had in 1918. Apparently the result was the same as in July. ³⁹⁶ Orel was captured next day, and Hitler ordered the total destruction of the city. On October 9 Hitler's press chief announced to correspondents that "for all military purposes Russia is done with."³⁹⁷ He was somewhat premature, but it certainly looked to the world as if he was right, and there was real fear in Whitehall that in a very short time most of the German army would be able to withdraw from the Russian front and confront Britain.

A BIT OF 'CHITTER-CHAT'

That day US intelligence staff completed decoding and translating a message a “strictly secret” instruction from Tokyo to Morimura, dated September 24, and next day, October 10, they completed processing the spy’s reply which he had transmitted through McKay on September 29. Together they were dramatic. Tokyo had asked for a much more detailed plan with Pearl Harbour divided into five zones and with vessels identified in more detail. Morimura did more than was asked for. He prepared a precise grid plan and even indicated plots for bombing runs. This information was never relayed to Kimmel and when subsequent Congressional Committee’s of Inquiry pressed for the reasons why, the head of Army Intelligence, Brigadier General Sherman Miles, claimed that he had treated it with indifference because bomb plot mapping was a standard intelligence practice and he saw it as nothing more than “chitter chat.”³⁹⁸ It was a palpable cover-up for the withholding of information from Kimmel because it went to Roosevelt who immediately saw a weakness in the system of US intelligence control. His concern was not that the information had been withheld from Kimmel, but that the British had a comprehensive arrangement for access to all of McKay’s transmissions while the US did not have the same automatic feed trough arrangement with RCA. If it was good enough for British-owned McKay to ride slipshod over accepted confidentiality procedures and provide a channel direct to Churchill, why could not American-owned RCA extend the same courtesy to him? He invited the founder and president of RCA, David Sarnoff, to lunch on October 14. Sarnoff got the message, agreed to match the British arrangement, and left immediately for Hawaii where he spent nine days. He directed the local RCA manager to provide copies of all messages filed by the Japanese consulate to Navy intelligence, and he then advised Roosevelt that “... the heads and the staff of the Army and Navy here are well informed and keenly alive to the latest developments in communications and to their useful possibilities.”³⁹⁹ But that did not mean that Kimmel or Clark received subsequent transmissions. They did not. The station intelligence chief, Rochefort, a former Japanese language student and colleague of McCollum,⁴⁰⁰ received the copies but did not decode, translate or relay them to Kimmel or Clark, and other US operators “plucked the messages off the RCA airwaves and placed their contents into the White House intelligence loop.” Kimmel and Clark were still cut out.^{401 402}

In the meantime, on October 12, 1941, the Japanese Prime Minister called his Foreign, War and Navy Ministers for an urgent conference and sought agreement to continue diplomatic efforts to find a solution to the impasse with Britain and the United States. But neither he nor the Foreign Minister could give War Minister Tojo an assurance that a settlement could be reached before operational considerations became critical. They must have known from their intelligence sources that by that date the United States had placed 35 B-17 bombers in the Philippines in line with the undertaking given by its service chiefs at the Roosevelt-Churchill summit in August. The Navy Minister would not take a firm position except to maintain that matters of war and peace should be determined by the Prime Minister, not the service ministers. At a cabinet meeting next day Tojo continued to press for war on the basis that a settlement could not be assured in time to avoid Japan’s position being undermined. The Prime Minister resigned to enable a new cabinet to reconsider the whole matter free of any commitment to the decision taken on September 6th, but after efforts to find an alternative person were unsuccessful Tojo agreed to take office as Prime Minister.

By October 15 the threat to Moscow was so great that the diplomatic corps fled the city, the evacuation of the Soviet government to Kuibyshev, 600 miles to the east, was commenced, and panic set in. Stores were plundered, offices and factories were abandoned and the mining of bridges and railway junctions began. But Stalin stayed and imposed martial law. Hitler had left his run too late, too. When Whitehall learned next day of the change of Japanese government it was regarded as “an ominous sign” and Eden told Churchill that “the Russian defeats must inevitably be having their effect upon the Japanese appetite” and this made the need for capital ship reinforcements in the Far East more urgent.”⁴⁰³ It also made the need for Britain to persuade Russia to stay in the war even more urgent and none of the supplies which it shipped from Iceland could have reached Moscow by the that date. On October 19 Stalin proclaimed the siege of Moscow with the order “Moscow will be defended to the last,”⁴⁰⁴ and with the weather changing the ruthless advance of Germany’s armies was slowed greatly. While this gave the Russian forces some relief, the protracted defence of major cities was an enormous task and it was clear that Russia urgently needed foreign aid if Moscow were not to be over-run. Over the next few days the British cabinet debated the deployment of its navy and, contrary to the intent of a cabinet decision, Churchill told Roosevelt that a considerable battle squadron would be available for operations in the Indian and Pacific Oceans before Christmas. He was intent on encouraging American involvement in the South West Pacific as well as strengthening Britain’s immediate position. In fact more than that: Churchill was determined that Britain would not surrender its privileges in Asia by negotiation, he could not solve its relationship problems in Europe and the Middle East by that means either, and the whole world would therefore be dragged into war in which he hoped to achieve the impossible.

The world was now preoccupied with the war in Russia and Britain was trying to conceal the real situation in the Far East but important developments were also taking place in the Middle East. Following the collapse of the Iraqi uprising and his escape to Iran, the Mufti had spent some time in Turkey before being flown to Rome where he met Mussolini on October 27. A draft statement which they prepared was passed to Berlin, agreed to by Hitler and issued jointly by the two dictators a few days later. The two governments were committed to recognizing the sovereignty and independence of the Arab countries and to helping in “the elimination of the Jewish National Home in Palestine.” That was an issue in which Japan had no interest at all. In spite of Britain’s black propaganda program about a German fifth column in the Far East, Japan had no quarrels with its Jewish communities. It had its hands full enough in China and South East Asia. It did not want three or even four areas of conflict on its hands, like Britain. Immediately after the change of government a further 18,000 troops were landed at Haiphong, the Indochina terminal of the railway from Kunming which was also the Chinese terminal of the Burma Road, providing the opportunity for a swift strategic cut-off of China’s military supplies via Burma. With Tojo in office as prime minister for the Liaison Conference of October 23, extensive discussions began and continued daily as cabinet struggled to achieve a diplomatic settlement with Britain and the United States, to improve Japan's military preparedness and to resolve the critical question of national fuel supplies.

The British cabinet learned of that Haiphong landing on October 30, together with US intelligence which suggested an invasion of Yunnan Province would begin three days later. If that led to the severing of the remaining supply line to China, Britain's Far East strategy involving the interplay of the Soviet Union, China and Japan to keep the Soviet Union in the war would be in tatters. Desperate measures were required to keep the Soviet Union in the war. The phone lines between London and Washington ran hot! Roosevelt telegraphed Stalin to say that he had given presidential approval for one billion dollars in Lend-Lease Aid for Russia.⁴⁰⁵ The Lend-Lease Act had been framed in very broad terms which gave the president unusually wide authority to determine to which countries and on what conditions aid could be provided, subject to a Congressional appropriation for the funds involved. The justification given for this decision later, when Roosevelt sought Congressional backing for the appropriation, was that a German submarine had sunk a US destroyer, the Reuben James, on October 29 while it was unofficially escorting a British convoy. The veil was thin indeed. The United States was not at war, the use of US naval vessels for such escort services did not have Congressional approval, and Roosevelt therefore knew that publicity for that incident would only bring more anti-war wrath on his head – not an agreement to go to war with Germany.

Two days later, November 1, the British government received two urgent communications confirming the assessment that Churchill had made – and acted on – and the need for that Lend-Lease aid for Russia. One was a lengthy telegram from Craigie. From his talks with Foreign Minister Togo Shigenori, Craigie advised that time was running out; feelings were being worked up in Japan as well as in the US and Britain; Japan's resolve should not be underestimated; every effort should be made to convince Japan that it would not be reduced to the status of a third rate power if the democracies won the war in Europe; and that he was very concerned that the United States was, in effect, negotiating on behalf of both Britain and itself when their interests in East Asia were markedly different.⁴⁰⁶ The other was an appeal from Chiang Kai-shek who was in panic mode, for air support in anticipation of such an invasion. Britain's multi-phase crisis was compounded. China was receiving virtually no supplies from Russia as a result of Barbarossa; Britain was allocating its own scarce resources to Russia in a desperate bid to keep it in the war; China was therefore greatly dependant upon whatever Britain and the US could supply through Burma to compliment its own limited production; if it was not, or could not be supplied, China would either be defeated or would seek an armistice with Japan, and, in either case, Japan's forces in China would be released to move either north, to Russia or south to Indochina and Singapore. Clearly Britain could not supply China unilaterally and if it intervened directly by sending units of either its army or navy (rather than by supplying armaments) it would automatically be at war with Japan. It could therefore do neither without US support. An alternative was to ask the US to assist China direct without further British commitment.

While Churchill and his cabinet agonized over their response on November 2 they did not know that Tojo's cabinet had already resolved – the same day, but nine hours ahead – that war would commence on December 1 unless a diplomatic solution had been achieved by midnight on November 30. In fact the Japanese Imperial Conference, with the emperor present, had approved an invasion plan for South East Asia and a knock-out attack on Pearl Harbour, subject only to a final decision to proceed. The situation was becoming critical for Japan as well as Britain. It was uncertain how Britain would respond to appeals from China; military preparation was continuing at maximum pace, and anti-Japanese racism was being whipped up in both the United States and Germany. However US Ambassador Grew did know. A leak had reached him, and his lengthy report, closing with the comment: “War with the United States may come with dramatic suddenness,” reached Washington on November 3. Grew quoted an unnamed informant as saying that the decision for war was presented to the emperor jointly by the prime minister and the ministers for the navy and foreign affairs.⁴⁰⁷

A PLAN TO AVOID WAR

On November 5 the President of the Privy Council, Hara Yoshimichi, told the Imperial Conference that Hitler had described the Japanese as a second class race and he had not declared war on the United States. It was therefore still possible that the US and Britain might reach a settlement with Germany and be free to throw all their might against Japan. In that case, he said, all the hatred being directed at Germany would be poured out against the yellow Japanese.⁴⁰⁸ Any hope of a New Order in Asia would be lost completely. But cabinet was eager to avoid war, and with the Foreign Minister not able to report progress in talks with the United States, the Imperial Conference again reviewed its minimum requirements and approved modified terms for the continuing negotiations which were substantially more moderate.

It was agreed that Japan would withdraw within two years all troops which had been sent to China during ‘the China incident’, except those in designated sections of North China, Inner Mongolia and Hainan Island which would remain for up to 25 years. Respecting French Indochina's territorial sovereignty, Japan would withdraw all troops when the China incident had been settled. It would respect the principle of non-discrimination in trade throughout the Pacific region, including China, if this principle was applied throughout the world. And in the matter of European security, Japan would make its own independent decision if there was any response sought under the Tripartite Pact. Cabinet was not impressed by the so-called ‘Four Principles’ which the US had introduced into later discussions, and did not want them written into any official documents or understandings. It sought agreement that, with the exception of French Indochina, both the US and Japan would pledge not to make any armed advance in South East Asia and the South Pacific. It also sought cooperation on assurances that both countries would have access to resources from the Dutch East Indies, and it wanted trade relations restored to their pre-asset-freeze status with assured oil supplies from the US And finally it asked that the US take no action which would hinder efforts towards peace between Japan and China.⁴⁰⁹

Roosevelt would have learned of that proposal on November 5 about the same time that he received an appeal from Churchill for the US to assist the Chinese directly and that he give Japan a direct warning against any advance into China's Yunnan Province, towards Kunming and the Burma Road. He did not respond immediately. The US administration had its own hard thinking to do – and its own relationships with the Soviet Union, Germany and Japan. Next day both ambassadors sent messages to their governments. Craigie advised Whitehall that Japan's former ambassador to Germany, Kurusu Saburo, was being sent to Washington to assist Nomura in one last determined effort to reach a settlement. His instructions were to promise no further Japanese advances in return for a removal of the blockade and that in addition "America would have to stop sending assistance to Chiang Kai-shek and instead would have to advise him to make peace." Grew, reporting on a surreptitious "holiday" tour of the naval operations areas along Japan's Inland Sea by his naval attaché, sent a much stronger warning to Washington about the likelihood of war.

But events were moving at great speed and in Moscow that day, in a bold morale boosting show of defiance made possible by Roosevelt's allocation of one billion dollars in Lend-Lease aid, Stalin replied to Hitler's 'victory speech' with an address to army, Moscow city and Communist Party officials, saying that "if (the Nazis) want a war of extermination they shall have one." Then on November 7 he took the salute at the traditional military parade to mark the anniversary of the Revolution, in spite of the fact that air raids were likely with the Germans pounding at the city gates. The security of an investment in support for Russia was beginning to look better and half way around the world that afternoon, Roosevelt's action in allocating the aid which he had originally proposed to Congress on August 15 was formalized by an appropriation. It was no 'generous hand-out'. It did not involve Americans directly in the war. It was an 'insurance policy'. It was further stimulus for America's commercial arms producers. They were delighted

Two days later, on the November 9, Roosevelt responded to Churchill's requests of the 5th. He was not persuaded, he said, that a warning to Japan was appropriate; with the benefit of his discussions he doubted whether Japan was ready to invade Kunming. He would do what he could by Lend-Lease aid to China; but he thought a better deterrent would be reinforcements in the region, and he would also do what he could to build up the American Volunteer Air Force there.⁴¹⁰ Whitehall had also concluded that it would take Japan a month to prepare for such an action, so that advice was not unexpected.

Next day, November 10, in Tokyo, Foreign Minister Togo Shigenori met with both the American and the British ambassadors. Whether Churchill had sighted Craigie's report of his meeting before he rose to speak at the annual Guildhall banquet in London that evening is problematical, but he was at pains to persuade his own public – and the world – that it was not Britain's interests, policies and territorial rights which were the centre of the storm in the Far East. He sought to avoid any general understanding that America's involvement was largely in response to Britain's urging because of the critical and unsustainable position it had got itself into, and he very deliberately shifted the focus onto the United States. He referred to its "time-honoured interests in the Far East" and said "they are doing their utmost to find ways of preserving peace in the Pacific." Then, in the pathetic pose of a friend coming to the aid of another, he said: "We do not know whether their efforts will be successful, but should they fail and the United States become involved in war with Japan it is my duty to say that the British declaration will follow within the hour." In a superb demonstration of the use of words he then compared Japan's modest steel production with that of the United States; cleverly concealed what Whitehall knew very well, that a war in the Pacific was possibly the surest way of keeping Soviet Russia in the war in Europe; painted the Japanese government as the warmonger; admitted some British interests in the region; and made a bid to demonstrate a partnership relationship with the US rather than one of abject dependence. He said: "I hope therefore that the peace of the Pacific will be preserved in accordance with the known wishes of Japan's wisest statesmen. But every preparation to defend British interests in the Far East, and to defend the common cause now at stake, has been and is being made."⁴¹¹

On November 11 the British cabinet considered Craigie's report of his meeting plus decrypts of two items: the Japanese government's instructions to its ambassadors for the Washington talks, and advice that Togo had agreed to the revision and renewal of the Tripartite Pact. The likelihood of an end to hostilities between Japan and China was therefore dramatically increased and Churchill knew that this would mean the release of great forces to move south against British interests whether there was an American-Japanese understanding or not.

When Togo briefed the Liaison Conference on progress in diplomatic moves, including those two meetings on November 12 he said he thought agreement with the United States was still possible but that the British Government wanted specific proposals and not an agreement in principle. The US had declined to act as an intermediary in peace talks with China and Togo thought it may be difficult for them to reach a settlement directly. He said he had pressed the Japanese and American ambassadors to have an agreement ready within 10 days, which was still 10 days clear of cabinet's war deadline.

The Japanese cabinet had gone as near as it could to repudiating the Tripartite Pact but, being deeply divided and under pressure from Hitler, it had renewed the pact in revised form somewhat reluctantly. It had refused to intervene in the Russian question directly and decided it would definitely not attack Russia, regardless of Hitler's diplomatic pressure, until at least the spring of 1942. However it cooperated under its treaty obligations to some extent by feeding Germany with military intelligence, it now interfered with supplies which America directed to Russia, and it closed its waterways to Russian shipping, forcing it to use hazardous alternative routes, and it reinforced the Kwantung Army facing the Soviet border. Richard Sorge learned of Cabinet's decision and relayed it to Stalin, and this enabled him to shift an initial eight to ten rifle divisions plus 1700 tanks and 1500 aircraft from the eastern front to the western front where they were held in tight strategic reserve⁴¹²

Togo expanded the talks with the US by seeing the American ambassador again personally in parallel with the continuing discussions in Washington. By agreeing to withdraw from Indochina as part of its negotiating package with the United States, Japan had indicated that it did not want a continuing military presence in South East Asia. It only wanted the Europeans out. It was in step with the United States on trade and tariff policy.

This made American support for Britain in the Far East less likely and suggested that Britain would be on its own in a confrontation with Japan. Roosevelt's advice of the 9th was therefore to be read in that light – and as a suggestion that Britain should mend its bridges with Japan, too – but on the 12th, in spite of that advice and in the knowledge of Japan's 'final effort' to reach a settlement in Washington, Churchill rejected outright an Australian request that additional aircraft be sent to Singapore. That request was largely the result of public anxiety generated by Britain's black propaganda program, the principle aim of which was, in Australia's case, to generate support for an increased Australian contribution towards the defence of 'empire.' The reason he gave was a tacit admission of Britain's critical situation and uncertainty about support from the United States: it would be a grave strategic error which might prove fatal to spread resources to the Far East, possibly to remain inactive for a year, when they were actively engaged against Germany and Italy.⁴¹³ Churchill could have only given that response if he was determined to use the United States as a buffer against Japan and if he was confident that he could engineer such a buffer.

On November 15 the brutal battle for Moscow started with the ill-clad Germans throwing themselves at the Russian defences in frozen conditions but with widespread expectation that they would be successful. In a message to Craigie, Eden went very close to admitting the implications of Churchill's position. He said that the government's present policy "admittedly involves a risk of war, though with a good prospect of active American participation" and a policy of appeasement would require concessions "at the expense of China, and probably others" which may be "at the cost of forfeiting both the respect and material assistance of our friends."⁴¹⁴ The "others" he referred to meant Britain. No one else. The government had been eager to pursue a policy of appeasement in Europe when it was other people, like the Czechoslovaks, who were paying the price, but when it had to pay the price itself it lost interest.

And at that time Togo, not knowing that his government's war plans had already been leaked to Grew and transmitted to Washington immediately they had been decided, was meeting the ambassador to warn him that time was running out. He reported their exchange to the Liaison Conference thus:

The United States has delayed and delayed. Japan has made concession after concession. It appears that the problem of Japanese immigration and other differences have become more aggravated. The feelings of the Japanese people won't allow this situation to continue. The Diet is in session, and the situation is critical. Hence we must find a solution quickly and should not call the present talks 'preliminary discussions.'

Since the United States is applying economic pressure on us, which is even stronger than military pressure, we may have to act in order to defend ourselves. For the United States to insist that Japan disregard the sacrifices she is making in China is tantamount to telling us to commit suicide. Please convey this to your government. [Emphasis added.]

Grew replied: "I understand. I will convey it to my government. I am most anxious to find a solution." He went home in a tearful mood.⁴¹⁵

The "draft proposal for hastening the end of the war against the United States, Great Britain, the Netherlands and Chiang" which was adopted at that Liaison Conference confirms that Japan had no direct interest in Australia, New Zealand or India. A note concerning Tripartite cooperation to secure the surrender of Great Britain reads, in part:

"2(a) The Empire will adopt the following policies: (1) the connection between Australia and India and the British mother country will be broken by means of political pressure and the destruction of commerce, and their separation will be achieved; (2) the independence of Burma will be promoted, and this will be used to stimulate the independence of India.

And a note concerning measures "to destroy the will of the United States to fight" reads in part:

"3(a),(5) Attempts will be made to break the ties between the United States and Australia."
[Emphasis added.]

It was up to the US to respond, but the US was caught by its own conflicts of interest. Even though some commentators have claimed that Roosevelt was stalling to induce a crisis which would justify a declaration of war against Germany, crisis talks within the Washington Administration during the weeks which followed show that it was still eager to find a solution. The strategy adopted by the joint US Army-Navy Board for the war in the Atlantic actually made it imperative that a war with Japan in the Pacific should be avoided, but Churchill was eager for such a war to begin immediately to relieve the pressure on Britain. Assuming that Japan would strike south to seize sources of oil in the Dutch East Indies if the US did not restore its supplies, service leaders had urged Roosevelt to make concessions.

VITAL INFORMATION

But also on November 15 a quite remarkable secret discussion took place in Washington. Army Chief of Staff General George Marshall invited seven newspaper correspondents to his office, explained his embarrassment at calling a secret conference, and invited anyone who did not care to share secrets to leave before he started talking. None left. Armed with the very latest intelligence which – considering the 14 hour time lag between Tokyo and Washington – must have included advice from Grew of his meeting with Togo he told them that the US was decrypting Japanese messages; that the United States was on the brink of war with Japan; and that war would break out during the "first ten days of December." Marshall did not relay that information to either Admiral Kimmel or General Clark in Hawaii. Why? What did he hope to achieve by his secret briefing to senior staff of four of the nation's major news media – the New York Times, New York Herald Tribune, Time and Newsweek – and three of the world's major wire services – Associated Press, United Press and International News Service? According to one of the journalists present, he said he had called them together because “there were some things he had to tell to key press correspondents in order that their interpretations of current and forthcoming events did not upset key military strategy of the United States.”⁴¹⁶ [Emphasis added.] What “key military strategy of the United States?” Was it the use of the Pacific Fleet at Pearl Harbour as a decoy to provoke Japan into a first strike? Was he expecting the journalists to step up a ‘let’s support Britain’ campaign, or a ‘hate Japan’ campaign in order to facilitate a declaration of war when that first strike came? In the land of the First Amendment, open government, strict journalistic ethics and the Monroe Doctrine of non-intervention in the affairs of other countries, it was the great ‘New Israel’s’ version of Chamberlain’s campaign of press coercion and manipulation in Britain.

On November 17 Grew confirmed his prediction of a sudden military or naval action by Japan but he was more specific. He said he was not referring to China but “to other areas available to Japan for a surprise attack.”⁴¹⁷ Treasury Secretary Henry Morgenthau, presumably not happy with the idea of a precipitate encounter, proposed that the US should buy time by offering Japan a six months truce, and Roosevelt asked Secretary of State Cordell Hull to work on the proposal. Hull immediately asked that all possibilities be explored to avoid war with Japan.⁴¹⁸ The proposals submitted show a lack of understanding of Japan’s aspirations for a Europe-free Asia and assume simple territorial expansionism. Overall they indicate that the US Administration was no different from Europe’s colonial powers in its attitude to other peoples, their resources and territories. They were to be manipulated and traded to preserve the interests of a ‘great power’ just like any other commodity, even if the great power didn’t have established authority or responsibility for them.

Next day, November 18, the head of his Far Eastern Affairs Division, Maxwell Hamilton, proposed that Japan be offered all or part of Papua and New Guinea in return for withdrawing her troops from China. Under his plan the US would provide Japan with funds to purchase territory from either or both of the ruling powers, Holland and Australia, and it would be reimbursed by Japan through the transfer of merchant ships or naval vessels. Admitting that it might be seen as appeasement and that Australia and Holland could be perturbed by the plan, Hamilton set out ways of revoking or varying the Australian mandate. But there was no suggestion of transferring an island or two of the nearby US colony, the Philippines. America’s thinking showed no real advance from that of the European colonial powers at the Berlin carve-up Conferences of the 1880s or the proposals which the British government had considered for the ‘reallocation’ of parts of Africa to appease Germany during the previous two or three years.

Kurusu held his first talks with Hull that day and went beyond his approved brief in proposing that Japan would withdraw from South Indochina in return for a slight relaxing of the American embargo. He was promptly instructed by Togo to withdraw the proposal, but it had already been referred to Halifax who found such a simple formula attractive.

However, having studied the Morgenthau proposal Hamilton offered an alternative plan on November 19. As part of a comprehensive peace agreement for the Far East he proposed a loan of $US2billion at two per cent interest for 20 years plus an amendment to the 1924 Immigration Act which had so upset the Japanese, in return for Japan's withdrawal from China and agreement to sell the US up to 50 per cent of its production of merchant and naval shipping. An outside observer could be excused for being confused and nonplused at the crude manner in which basic human aspirations for relief from foreign domination and exploitation were again being totally misrepresented and circumvented in commodity trade negotiations.

For a few days there were rapid exchanges as Whitehall and Washington juggled their counter proposals to try to manoeuvre Japan into submission from the position of strength which they had because they were able to read almost all of the Japanese diplomatic traffic, but there was a sudden atmosphere of crisis on November 21 when they learned of a week-old message from Foreign Minister Togo to the Japanese Consul-General in Hong Kong to the effect that if the Washington negotiations failed "one may expect a sudden change in that part of the international situation which revolves around Japan" and that in such a situation Japan would seize British and American concessions and interests in China.⁴¹⁹

Then on November 22 Hull told Halifax that the Japanese had made a revised offer: both Japan and the United States should undertake to make no further armed advance into South East Asia, it said; Japan would withdraw from South Indochina; and the US would restore commercial relations with Japan and supply Japan with "a required quantity of oil." Hull objected to the prohibition on further American forces in the region but he told the ambassadors for Australia, Holland and China that the idea was attractive as a temporary measure "for maybe three months."⁴²⁰ In contrast to the usual situation, in which his stand was more belligerent than his colleagues, Churchill said he would be happy to see a slight relaxation of the embargo in return for the situation being stabilized for three months, but his view did not prevail. The Foreign Office wanted the United States locked into a water tight modus vivendi which was in Britain's favor and on November 24 Eden instructed Halifax to tell Hull that the American counter proposal did not go far enough. Britain wanted all Japanese military personnel and equipment out of south Indochina, not just troops; a promise of no further advances in China; and fewer American concessions, including no oil.⁴²¹

A CRITICAL POINT

However, that day the Admiralty's Operational Intelligence Centre reported that Hitler's advance troops were a mere 30 miles from metropolitan Moscow. The German advance was certainly beginning to stall because its troops and equipment could not cope with the horrific winter conditions, Hitler was driving his commanders under intense pressure in a desperate bid to break the Moscow defences. He knew that if he could not break Moscow immediately his army had to sit out a severe winter and he would have to revise his plans for the war in the west and in North Africa. However the siege of Leningrad, threatening Russia's remaining supply point from the north, was firmly in place and appeared to be starving the defenders into submission so Hitler was still confident that he would soon be master of Russia. All he needed was a diversion and strong support from his Far East ally. He wanted Japan to invade Russia in the east, to cause Stalin to move some of his forces back there, and to reduce the forces available for the defence of Moscow. Churchill was in no doubt that a Russian surrender would enable Hitler to turn west again, “to extinguish British resistance,” and that Japanese intervention was likely to hasten a Russian surrender. If there was a concurrent Chinese collapse the situation would be even more critical because, as already noted, Japan would be relieved to turn south as well. Churchill was therefore desperate to keep the Soviet Union in the war and to keep Japan pre-occupied in Asia so that it was not tempted to help Germany in Russia. This could best be done by maximum aid to both Russia and China, and, if necessary, direct conflict with Japan in South East Asia – provided that the United States was in there shooting too.

At that time the US Pacific Fleet, based in Pearl Harbour, was on the third day of a four-day air-defence operational exercise about 390 miles from Pearl Harbour and right on the route which Kimmel believed a Japanese fleet would have to take to attack that base.⁴²² This meant that if it happened to contact or intercept a Japanese fleet in attack mode it would be much more difficult for Roosevelt to claim that Japan struck first than if the fleet were back in harbour. At 3.05 pm Washington time that afternoon, November 24, (8.05 pm London time and 9.35 am in Honolulu) the Deputy Chief of US Naval Operations, Admiral Ingersol, despatched a message to Kimmel, which for some reason, did not reach him until about 1.35 pm Honolulu time. Ingersol advised that the chances of a favourable outcome to negotiations with Japan were “very doubtful.” He said that “in our opinion” that situation, coupled with statements of the Japanese government and the movements of their naval and military forces indicated that “a surprise aggressive movement in any direction including attack on Philippines or Guam is a possibility.” He said the addressees were requested “to inform senior army officers their areas [that] utmost secrecy necessary in order not to complicate an already tense situation or precipitate Japanese action.”⁴²³ Ingersol did not mention the navy or Pearl Harbour and Kimmel did not know of the McCollum Memorandum or understand that there was a strategy to provoke Japan into the first overt act of war against an unsuspecting base or naval target. However he knew that in September Roosevelt had issued shooting orders only for the Atlantic and the Southwest Pacific sub-area. After some reflection he therefore interpreted the message as an order to break off the exercise and recall the fleet to base so that it could not become involved in a real shooting match. At 3.30 pm he issued that order.⁴²⁴

During the exchanges between Whitehall and Washington on the 24th and 25th the US position was that it wanted to relax its demands on Japan while Britain wanted them tightened. Germany’s armies were still inching forward and they were at the point of encircling Moscow from the north. Hull is known to have sighted the Japanese counter proposal on November 25 but it is not known whether he gave it serious consideration or raised it with the governments concerned. Perhaps there was no point in it. The United States Government knew from its very effective code breaking program that the Japanese cabinet had set that day for mobilization if a diplomatic settlement had not been achieved, and that the final US terms had already been prepared. Roosevelt's inner circle knew that the president was committed to a policy of ensuring that Japan struck first. He summed up America's options as: first, to do nothing; second, to make something of an ultimatum again, stating a point beyond which the US would fight; third, to fight at once. But there was quite a bit of misgiving within that inner circle about the direction Roosevelt was taking and at a noon meeting at the White House the morality of placing US service personnel and civilians in harm's way was discussed. The outcome: no change. The decoy was in place. Stimson noted in his diary that: "... If you know your enemy is going to strike you, it is not usually wise to wait until he gets the jump on you by taking the initiative. The question was how we should manoeuvre them into the position of firing the first shot without allowing too much danger to ourselves. It was a difficult proposition. [And also] In spite of the risk involved, however, in letting the Japanese fire the first shot, we realized that in order to have the full support of the American people, it was desirable to make sure that the Japanese be the ones to do this, so that there should remain no doubt in anyone's mind as to who were the aggressors."⁴²⁵

In reality the United States president could not justify taking his country into war and his cabinet did not want him to. But there were two basic national interests which were impelling him and his cabinet in that direction. One was the need to avoid placing the nation in a position of isolation and under threat of attack in the event that Britain was defeated. That isolation and that threat would occur because of the open and conspicuous support which it had already given Britain. The other was the dominant national want to take advantage of the existing conflict in order to achieve a position of greater world influence, or economic and political dominance, by succeeding Britain as the preeminent Western power and preventing the competitive rise of either Japan or Communist Russia to that position of preeminence. And in the historical circumstances of the time the president and those around him had no more idea of how and why the world had got into its bind any more than the British prime minister and those around him, or the pope and those around him. None of them understood the nature of the amorphous Christian gel or the parody of Mein Kampf. None of them understood the nature of the triangle of Abrahamic Messianic faiths. Certainly none of them understood the significance of the Qur'anic Night Journey or Maimonides' expectation of the Messianic Age and the circumstantial movement towards the establishment of a national homeland for Jews. Their self understandings were all too deeply ingrained. They were, in reverse order: the Vatican as the exclusive route to salvation in succession to the Jewish people and the institution exercising earthly authority on behalf of the Triune God; Britain as the rightful, privileged and dominant white Christian power; and the United States as the 'New Israel' which would demonstrate what it meant to be thrust into that role and to exercise that responsibility. The trouble was that they were competing with another power which saw itself in exactly the same role, Hitler's Germany, and yet another which did not agree with the basis of the self-understanding of any of them, Communist Russia. Roosevelt believed he simply had to go on, but he needed to be able to blame someone else for his decision. The Japanese were to get the blame.

The difficulty of how to manoeuvre them into the position of firing the first shot without allowing too much danger to Americans was being aggravated by the continuing conspiracy of message diversion. Thirteen radio messages from Admiral Yamamoto to components of the Japanese fleet were picked up at Station H, Honolulu, between 1.00 pm on November 24 (about the time that the message which led to the aborting of the Pacific Fleet exercises was received from Ingersol) and 3.45 pm on November 26. In a key message that day, (November 25 west of the date line, but still November 24 east of it), while the thirty one ships of the Japanese attack fleet were anchored at Hitokappu Bay in the Kurile Islands, Yamamoto directed the fleet to depart on November 26, advance into Hawaiian waters through the North Pacific, and attack the United States fleet in Hawaii. He even provided the latitude and longitude for part of the route and a refueling point. The route would take the Japanese fleet right through the area in which the US Pacific Fleet was exercising at the time that Ingersol's message to Kimmel was despatched. Then in a second message which is really an extension of the first, he gave specific instructions for an attack against the main US naval force "on the very opening of hostilities" to "deal it a mortal blow" followed by an immediate withdrawal and return to Japan. But the message closed with an absolutely critical sentence. "Should the negotiations with the United States prove successful, the task force shall hold itself in readiness forthwith to return and reassemble."⁴²⁶ This is conclusive proof that twelve days before the attack on Pearl Harbour took place the Japanese Imperial Government still held a slim hope of successful negotiation with the United States, even though it had reacted exactly as the McCollum Memorandum anticipated and in the manner it intended. From Roosevelt's point of view the fact that Yamamoto's message had been intercepted and understood just had to be concealed. On the same afternoon, November 24, at 5.30 US EST, McCollum issued orders revising the message relay system which had two effects: Kimmel was further isolated from the information flow and Roosevelt was isolated from the sensitive intelligence tracking system – but not from the flow of intelligence.⁴²⁷

In another message on the same day the admiral ordered discretionary radio silence. From each of the other messages it was possible to fix the positions of components of the Japanese fleets, but Kimmel was not provided with any intercepted messages or movement reports at all.⁴²⁸ In addition to Yamamoto, Vice Admiral Nagumo used the airwaves a lot on November 26 (west of the date line) in two and three way conversations with his subordinates and these messages were also picked up at Station H. But Kimmel was simply told in the communications summary for November 25 which he received next morning that "Commander Carriers was in extensive communications with the submarine commander and the Central Pacific Forces." No more.⁴²⁹ This concealment of information – the concealment even continued through successive Congressional Inquiries in 1945–46 and 1995 – led to a myth that the Japanese fleets had exercised total radio silence while on route to Pearl Harbour. The messages have subsequently been tracked and the records of their movements exist, but all thirteen of Yamamoto's messages are missing from the intercept files released to the National Archives by President Jimmy Carter in 1979.⁴³⁰

So Kimmel laboured on, but the communications summary which he had received from Rochefort on the morning of November 25 was sufficient to tell him that there was a large Japanese force including submarines and long-range carrier-based patrol aircraft in the area of Formosa and the Marshall Islands. The evidence pointed to the possibility of a two-pronged attack on Pearl Harbour, from both the north west and the south west, possibly concurrent with attacks on targets in South East Asia. After discussions between Kimmel, Rochefort and the Honolulu station commandant Rear Admiral Bloch, Rochefort was directed to send an assessment of the situation to Washington. In his 224-word priority message to Station US he appears to have skirted around some of the issues, referred to Japanese naval movements towards the Pescadores, Formosa and the Gulf of Tonkin, and strong concentrations in the Marshalls, but he omitted to mention Hawaii, or six aircraft carriers which had been identified, and closed with the note: "Evaluate above to indicate strong force component may be preparing to operate in South Eastern Asia while parts may operate from Palao and Marshalls." The message was received at the office of the Chief of Naval Operations, Washington, soon after 8.10 pm US EST, initialled by the commander of Station US, and copies – including one for McCollum – were sent to Navy High Command. It was treated by one of McCollum's assistants, Lt. Comd. Ethelbert Watts, in the manner in which it had been transmitted, as 'priority;' it was attached to a presidential monograph marked "Aide to President – Show," and it was delivered to Beardall for Roosevelt immediately.⁴³¹ Another copy was delivered to Stimson. The recording of its transmission to Roosevelt in that manner directly contravened the order which McCollum had issued only 27 hours earlier. It can be assumed that Watts had not read that order when he came on duty. It did not influence the strategy to which Roosevelt was committed.

Whitehall also had critical information by that date from two messages. One, which had been transmitted on November 19, (when it was decrypted is not clear) was to the Japanese Chargé d' Affaires in London. It advised that if diplomatic relations were on the point of being severed, concealed messages would be transmitted in clear language in the weather forecasts of the Japanese Broadcast Service. If such a message was broadcast all message receipt books were to be burned.⁴³² A different message would be used depending on whether the country concerned was the United States, the Soviet Union or Britain. From that, Whitehall concluded that if Britain did not reach an agreement with Japan but the US did, Japan would be very likely to attack British positions in China and/or South East Asia. The other had been sent to all Japanese missions in Europe. It advised that the government was doing its utmost to reach a compromise but it could make no further concessions, the outlook was not bright, and if the negotiations broke down the situation would be critical.⁴³³

Eden and Churchill kept the pressure on Washington and on the morning of November 26, Eden received a message, the contents of which have never been published but which is thought, by some writers, to have been the incomplete terms which Hull proposed to hand to the Japanese, without the detailed ten point note. However in the circumstances it is more likely to have been advice that fleets of the Japanese Navy were en route to Pearl Harbour, that Roosevelt was waiting for a first strike, and that Britain should ‘sit it out’ until that attack occurred. We will not know until either the British or United States governments declassify the message and release it for public information. In any case Eden discussed the matter with Churchill and they decided to use China as an excuse to press for even tighter terms. Churchill cabled Roosevelt saying, in part: “If (the Chinese) collapse, our joint dangers would enormously increase. We are sure that the regard of the United States for the Chinese cause will govern your action.”⁴³⁴ We feel that the Japanese are most unsure of themselves.”⁴³⁵ Britain had forced the US into a stalemate. It had no room left to bargain. Almost immediately after Churchill’s message was received in Washington Hull handed the American terms to the Japanese Ambassadors. They were dumbfounded and retired in the greatest distress.⁴³⁶

The talks were presumed to be at an end and on both sides of the Atlantic there was an assumption that Japan would strike. The task was to determine where. Both the US and Britain wanted Japan to strike first. Roosevelt had no basis on which to declare war on Japan. He may have had justification for a declaration of war against Germany, but he did not have the political support required to make it. He had to wait for something to happen which would give him the justification. For that matter Britain did not have a justification either, except, perhaps, that Japan was at war with one of its allies, China. Historically, in such situations it was the nature of British interests which were at stake and a cost-benefits analysis which determined whether Britain intervened or not. The fact of a conflict was no guarantee of friendly intervention. The situation was no different now, except that the decision was even harder because of the complexity of Britain’s conflicts of interest. Churchill had to wait for Japan to attack something so that he could say he was defending something other than colonial privilege. He would not have long to wait. Intelligence reports were pouring in. A British intelligence intercept showed that the Italian and Japanese ambassadors in Bangkok thought an invasion was imminent. The US Consul in Hanoi reported that according to the Vichy French authorities the Japanese intended to attack the Kra Isthmus, linking Thailand, Burma and Malaya, on December 1,⁴³⁷ and US naval intelligence reported that the Japanese second and third fleets were being organized into special task forces at Takao (Kaoshing), on Formosa, and at the nearby Pescadores. Their actions were reported to be subject to restraining orders from Tokyo.⁴³⁸

Hull had decided at the last minute to hand the Japanese only the ten-point ultimatum and not the modus vivendi on the basis that:

*The slight prospect of Japan’s agreeing to the modus vivendi therefore did not warrant assuming the risks involved in proceeding with it, especially the risk of collapse of Chinese morale and resistance, and even of disintegration.*⁴³⁹

In spite of the position which Britain had taken, Churchill tried to pass the buck to the Americans for the consequences and implied in his memoirs that his response would almost certainly have been different if he had all of the information. He wrote:

We had not heard up to this moment of the “Ten-Point Note”, which not only met our wishes and those of the associated governments, but indeed went beyond anything for which we had ventured to ask. On this same 26th Mr. Hull received the Japanese envoys at the State Department. He did not even mention to them the modus vivendi about which the President had telegraphed to me on the 23rd. On the contrary, he handed them the “Ten-Point Note.”⁴⁴⁰

On November 27 there was just a touch of good news from the Russian front. The German advance was stalled in the suburbs of Moscow. Roosevelt talked with key defence and naval advisers, including King, commander of the Atlantic Fleet, but avoided making any direct response to the advice from Hawaii, and officially decided there was not likely to be further negotiation. In reality it was no new decision. He had been working on that basis for days. He then authorized Stimson, Secretary for War, to issue a ‘war warning.’ The gist of the message was that negotiations with Japan had ceased; an aggressive movement in any direction, but including the Philippines, the Kra Peninsula or Borneo, was expected within a few days; defensive deployment should be executed; US policy calls for Japan to commit the first overt act; and necessary reconnaissance was to be carried out in such a manner that it did not alarm the civilian population or disclose US intentions. But there was confusion in the messages and the same message was not sent to all commanders. Revised instructions were sent to some commanders, notably Kimmel, next day, November 28. The result was that some bases were put on full alert with restricted leave, but others, including Hawaii, were not. Stark issued a specific order to Kimmel saying that part of the previous order was “not applicable in the Pacific area and will not be placed in effect in that area except as now in force in Southeast Pacific sub area and Panama naval coastal frontier.” But he confirmed that: “Prior to hostile Japanese action you are directed to undertake such reconnaissance and other measures as you deem necessary but these measures should be carried out so as not repeat not to alarm civil population or disclose intent.”⁴⁴¹ [Emphasis added.] In the circumstances of Morimura’s surveillance, US counter-surveillance and Sarnoff’s rather fantastic visit at Roosevelt’s request, it is hardly surprising that it took Stark’s double injunction to require Kimmel to do nothing which would show Morimura that he was expecting “visitors.” To put the base on full alert or to cancel leave would certainly have done that. Thus, he did not, and Short put the base’s military defences on low alert.

When Hitler learned that day of the US ultimatum to Japan and the breakdown in discussions between them, he had Ribbentrop summon the Japanese Ambassador and urge Japan to declare war immediately on both the United States and Britain. Responding to a question from the ambassador on Germany’s relations with the US, Ribbentrop said:

If Japan becomes engaged in a war with the United States, Germany will of course join the war immediately. There is no possibility whatever of Germany entering a separate peace with the United States under such circumstances. The Fuhrer is adamant on that point. ⁴⁴²

An earlier intercept shown to Churchill that day indicated that the Thai prime minister “was weakening” and that he had told the Japanese ambassador that “he wished to see Japan predominant in the region.”⁴⁴³ British intelligence reports for that day suggested each of Borneo, Malaya, Thailand, China and/or the Burma Road, and Siberia as possible targets with Thailand’s Kra Isthmus being the most likely. The reasoning went that a direct attack on British interests in

Malaya or Singapore was unlikely because of the danger of heavy losses from aerial counter attack, and it was expected to take the Japanese land forces three months to move south due to the extremely difficult terrain and monsoon conditions.⁴⁴⁴

In Washington there was an air of unreality around Roosevelt who was trying to act as if everything was normal, and that day he decided to take a weekend break at Warm Springs, Georgia, for what he called a delayed Thanksgiving celebration. It was as if he was saying to his inner circle ‘come on: let’s get it over so that we can start the real war.’ Before leaving, he held a meeting of his chief war advisers, Stimson, Hull, Knox, Marshall and Stark. The discussion was “disingenuous” and the president’s decision stood. In spite of the Yamamoto message four days earlier which said that the attack would not take place if negotiations with the United States were successful, it was option one. Do nothing. Or almost nothing. At the president’s suggestion a telegram was drafted for despatch to Emperor Hirohito which amounted to an ultimatum that “disastrous events would be set afoot” if a severe blow was aimed at the Allied powers of Britain, Holland and America by Japan.⁴⁴⁵ It was in essence the message which Churchill believed Roosevelt was committed to sending at the close of their Atlantic Charter meeting, but it went even further than previous communications by introducing the concept that Britain, Holland and the United States were “Allied powers.” However it was drafted in such a way that it was essentially an exercise in combined domestic and international public relations which could be used at the most appropriate time, and it was not, then, dispatched. Next day, November 29, in between casual drives around Warm Springs, and as the British Colonial Office ordered the governor of the Straits Settlements to make final preparations for defence, Roosevelt received an intercepted message from Berlin to Tokyo. It was in response to Hitler’s request for immediate Japanese intervention. The ambassador was instructed to tell Hitler, “very secretly:”

*there is extreme danger that war may suddenly break out between the Anglo-Saxon nations and Japan through some clash of arms, and add that the time of breaking out of this war may come quicker than anyone dreams.*⁴⁴⁶

On November 30, Whitehall convened an ad hoc committee to work on defence arrangements for the Straits Settlements and to advise whether Britain should make a pre-emptive strike to occupy the Kra Isthmus before Japan could do so, but in Pearl Harbour then (and over the next few days) there was also an air of unreality. Kimmel and Short knew that Japan’s navy was in the Pacific geared for war, but because of the continued withholding of information and, in particular, data on the movement of the Japanese fleet, coupled with confusion over instructions and both technical and administrative failures, the base was very ill-prepared to face that navy.⁴⁴⁷ And they certainly did not know that Roosevelt had received the intercepted message from Tokyo to Berlin, noted above.

Both Churchill and Roosevelt were playing games in their last minute negotiations for a compromise agreement and, as historian Joseph P. Lash points out: “In keeping the talks [between the US and Japan] going, Roosevelt and Hull had two purposes: the negotiations bought the West time; and there was always the outside chance of a settlement. Roosevelt placed more emphasis on the first, Hull on the second.”⁴⁴⁸ Lash also said:

*In the Pacific, Roosevelt and Churchill were playing for time. They genuinely believed that a policy of firmness and unity would hold off hostilities. But in the Atlantic, Roosevelt, with Churchill's concurrence, was looking for an incident ("everything was to be done to force an incident," he had advised Churchill), one that would permit him to wage war in the Atlantic without declaring it.*⁴⁴⁹

Churchill had consented to direct talks between the US and Japan because he did not have any option if he wanted American support for the war in Europe. But, because British and US policies on China did not correspond and because of Roosevelt's well established position that the imperial European powers should quit Asia, the British were worried by the fact that the US was conducting negotiations in isolation and they were being kept in the dark about the progress of talks.⁴⁵⁰ However, included in Roosevelt's final demands were that Japan must vacate all of the territory it had occupied in both China and Indochina, that it must withdraw recognition from the 'puppet' central government in Nanking which meant, in effect, recognizing Chiang Kai-Shek, and that it must formally withdraw from the Tripartite Pact. And because the statement was drafted in such a way that it was regarded by the Japanese government as an ultimatum, British fears of a separate deal behind their backs evaporated.⁴⁵¹

While those fears evaporated, fears of a Japanese invasion of the Kra Isthmus did not, and there was consensus in Whitehall that there was wisdom in a pre-emptive strike from a military point of view. However, there were overriding fears. The occupation by British forces of sovereign Thai territory might push Thailand irrevocably into the Japanese camp and alienate American public opinion by making Britain the aggressor. It might also lead to a clash with Japanese forces while Britain was still without a firm guarantee of support from the United States "over an issue which was hardly likely to galvanize the American public in Britain's favour." The Commander in Chief Far East was therefore instructed not to proceed with the operation except on express orders from Whitehall.⁴⁵²

This situation made it imperative that Britain had a clear understanding of what circumstances would lead to a United States declaration of war against Japan. The reason for a direct question to the president would have been patently obvious and Churchill therefore chose to manipulate Roosevelt into an indicative answer by the round-about route of a proposal that he issue a more explicit warning to Japan that "any incremental advance would lead to a wider war."⁴⁵³

But what of the Middle East through which all of Britain's forces had to pass? While Britain and Germany both waited on tenterhooks for Japan to show its hand and Britain squirmed through its deliberations on the war which it knew it was about to face in South East Asia, the Mufti met Hitler on November 30. Following his meeting in Rome with Mussolini at the end of October, the Mufti had gone to Berlin where he had a long wait because of Hitler's pre-occupation with Russia but eventually, with much ceremony, he was ushered in for his meeting.

The Fuhrer assured him that after German forces broke through the Caucasus their objective would be not the occupation of Arab lands but the destruction of the Jewish homeland. They discussed the best means of recruiting Arab troops to the Nazi banner and the Mufti promptly commenced a broadcasting campaign to recruit Arabs for a new Arab Legion to rise up and overthrow the Allies in the Middle East. He also called for Muslims from Europe to join Hitler's armies. The plan for a Middle Eastern Arab Legion failed but some 6,000 Muslims were recruited to fight on the Russian front.⁴⁵⁴

Hitler reminded the Mufti that Germany had declared an uncompromising war on the Jews and that this naturally involved stiff opposition to the Jewish Homeland in Palestine. He was determined "to challenge the European nations one by one into a settlement of the Jewish question and, when the time came, Germany would turn to the non-European peoples with the same call."⁴⁵⁵ But it is doubtful whether Hitler gave the Mufti a detailed briefing on the methodology of 'the settlement', of the thousands who were being slaughtered every day in the towns of the occupied territories, of the slave labour camps which were being introduced to relieve Germans for other work and of the specially designed mobile gas chambers which were being got ready to go into operation a few days later.

Next day, December 1, the German armies mounted a dramatic bid to crack the shell of Russian resistance in the suburbs of Moscow and a forward column reached within twelve miles of the walls of the Kremlin.

MATTERS OF RECORD

It is not clear to what extent Hitler and the Mufti discussed the Far East, but the gulf between the American and Japanese demands had proven too great. The US had refused to give an assurance on the volume of oil which it would provide for Japan to support its domestic economy and had refused to end its aid to Chiang Kai-shek. Japan would not recognize Chiang Kai-shek and would not withdraw from Northern Indochina until the China question was resolved. Therefore, before we turn to Roosevelt's answer to Churchill's concerns about what it would require for the US to declare war, it is enlightening to reflect on how the two countries came to be in such a position of stalemate. Foreign Minister Togo made a detailed statement to the Japanese Imperial Conference that day as the German armies were virtually knocking at the doors of the Kremlin – the same day that Roosevelt responded to Churchill's proposal for a more explicit warning. Togo summarized the proposals, counter-proposals and responses during seven months of negotiation between the two governments.⁴⁵⁶ He did not try to gild the lily. He related the chain of events simply and dispassionately in a manner which writers reviewing the same events from a Western perspective have seldom been able to emulate, with the notable exception of Antony Best in Britain, Japan and Pearl Harbour.⁴⁵⁷ Perhaps their assumptions of Western Christian correctness and superiority put them on the defensive about the closing phases of the European colonial era, about relations with non-Christian governments and systems of ethics, and about the propriety of the self-proclaimed 'New Israel' assuming the mantel of universal boss-cocky which was being stripped from Europe's shoulders – by both the US and Japan. Foreign Minister Togo told the Imperial Conference that:⁴⁵⁸

The basis of America's international relations was to adhere firmly to the Four Principles and to demand their application. They were: (1) respect for the territorial integrity and sovereignty of all nations; (2) non-interference in the internal affairs of other countries; (3) non-discrimination in commercial matters; (4) non-disturbance of the status quo in the Pacific, except by peaceful means. Moreover the United States indicated that she doubted the peaceful intentions of our Empire, objected to our stationing troops in China, advocated the unconditional application of the principle of non-discrimination in commercial matters in China, and demanded that we make the Tripartite Pact effectively a dead letter. As a result, the negotiations ran into difficulties and finally came to a standstill.

What produced these difficulties in views between our two countries was the fact that the United States, in the conduct of international relations, adhered firmly to abstract principles that she had traditionally maintained, and urged their application to China and other areas without considering the actual situation in East Asia. We recognized that it was extremely difficult to reach an agreement as long as the United States did not revise her attitude.

Togo then noted Cabinet's decision to make concessions to improve Japanese-American relations in what amounted to a Japanese version of Chamberlain's Munich appeasement process; inter-government discussions on the Tripartite Pact, the US interpretation of the right of self defence and non-discrimination in commerce; cabinet's decision to send a second ambassador to Washington to speed up and broaden the scope of negotiations; and America's demand that Japan renounce the use of force. He continued:

In addition she repeated forcefully that if a Japanese-American Agreement was concluded, our Empire would no longer need to continue the Tripartite Pact; and that she wished us either to abandon it or to render it a dead letter.

As for non-discrimination in commerce, she wanted to eliminate the Japanese provision regarding it – namely, "its application to the whole world." She stressed that the United States had been exerting efforts to restore the freedom of trade.

The reference to US "efforts to restore the freedom of trade" was a clear allusion to the Atlantic Charter and its pressure on Britain to drop the Imperial Preference system, although, as Togo acknowledged, the US had taken a consistent 'traditional' line in a number of international forums. He went on to relate American proposals for a 'Joint Declaration on Economic Policy'; a Japanese-American commercial treaty; restoration of complete economic control in China to a Chinese Government under Chiang Kai-Shek – except that there would be "joint economic development of China (to be) undertaken by the Powers on a cooperative basis"; US "willingness to act as a mediator in establishing direct negotiations between Japan and China if Japan decided to pursue a peaceful policy"; and Japanese fears that the American proposals "will mark the beginning of an international control of China."⁴⁵⁹

Togo then noted the meeting between Japan's ambassadors and Roosevelt on November 17, then meetings with Hull on the 18th, 20th, 21st, 22nd, and 26th. He summarized continuing differences over the Tripartite Pact, China and non-discrimination in trade; he repeated Japan's counter proposals, then continued:

*However, the United States, even though she voiced no objection to the idea that Japan and the United States would assume positions of leadership in East Asia and the Western Hemisphere respectively and stated that she desired to arrive at a peaceful settlement in the Pacific area, refused to discontinue aid to Chiang. In addition, she reiterated her stand toward the Tripartite Pact. She gave no indication of a willingness to compromise.*⁴⁶⁰

After listing discussions between the United States and other countries on normalization of trade with Japan he noted Hull's comments that troop withdrawal from Indochina "would not be sufficient to improve the critical situation in the South Pacific area", that "the time was not ripe for the President to serve as an intermediary between Japan and China," and that after conferring with "various countries concerned ... he regretfully concluded that he could not agree [to Japan's new proposal]." Togo then listed the revised American proposals, which included two multilateral nonaggression pacts between Japan, the United States, the European powers with colonial interests in Asia, and Thailand, which would have amounted to continued recognition of the existing imperial arrangements in Asia. He noted why these were unacceptable, and listed those sections of the US proposals which were acceptable.

To Japan, the latest American proposals were "a conspicuous retrogression ... which completely disregarded the negotiations that had gone on for half a year," and China under Chiang Kai-Shek would become increasingly dependent on Britain and the United States. By way of an overview Togo said:

In short, the United States Government has persistently adhered to its traditional doctrines and principles, ignored realities in East Asia, and tried to force on our Empire principles that she herself could not easily carry out. Despite the fact that we made a number of concessions, she maintained her original position throughout the negotiations, lasting for seven months, and refused to budge even one step. I believe that America's policy toward Japan has been consistently to thwart the establishment of a New Order in East Asia, which is our immutable policy. We must recognize that if we were to accept their present proposal, the international position of our Empire would be reduced to a status lower than it was prior to the Manchurian Incident, and our very survival would inevitably be threatened."⁴⁶¹

Togo's assessment that US policy was to "thwart the establishment of a New Order in East Asia" was basically correct, but not entirely. In American minds the Monroe motto 'The Americas for the Americans' did not translate directly into 'Asia for the Asians.' The American version of the New Order in Asia still saw the European powers replaced by the United States – the policy which can be dated from 1835 when the US was rebuffed in its first effort to establish a diplomatic mission in competition with the European powers but which is best illustrated by Commodore Perry's 'visits' to Tokyo in 1853 and 1854 and the imposition of a number of highly unequal trade treaties. [Section xviii.]

The US certainly did not see its 'leadership' restricted to the Western Hemisphere or being shared with a partner in Asia – either Japan or China – as Togo and his colleagues seem to have believed, unless that partner was a dependant or recognized the virtual suzerainty of the United States. In this sense Togo's assessment was spot on. China under Chiang Kai-shek was to become a resource rich vassal-state to be exploited by 'the powers.' The Christian colonization of China which the European powers had never been able to complete was to be completed by the United States through the back door. But in the circumstances of the war in Europe the US had to concede a continuing role to the existing colonial powers or, with a collapse of the Western Alliance, be faced with the fact that National Socialism would continue in Europe for some time and place the United States under enormous pressures.

In addition there was another factor which greatly influenced America's readiness to form a leadership alliance with one or other of the major powers in Asia – religion. The US was much more at ease with the American educated convert to Protestant Christianity who had a heritage of mass baptisms to live up to – Chiang Kai-shek – than it was with the highly conservative and puritanical demigod – Emperor Hirohito – who led an intensely nationalistic people imbued with a pre-messianic state-religious philosophy and a system of ethics which the US neither understood nor cared for, and who had just pressed many of its American-led Christian communities into a merger. This was a significant factor in American racism and in the imposition of the anti-Japanese immigration restrictions to which the Japanese naturally took such strong exception.

Speaking after the Foreign Minister and in his capacity as Minister for Home Affairs, Prime Minister Tojo told the Imperial Conference of preparations which had been taken to protect the domestic stability of the Empire in the event of war. He referred to censorship and the need to condition public opinion; the problem of dealing with radical nationalist groups and the need to simplify judicial procedures under wartime conditions; preventative detention to protect internal security; mobilization of manpower for emergency services; food rationing and monetary controls; and detention or internment of foreign nationals. The measures which he outlined and the terms in which he expressed the justification for them are remarkably reminiscent of Britain just two years earlier.⁴⁶²

However the reports to the Imperial Conference by Togo and Tojo do more than give us a report of the situation immediately before the outbreak of war. They illustrate the strange relationship between Britain and the United States and the way in which this was being manipulated. At no stage do either of the Japanese leaders give any indication that they thought that the US was negotiating on behalf of both itself and Britain. In fact quite the reverse. The whole world – Japan included – knew very well that the United States was very heavily committed to supporting Britain in its war with Germany. But the US was still deeply divided. It had not declared war against Germany. Its support was only in the commercial supply of armaments and the provision of favourable finance facilities: it was not making grants at its taxpayers' expense and it was not committing forces. It had extended similar arrangements to the Soviet Union – a country with which it had not enjoyed cordial relations – and that aid was known to be a move in support of Britain and against Germany. It was not support for the Soviet Union in the ordinary sense of the word. It had to manage its relations with the Vatican, the Catholic Church in the United States, the isolationist lobby and the anti-Communist lobby very carefully indeed to avoid a backlash against the extension of the Lend Lease scheme.

The Atlantic Charter, which had to be negotiated as a precondition to expanded aid for Britain, referred specifically to Hitler's Germany and it contained provisions which were contrary to Britain's interests. Those provisions had been confirmed in US discussions with Japan and it was made quite clear to all concerned that the US wanted the old European powers out of Asia. There was tension between the US and Britain in their commercial, political and military policies in Asia and it was clear to everyone that there was a degree of discomfort in the relationship between them. The US was not acting as a lackey-offspring of imperial Britain and the much-derided parent was at pains to convince the world that it had not fallen to a position of subservient dependence on its powerfully independent offspring. Japan knew also that the Vatican had lobbied hard to gain US involvement in an alliance with Germany against the Soviet Union and that there was a powerful isolationist lobby at work in the US. It had not been given any indication that Britain and the US were working in collusion in their negotiations with Japan except to that extent that it knew that if its negotiations with the US failed and it declared war against the US, it would be at war with Britain also. Churchill had said that much very directly in his Guildhall speech. But it did not necessarily follow that if Japan was able to reach an agreement with the US and not Britain, that the US would automatically annul that agreement and go to war against Japan with Britain. If it were otherwise, the Japanese government would have had no reason to set up different codes to advise its diplomatic personnel of impending war with either Britain or the US. It could expect to go to war with Britain without necessarily having to face the United States also. This is illustrated very clearly by Churchill's dilemma and his attempted manipulation of Roosevelt and the president's reply at the same time that Togo and Tojo were reporting to the Imperial Conference. However Japan knew that if it decided on war with the United States it would automatically have to face war with both.

Japan had not developed code breaking techniques to enable it to read American and British diplomatic or military communications traffic. However the evidence from the carefully staged responses by those countries to its successive diplomatic efforts and military moves was sufficient for it to know that at least some of its traffic was being intercepted, even if it was not obvious that most of its intercepted traffic was being passed, at their convenience, between the two governments. This made it essential that there be minimum communications traffic between the Japanese task forces and Tokyo command once those task forces had been given their battle orders. That reduction in communication traffic made it harder for the Western powers to keep track of the Japanese forces and contributed to the subsequent confusion in London, Singapore, Washington and Honolulu when the attacks occurred. But although the reduction in communications was only partial it was seized upon and exploited by the American and the British authorities in the fantastic propaganda barrages which followed. In fact the concealment of intercepted messages by the United States did more to cause confusion than the reduction in traffic and the circumstances show that they were too clever by half. The US authorities were confident that they were intercepting the key Japanese communications; they thought they knew every Japanese move in advance or as it took place; they were goading the Japanese into making the first hostile move; they expected to be able to look surprised and yet be prepared to counter the Japanese actions; and as already discussed, they heavily filtered what was relayed to their commanders. This pattern is even more apparent from the events of the final days before the concurrent attacks on the American territory of Hawaii and the British colony of Malaya.

CHURCHILL'S DESPERATE NEED

On December 1 when Roosevelt returned from Warm Springs delayed Thanksgiving Day break to meet Knox, Hull and Stark he was greeted with four intercepts. In one, dated November 28, Togo advised his ambassadors that "in a few days US-Japan negotiations will be de facto ruptured. Do not give the impression that negotiations are broken off."⁴⁶³ Possibly influenced by that, Roosevelt told Halifax that in the case of a Japanese attack on British or Dutch territory "we should obviously all be together" and if Japan attacked Thailand he would support a British move into the Kra Isthmus.⁴⁶⁴ However Churchill was still worried. He wanted a more definite guarantee than that to be confident of US backing for British initiatives. The situation in Russia was desperate. Absolutely desperate. The leading German Panzer division in the outer suburbs of Moscow was within sight of the flashes of Russian anti-aircraft guns defending the Kremlin. The opposing forces fought to the limit of endurance as the Germans edged forward, and the Russian Commander in Chief, General Zhukov, appealed to Stalin, by then back in full control and with the status of Supreme Commander, for permission to order the final reserves into battle but Stalin refused.

On December 2 the German commander, General Halder, noted in his diary that the Russian defence had reached its climax. Foreign observers, like Halder, believed a Soviet request for an armistice was imminent and Churchill knew that if that occurred there would be concurrent drives west by the Germans and south by the Japanese. He desperately needed an incident which would draw or impel the United States into the war. There was no question that if Russia withdrew the only thing that could save Britain was direct US involvement. In such an atmosphere of uncertainty, Eden suggested that if the Japanese invaded the Dutch East Indies (to secure its oil supplies) and not British territory, the British government "should do nothing to prevent the full impact of this Japanese aggression presenting itself to the United States as a direct issue between them and the United States."⁴⁶⁵ Together with Roosevelt, Churchill certainly knew that the Japanese navy had four aircraft carriers assembled in the task forces off Formosa, even though that information had been withheld from Admiral Kimmell at Pearl Harbour, and he knew that such a task force could pack quite a lot of 'aggression.' He may not have known that six were in fact in the north west Pacific sailing towards Honolulu to provide the 'direct aggression' against the US which Roosevelt was waiting for and which would save him any more effort in engineering it. The Naval Intelligence Division believed that (at least) four aircraft carriers were in Japanese home waters, out of harm's way, but they qualified their report, saying that "intelligence cannot be entirely relied on ... (because) ... ordinary low grade W.T. may be 'spoof' designed to mislead, as we mislead [sic] the Germans before Neptune and Overlord." ⁴⁶⁶

Then on December 4 three things "swept away" Churchill's hesitation. One was the decoding of messages which indicated that the Japanese embassies in London and Washington had been ordered to destroy their cypher machines. Another was the decrypted message from Tokyo to the Japanese ambassador in Berlin indicating that the talks in Washington had broken down and that a clash with Britain and the United States could occur 'Sooner than is expected' – which Roosevelt had know about for five days, since it was handed to him in Warm Springs on November 29. The third was a "clarification" by Roosevelt to Halifax: American 'support' in the event of an attack on British territory meant 'armed support' and he would support a British pre-emptive strike for the Kra Isthmus if Japan attacked another part of Thailand. ⁴⁶⁷

Churchill was greatly relieved. He knew that he would soon get his war in South East Asia and this was the key to three 'packages.' First. The United States would be involved in that war and this would keep Japan fully occupied so that it would lose all interest in attacking the Soviet Union in support of Germany. The prospect of a Soviet armistice and the release of Germany's armies for an invasion of Britain would therefore recede significantly. Second. Once the United States was involved in war alongside Britain it could be assumed that it would also join Britain's war in Europe against Germany. Third. The fact that the United States was involved with Britain in a war against Japan would mean that it was effectively fighting against Japan's concept of a New Order in Asia based on decolonization and would, ipso facto, mean that it was defending European colonial interests and Britain may therefore be able to avoid the dismantling of its empire in spite of the American-imposed Atlantic Charter. The White Western amorphous Christian gel would still reign supreme with Britain being able to bear, and enjoy, its share of 'the white man's burden.'

An intelligence report from the Far East Combined Bureau on that day seems to have been given little attention. It noted that two Japanese aircraft carriers were in the Mariana Islands, as far east as they were ever sighted, but because they could only rely on "a motley collection of obsolete cruisers and destroyers" (like the ones Churchill had leased from the United States in return for bases) they were said to pose little danger. ⁴⁶⁸ There was apparently some degree of complacency because that report followed one from the NID to the effect that (the positions of) all know Japanese heavy naval units were accounted for.

Churchill now had his understanding with Roosevelt although it was still only verbal. It was not written, signed and sealed, but he was sufficiently confident for his war cabinet to give approval for the C in C Far East, Brooke-Popham, to order the occupation of the Kra Isthmus on his own initiative if he believed that the Japanese were about to attack Thailand. And the tone of news from Moscow changed for the better next day, December 5, when General

Guderian, commanding the leading German Panzer division, decided his troops no longer had the strength to press their attack. He defied Hitler's orders to hold ground and ordered a withdrawal of a few miles to a shorter line which he could hope to secure for a winter siege. At the same time Stalin finally approved Zhukov's counter-offensive with 700,000 reserve troops who included the divisions made available from the eastern defensive perimeter by Japan's decision not to invade the Soviet Union. And Britain, supported by corresponding declarations from Australia, New Zealand, Canada and South Africa, declared war against Germany's three circumstantial minor partners in the war against Russia: Hungary, Roumania and Finland which had been caught as the meat in the sandwich of great power play. [See chapter 23.]⁴⁶⁹ Britain's declaration was, in a sense, a token gesture, but it had to show that it was prepared to act to maintain access to a supply port for northern Russia. Talk of a Russian armistice ebbed somewhat and Hitler had the task of holding his battered forces together with enormous supply lines stretching across the frozen wastes. But Churchill was still left trailing Hitler in the alliance stakes that day, nine days after the Japanese task forces were seen to be assembling at Formosa, when a formal treaty binding Germany, Italy and Japan was agreed to by each of the parties. [That treaty actually took effect on December 11 following Hitler's declaration of war against the United States in a speech to the Reichstag and the expulsion of the American charge d'affaires.]

That night, Friday, December 5 at 8.40 pm Hawaiian time, a radio operator at Station H intercepted a transmission from Admiral Shigeyoshi Inoue, commander of Japan's Fourth Fleet in the Central Pacific, informing his forces that a declaration of war was imminent. It began: "A special message on the occasion of the Declaration of War, to all under my command." Two hours later, 10.40 pm, the transmission was repeated. On that occasion it was picked up at Station H again, by a different operator.⁴⁷⁰ Some time later, in the early morning hours, and still 24 hours before the attack on Pearl Harbour, another radio message, transmitted in two parts, was also intercepted at Station H. It was an Imperial Rescript in which Emperor Hirohito urged his officers and men to "annihilate the enemy" and which Admiral Yamamoto told his combined fleets he had received on December 2 and was passing on "prior to the declaration of war." It was intended to be broadcast 24 hours prior to the declaration of war and the attack but, due to a mix up on the flag ship it was broadcast early and thus repeated two hours later at the intended time, 4.45 am on Saturday, December 6 Hawaiian time.⁴⁷¹ The repeat broadcast was also picked up. In fact the broadcast was intercepted a total of seven times and four of the intercept reports were taken by chief radioman Kisner, together with his analysis, his daily report and intercepts of the Inoue broadcast, to the Station H Cryptology centre at 1 pm that day. Rochefort had taken the weekend off and Dyer was again deputizing for him. Kisner's bundle was placed on his desk with the war warning intercepts on top. They were never passed on to Kimmel. Dyer later claimed that it was a matter of overwork and under staffing.⁴⁷²

The opportunity for an effective warning, defensive manoeuvres and an aerial response to the bombing attack was therefore fumbled. Some might suggest aborted. There was no question of the air force at Honolulu being scrambled for a long distance pre-emptive strike against the Japanese fleets. That was specifically ruled out by Roosevelt's instruction that American forces were not to strike first in any circumstances. Japan had to be permitted to strike first to be labelled as the aggressor and to generate public support in the United States for a declaration of war. But surely a defensive alert was another thing. And there is another question: if those messages were picked up at Honolulu and the broadcasts were beamed to fleets in South East Asian waters as well, were they picked up at the other US regional bases? And if so, why were those intercept reports not acted on? It is well established that the other bases were intercepting and processing messages during the previous twelve days since the Japanese fleet was ordered to sail.

The intrigue deepens in view of the fact that one of the messages which was delivered to Dyer in the same bundle was one which Morimura had despatched to Tokyo through RCA on December 2 and which RCA had handed to Station H on Friday afternoon. It read: "No changes observed by afternoon 2 December. So far they do not seem to have been alerted. Shore leave as usual." That one was deciphered and translated the same day.⁴⁷³ It is reasonable to ask why that took precedence over the war warnings. Stark would have been very happy to learn that Morimura had been watching very carefully for any changes in conduct at the base. Perhaps that was the reason for the preferential treatment because, in fact, although Kimmel had an urgent and immediate need for a war warning at Hawaii, Stark and the other inner circle members around Roosevelt had little need for a warning from Hawaii. The interception and decoding systems in Seattle and Washington were working overtime and very effectively. They did not pick up or recognize the significance of everything,⁴⁷⁴ but they were working so effectively that critical messages to Japan's ambassadors which were transmitted on December 5 and 6 were on Roosevelt's table before they were decoded at the Japanese embassy and available to the ambassadors. But total deceit prevailed. They were withheld from Kimmel and Short, too. The decoy simply was not to be warned.

In the meantime, while the US Navy intelligence intrigue was being played out, a Japanese convoy was seen entering the Gulf of Thailand on the morning of December 6 (the evening of the 5th in Washington) but British naval intelligence could not track it because of cloud cover nor be sure of its destination. Therefore the C in C Far East could not justify a pre-emptive landing to seize the Kra Peninsula. Neither could he order an air strike against a fleet which could not be located. Whitehall considered giving Thailand a guarantee of support against a Japanese landing but it could not do so if its government had authorized the Japanese presence. The Thai government had certainly not asked for either a guarantee of that nature or supportive intervention and it was therefore very likely that the Japanese presence was with its approval. In addition, if Britain was to offer a guarantee it could be politically disastrous if it then infringed Thailand's sovereignty by occupying some of its territory without a call for the guarantee to be honoured, and there was evidence that Japan and its supporters in Thailand were trying to provoke Britain into such an action.⁴⁷⁵ Two could play the same game.

Also on this day, December 6, responsibility for the US atomic bomb research project was taken out of the hands of the Briggs Committee which had overseen preliminary or theoretical studies for almost two years. It was now considered a practical project and thereafter it was to be the responsibility of the Office of Scientific Research and Development, a body more appropriate to the organization and direction of a project once it reached the stage of practical development and implementation. That evening, at 8 pm Washington time, (10 am on Sunday 7 in Tokyo) Roosevelt authorized the despatch of the message to Emperor Hirohito, via Grew, which had been prepared on November 28, as a last resort, or as an ultimatum – or as a cynical exercise in national self-aggrandisement for domestic and international propaganda. Writing as President of the United States he said:

The people of the United States, believing in peace and in the right of nations to live and let live, have eagerly watched the conversations between our two governments during these past months. We have hoped for a termination of the present conflict between Japan and China. We have hoped that a peace of the Pacific could be consummated in such a way that nationalities of many diverse peoples could exist side by side without fear of invasion; that unbearable burdens of armaments could be lifted for them all; and that all peoples would resume commerce without discrimination against or in favor of any nation. [He then closed with a request to the Emperor] Give thought in this definite emergency to a way of dispelling the dark clouds.⁴⁷⁶

It was as if he was trying to emulate some of the papal encyclicals of the recent past in his disregard for historical accuracy and in his use of innuendo. It was as if Commander Perry had never ‘visited’ Japan and as if the US did not have grossly discriminatory anti-Japanese immigration policies; and its reference to commerce without discrimination was a reference to Britain rather than Japan in a shallow bid to maintain the mirage that the US was happy to compromise and share the resources of South East Asia with Japan. The message never reached Hirohito. Grew met Togo and requested an audience with the Emperor but it was too late. The action had already started. It sits in the records as a classic example of political hypocrisy. Four years later some politicians would grasp the coincidence of events to try to justify one of history’s most dastardly deeds by claiming that America’s decision to proceed with development of the bomb was taken on the eve of it being drawn into the war by Japan and in anticipation that it would be required in that war. However, as we have seen very clearly (chapter 22), the motive behind the initial approach to Roosevelt was to enable the development of a weapon which could be used selectively to eliminate Hitler and his leadership group before they could implement their anti-Semitic policies throughout Europe. The motive behind the decision to authorize work on it was the opportunity to develop a weapon which would enable the first country in possession of it to dominate the world economic and political scene by virtue of unchallengeable military capacity. Japan was not an immediate consideration.

Next day, December 7, the C in C Far East advised London that a pre-emptive occupation of the Kra Isthmus was no longer an option and that even though there was a squadron of torpedo-bombers at Kota Bharu, near the Thai border, it could not operate surveillance flights because of the weather, he therefore had no idea where the Japanese fleet was, and there was no way he could intervene to prevent an attack or a landing.⁴⁷⁷ They were closer than he realized. The first

Japanese landing of the war began early on the morning of Monday, December 8 (late at night on the 7th, Washington time) not at Bangkok or on the Thai section of the Kra Isthmus, but at the British base of Kota Bharu. Britain's war in South East Asia had started and Churchill was reasonably assured of United States intervention in that region. But there was certainly no guarantee that Roosevelt would use that Japanese attack on a British colonial territory as the opportunity, or the justification, to declare war on Germany. He was waiting for his own 'incident' to justify such an action. This was of real concern in London because the new Chief of the Imperial General Staff, General Sir Alan Brooke noted in his diary on the 6th and 7th that he had spent hours in meetings discussing with his colleagues "all the various alternatives that might lead to war and trying to ensure that in every case the USA would not be left out." But Roosevelt would not have to wait long for his incident: only a couple of hours. He had been alerted on the afternoon of December 6, that a very important Japanese message had been decoded and would be delivered to him that evening.⁴⁷⁸

'DECENT PEOPLE' DON'T STRIKE FIRST

That message was the second in a series of four which were sent from Japanese Foreign Minister Togo to Ambassador Kichisaburo Nomura which, together, constituted a final reply to the United States for its manipulated negotiations and a declaration of war. The first or 'pilot' message was a guide to those which would follow. The second was the bulk of the reply to the US position. The third was, in effect, the wording of a declaration of war. These two messages were to be carefully checked and properly prepared ready for presentation to the US Secretary of State. The fourth message contained the time when the ambassador was to deliver the prepared reply. The second, the substantial part of the message, was intercepted at Seattle about 3 pm Washington time on Saturday the 6th. It was recognized, retransmitted by teletype to Washington for decoding, translation into English, and personal delivery to the president who had been alerted about 4 pm to expect it sometime during the evening. He received it at 9.30 pm, read it and considered it in about fifteen minutes, then turned to his confidant Harry Hopkins (a former secretary of commerce) and said "This means war." According to the officer who delivered the message, Lt. Schulz, Roosevelt and Hopkins talked for about another fifteen minutes and neither mentioned Pearl Harbour, but Hopkins expressed concern that since war was coming at Japan's convenience "it was too bad" the United States could not strike first to offset the element of surprise. In response Roosevelt said, in effect, "No, we can't do that. We are a democracy and a decent people," then, raising his voice, "But we have a good record."⁴⁷⁹

Before Schulz left the room at 10 pm Roosevelt tried to contact Stark by phone but, being told that he was at the theatre, decided to wait. He said he didn't want to cause public disquiet by having a senior naval officer paged in a theatre! Over the next three hours several senior officers were located and shown the message, but none had the authority, without directions from Stark, Marshall or the president himself, to contact Pearl Harbour or any other base to issue a war warning. Stark arrived home at midnight and discussed the matter with Roosevelt by phone, but no action was taken.⁴⁸⁰ For reasons which are not very convincing Marshall did not receive his copy until 11 am on Sunday, December 7. By that time the third and fourth parts of the message had already been in Roosevelt's hands for an hour and the president was simply waiting to be advised that the Japanese Ambassador had called on Hull as instructed in the final part. We are left to assume that Marshall was not aware of that. However, instead of picking up the scrambler phone to talk to either Roosevelt or Short in Honolulu, after some procrastination, and having declined the use of the Navy's more powerful radio transmitter, he hand wrote a message for normal Army radio transmission to commanders at each of Panama, Manila, San Francisco and Hawaii. It was transmitted in that order. When the Army radio signal was found to be too weak to reach Hawaii Marshall did not change his mind and use the Navy's powerful radio. The message to Short was sent via Western Union land line to San Francisco from where it was retransmitted to Honolulu by RCA's commercial radio link. Those manoeuvres were in sharp contrast to the efficiency with which the Japanese intercepts had been handled.⁴⁸¹ By the time Short received it, bombs were falling. In a display of coincidental bizarre and naive incompetence the responsible radar supervisor at Honolulu did not even raise the alarm when his operators located unprecedented waves of aircraft moving towards Pearl Harbour. He later justified his inaction by saying that he presumed they were US aircraft returning from reconnaissance.⁴⁸²

The third part of Togo's message to Ambassador Nomura was intercepted at Seattle a few minutes after 3 am Washington time on Sunday, December 7, and the fourth about 4.30 am. By about 5 am (11.30 pm Saturday night in Honolulu) they had both been sent by teleprinter to Station US in Washington. Before 7 am, having been translated from Japanese to English, they were placed ready for the arrival of the principal translator, Lt. Commander Kramer, and McCollum about 7.30 am. Two hours later, about 9.30 am, after some discussion about the fact that only Stark and Marshall could issue war warnings, and after Army intelligence was alerted to the stated deadline, Kramer left to deliver copies to the White House, and McCollum left with a copy for Stark. Roosevelt's copies were handed to him in his bedroom by Beardall a little after 10 am. Part three read:

Obviously it is the intention of the American Government to conspire with Great Britain and other countries to obstruct Japan's efforts toward the establishment of peace through the creation of a new order in East Asia, and especially to preserve Anglo-American rights and interests by keeping Japan and China at war. This intention has been revealed clearly during the course of the present negotiations. Thus, the earnest hope of the Japanese Government to adjust Japanese-American relations and to preserve and promote peace of the Pacific through cooperation with the American Government has finally been lost.

*The Japanese Government regrets to have to notify hereby the American Government that in view of the attitude of the American Government it cannot but consider that it is impossible to reach an agreement through further negotiations.*⁴⁸³

Part four read:

Very important. Will the Ambassador please submit to the United States Government (if possible the Secretary of State) our reply to the United States at 1:00 P.M. on the 7th your time.⁴⁸⁴ [Emphasis added.]

Roosevelt read both parts and made no comment on the 1 pm deadline. Beardall later testified that: “I had no sense that he was alarmed.” Roosevelt and Hopkins lunched together in the Oval study at 1.15 pm and bombs began dropping on Pearl Harbour a few minutes later, at 7.53 am Hawaiian time.⁴⁸⁵ The strategy of the McCollum Memorandum had worked. A short time later Kimmel and Short each received the tardy advice which had been withheld from them so deceitfully and cynically for political purposes.

Roosevelt did not immediately make direct contact with Churchill and, according to Churchill’s memoirs, the first advice he received of the attack on Pearl Harbour was a brief item in the BBC news a little after 9 pm while the US Ambassador Winant and Averell Harriman were dining with him at Chequers.⁴⁸⁶ Churchill immediately asked for a phone call to Roosevelt, they were connected within minutes, at about 4.15 pm Washington time, and Churchill asked: “Mr. President, what’s this about Japan?” Roosevelt replied: “It’s quite true. They have attacked us at Pearl Harbour. We are all in the same boat now.” Churchill’s response was: “This certainly simplifies things.” There was an assumption by both leaders – and Winant and Harriman – that the two countries would now proceed into war together.⁴⁸⁷

Churchill was determined to make it as easy as possible for both Roosevelt and the American people. He immediately gave instructions for the severing of diplomatic relations with Japan, and for the Commons to meet next day. He instructed Craigie to advise the Japanese Government “that a state of war exists between our two governments;” members of the War Cabinet were “informed” of the actions he had taken; and next morning he despatched a letter to the Japanese ambassador in London in the same terms as his instructions to Craigie and on the basis of the Japanese landing in Malaya. He made no mention of the attack on Pearl Harbour or the other US bases.⁴⁸⁸ With all arrangements having been made in advance the Commons met at 3 pm on Monday, December 8, (10 am Washington time) and unanimously confirmed the government’s actions before Congress had met to hear Roosevelt.

During the evening following his conversation with Churchill, Roosevelt conferred with Congressional and military leaders for several hours and decided that next morning, December 8, he would ask Congress to declare that a state of war existed between Japan and the United States. He chose his words very carefully. He did not say that he would ask that Congress declare war against Japan. It would appear that this was one of the arrangements made in advance: that Churchill and Roosevelt would use the same words, noting that a state of war already existed and not making a declaration of war. The president prepared a rough outline of the speech he intended to make but then, before retiring, he invited his Coordinator of Information, William Donovan, and the CBS radio newsmen, Edward Murrow, to join him for supper. According to Donovan Roosevelt’s “overriding concern” was public reaction to the attack. He asked both men whether they thought the attack was “a clear case of a first Japanese move that would unite Americans behind a declaration of war against the Axis powers.” The question was phrased in the plural. “Axis powers,” not “Japan.” They both said they thought it would indeed have that effect. He then quoted from a message which he had received from a British Foreign Office official that “the dictator powers have presented us with a united America” and rephrased his question: “Would America now support a declaration of war?” Donovan and Murrow affirmed that it would.⁴⁸⁹

The loss of life, casualties and devastation at Pearl Harbour were horrific. Without any opposition the Japanese bombers had a field day which they did not expect. They were expecting strong defence and counter attack but the US military aircraft were lined up on the airfields of the Naval Air Station on Ford Island and adjoining Wheeler and Hickam Fields, to guard against sabotage, and very few became airborne. Most of the damage to the battleships was inflicted in the first 30 minutes of the assault. The Arizona was completely destroyed and the Oklahoma capsized. The California, Nevada, and West Virginia sank in shallow water. Three other battleships, three cruisers, three destroyers, and other vessels were also damaged. More than 180 aircraft were destroyed and US military casualties totaled more than 3,400, including more than 2,300 killed. In contrast the Japanese lost an unconfirmed number of planes, variously reported from 29 to 60, from the 360 which were launched from six aircraft carriers, five midget submarines, perhaps one or two fleet submarines, and fewer than 100 men.⁴⁹⁰

However strict control was maintained over the information which was available to the media and although the magnitude of the disaster only gradually filtered out that did not prevent demands being made by politicians for information on the message interception system and the circumstances in which Pearl Harbour could be caught so totally unawares.⁴⁹¹ Rigid censorship was placed on all naval and army intelligence procedures, all intercepts were classified top secret and locked in Navy archives not to be made available for research, and the screen of secrecy was so effective that much of the detail which is now available was concealed from successive Congressional investigations and prominent critics of the strategy adopted by Roosevelt were persuaded not to pursue their demands in 1945–46 on the basis that it could be prejudicial to US foreign relations, especially as it was the occupying power in Japan.⁴⁹² Extraordinary measures were taken to induce one senior officer, Colonel Rufus Bratton, to change his incriminating testimony about the delivery of the critical December 7 messages to General Marshall.⁴⁹³ Even after President Carter directed the release of extensive archives in 1979 the most sensitive material remained concealed. It was not even available to another enquiry in 1995 and in 2000 some files still remain classified.⁴⁹⁴ Much has only been unearthed as the result of the passing of Freedom of Information laws and relentless and diligent research by people among whom Robert B. Stinnett must surely be one of the most eminent. The information now available is such that many histories and commentaries on the Second World War written as recently as the early 1990s require heavy revision to avoid their continuing use as apologia for the Western Alliance.

So: on December 8, 1941, the world woke and waited with baited breath to hear words of wisdom and inspiration flow first from Churchill and then Roosevelt. They could not know that while they waited the first one thousand Jews to be “processed” in gas chambers were going to their deaths at Chelmno, a village in the Lodz region of Poland. Nazi officials responsible for the liquidation of the 250,000 Jews remaining in the occupied territories were required to find ways of disposing of them to make way for the Germans being brought in to settle the area. Herding them into concentration camps to be worked to death or to be slaughtered piecemeal was too slow. As already noted, it had been decided that the gassing method which had been applied in the euthanasia program to which the Catholic Church objected (see above, this chapter, pages 69 to 76) would be much faster, more convenient, less traumatic for the Einsatzgruppen – and even “more humane” for the victims. Chelmno was selected as a good site because a disused castle stood in the middle of a large camp isolated from the general public but well served by transport from the major district cities and towns. Everything was got in readiness on Sunday the seventh for a start on the morning of the eighth. The Jews who had been brought to the camp, mainly from the town of Kolo, were told they were to be sent to work in Western Poland, or Germany, but that first they would shower and be given a change of clothing. Thus by the time Churchill rose to address the Commons several hundred victims had already been marched into the castle to a “washroom,” told to strip, and been crammed into a van ninety at a time. The exhaust from the van engine was fed by pipe into the closed van ... and the screaming stopped within a few minutes. The bodies were then driven to a pit in the camp, stripped of gold teeth and rings, dumped and covered. A full day’s work was about twelve or thirteen vans. Nazi officials agreed it was a big improvement on previous ‘solutions.’ These were not the first Jews to die systematically by gassing, but it was the formal start of the new program of mass extermination. At Buchenwald experiments and planning had been in progress for at least a couple of weeks to improve the efficiency of the methods which had been used in the euthanasia program. This is confirmed by a letter from Dr. Friedrich Mennecke to his wife, dated November 28, in which he expressed pride in having improved the speed of pre-gassing administration.⁴⁹⁵ And the killing efficiency of the program improved greatly when chemical gases were introduced at the bigger death camps for which planning was only beginning.⁴⁹⁶ Hitler’s Nazis had finally shown that they could dispose of Jews more efficiently than anyone before them – much more efficiently than Russian in the days of the Tzar, or even Croatia’s Vatican-backed Ustashe.

A NATION BROUGHT TOGETHER

The Chelmno death squad had probably finished work for the day by the time Congress heard Roosevelt’s “Day of Infamy” speech and voted to declare war against Japan – in line with the proposal which the president had told his inner circle the previous evening that he would make. There was only one dissenting vote. However Congress did not vote to declare war against Germany also. Britain was therefore still in limbo. Donovan and Murrow’s expectations were somewhat astray. But under strong diplomatic pressure from Japan that he should act on his commitment and join battle with the United States, Hitler soon solved the problem for both Roosevelt and Churchill. That evening, the US having made its declaration, he ordered the German Navy to attack American shipping wherever it was found. However the new situation caused him some serious problems in his push for Moscow. He now accepted that he could not prepare for action on additional fronts and reinforce the German armies encircling Moscow to enable them to renew their stalled 'final charge' for the Kremlin at the same time. He therefore ordered a change from offensive to defensive operations for the winter period.

The new situation also caused Hitler some minor inconvenience in the implementation of the 'Final Solution.' Key Reich officials had been summoned to meet on December 9 to be briefed on the plan and to begin putting it into effect. Now they were required elsewhere to prepare directives made necessary by the entry of the United States directly into the war games. The 'Final Solution' conference was deferred for a few weeks, but not action in line with the policy. The slaughter was stepped up in all occupied areas and on the 10th Himmler issued orders that the euthanasia program was to be reintroduced as well, with inmates of concentration camps who were unfit to work being sent to the nearest site where there was a carbon monoxide chamber for disposal. Then on December 11, three days after Pearl Harbour, both Germany and Italy declared war against the United States. Roosevelt was relieved of the need to argue his case. Congress, voting unanimously, returned Hitler's compliment. The nation had been brought together and Roosevelt's tough political decisions could now be taken. Churchill was very relieved. The America First committee promptly dissolved and urged its members to support the war effort. On December 16 the full extent of American losses at Pearl Harbour was revealed through the national media by Navy Secretary Knox, and Admiral Kimmel, the scapegoat, was relieved of his command and demoted to rear admiral.

Knox told the world that the Japanese planes came from aircraft carriers and had the "most tremendously detailed" information of the naval layout at Pearl Harbour.⁴⁹⁷ The implications were either that the Japanese had used deception and espionage to obtain such detailed information, or that Kimmel had been derelict in his duty in supervising security at the harbour, or that leaks may have occurred, or all three. However, as we know, Roosevelt had received a copy of the plan which Morimura had transmitted and which had been intercepted in the British system and relayed back to US intelligence. Furthermore, while it was withheld from Kimmel the president used that intercept to do a deal with RCA to improve the US interception rate; orders were given to ensure that Morimura was neither 'tipped off' that his transmissions had been intercepted nor inhibited in his work; and when Army Intelligence was asked to provide an analysis of the importance of his intercepted plan it was discredited by Brigadier General Sherman Miles as a standard intelligence practice and nothing more than "chitter chat." (See page 80, above.). It is therefore simply not credible that Knox, the key naval link in the president's inner circle, had not been party to the exercise which Roosevelt had embarked upon with respect to that map. Political honesty was still a matter to be honoured in the breach, just as it had been in ages past – especially in the Anglo-American conduct in World War I and in Chamberlain's dealing's behind his cabinet's back in 1938–39.

The implications of the United States' entry directly into the war, instead of in a support role for Britain, were very important indeed. The McCollum Memorandum strategy had worked and, as a result of Japan being enticed into the attack on Pearl Harbor, the previously divided United States had entered into the global struggle and the probability of Britain being defeated in war had receded way into the background. So had the probability of the United States having to face a trans-Atlantic attack from Germany. Some people could rejoice, but the world would pay an enormous price – several thousand American service personnel who had served as decoys already had – and the propaganda bosses knew no bounds in their exploitation of the myth of Japanese culpability and depravity. How else could Roosevelt and the US recruiting machine explain such a horrendous start to the war? But in addition, the British strategy to entice Japan into a confrontation with the United States had succeeded in relieving the pressure on the Soviet Union with which Britain and the United States were both, reluctantly, in an uncomfortable relationship of mutual support. This helped to provide the much needed breathing space for Britain which would not have to face an immediate onslaught on its own as long as Germany was embroiled in the war to its east.

Few people except an occasional opposition politician paused to question the morality of what had been done or the motives behind it, and, being in opposition, they didn't count. The white American majority's self-understanding of moral and national superiority was no less firmly ingrained than the corresponding self-understanding of other White Anglo-Saxon Protestants: WASPs. It was therefore natural that they accepted the thrust of Roosevelt's comment to Hopkins that "We are a democracy and a decent people ... but we have a good record," and the validity of the message which Roosevelt had finally despatched to Hirohito. The people of the United States, believing in peace and in the right of nations to live and let live, have eagerly watched the conversations between our two governments, hoping for a termination of the present conflict between Japan and China and that a peace of the Pacific could be consummated so that many diverse peoples could exist side by side without fear of invasion, with the unbearable burdens of armaments lifted for them all, and that all peoples could trade without discrimination against or in favor of any nation.

Because of the pace of events and the trauma in which the world was floundering no one noticed the coincidence and the significance of three developments. In the space of less than 48 hours:

- consideration of an atomic bomb had moved from being a matter for theoretical evaluation to a production project;
- Asia's want to be relieved of the oppression of white Western colonialism had moved from a Japanese plan for a zone of economic cooperation to a dramatic retaliatory assault against each of the contemporary colonial powers; and
- the Jewish Question had moved dramatically from the realm of political and religious debate to practical genocidal extermination with the opening of the first mobile mass gassing chamber.

The Scourge was at work. The Night Journey was well underway.

In the Scriptures We solemnly declared to the Israelites: "Twice you shall commit evil in the land. You shall become great transgressors."

And when the prophecy of your first transgression came to be fulfilled, We sent against you a formidable army which ravaged your land and carried out the punishment with which you had been threatened.

Then We granted you victory over them and multiplied your riches and your descendants, so that once again you became a numerous people. We said: 'If you do good it shall be to your own advantage; but if you do evil, you shall sin against your own souls.'

And when the prophecy of your second transgression came to be fulfilled, We sent another army to afflict you and to enter the Temple as the former entered it before, utterly destroying all that they laid their hands on.

We said: 'Allah may yet be merciful to you. If you again transgress, you shall again be scourged. We have made Hell a prison house for the unbelievers'. (The Qur'an sura 17: 3–8) ⁴⁹⁸

In terms of that simple statement, the trigger for the fulfilment of the prophesy of the Night Journey was the transgression by the Zionist authorities and settlers in Palestine against their Palestinian Arab neighbours as they tried to force the establishment of a Jewish Homeland in accordance with Britain's Balfour Declaration. But it is not as simple as that. There is plenty of Biblical justification and subsequent prophetic justification for the Jews to want to return to Palestine. Maimonides provided the most important and clear cut of those in the CE. In the Mishneh Torah, The Laws of Kings and Their Wars, he reviewed Talmudic teaching and commented on the appointment of kings, their responsibility in war, the future resettlement of Eretz Yisrael, relations between Jews and gentiles, the Jews' obligation to teach gentiles the seven key commandments, the re-establishment of the monarchy, and the future Messianic Age. (See chapter 8.) But against that, there is a Biblical and moral obligation for them to share that land with their neighbours. Ezekiel, often regarded as the most influential prophet of the period of the Babylonian Exile, is quite explicit on this point. Having laid down guidelines for the way in which the land should be apportioned between the tribes after their return from exile, he then said:

You are to share out this land among yourselves, between the tribes of Israel. You are to divide it into inheritances for yourselves and the aliens settled among you who have begotten children with you, since you are to treat them as citizens of Israel. They are to draw lots with you for their inheritance, with the tribes of Israel. You must give the alien his inheritance in the tribe in which he is living – it is the Lord Yahweh who speaks. [Ezekiel 47:21–23 Jerusalem translation.]

The words used to describe residents other than the returning Jews, and their status, vary from one translation to another: "the aliens whom reside among you ... shall be ... as native-born sons of Israel" (Revised Standard Version); "the strangers that sojourn among you ... shall be ... as born in the country" (King James); "the immigrants who permanently reside among you ... shall be ... regarded as native-born children of Israel” (Modern Language); and “the foreigners who live among you ... are to be considered citizens and have the same rights your own children have” (Living Bible). However the intention is perfectly clear. Everyone who was already there when the Israelites returned, whether they were there before the exile or arrived and settled during the exile, were to be treated as equals in every way. There was to be no discrimination, no torment, no abuse, no brutal conquest and certainly no killing or expulsion. Without attributing the comment to anyone, the writer of the introduction to the Book of Ezekiel in the Jerusalem Bible says of Ezekiel: “By his visions, he stands at the source of the apocalyptic tradition; for his spiritual penetration, he has been called ‘the father of Judaism’.”⁵⁰⁰ The Israelites returning from exile in Babylon in the fifth century BCE certainly took him seriously. Subsequently, after being scattered again at the time of the Roman destruction of Jerusalem in the first century CE, the Jews maintained their vigil as a community of faith, demonstrated enormous continuing confidence in Yahweh, and tolerated oppression of great magnitude which we have traced over a long period. Thus there is no reason why those Jews who returned as a consequence of oppression in Christian Europe in the twentieth century CE should not have acted on the basis of Ezekiel’s teaching – except that they had become so enculturated by the amorphous Christian gel and so accepting of the dominant and oppressive colonial practices imposed under the gel that they saw it as normal practice and it took precedence over the standards of their own religious heritage.

In any case they did transgress as a community of faith in a manner which no one envisaged because they had been in no position to transgress against anyone at the time of Muhammad’s ministry and, in the immediate sense, that transgression triggered the trauma of the Night Journey or the Holocaust. On the other hand, as our history has shown very clearly, it was circumstantial transgression and the challenge of the Night Journey, or the Holocaust, was an even greater challenge to the Christian Church to reassess its self-understanding and its messianic theology than it was to the Jews.

The church had failed to recognize itself, its amorphous Christian gel and their conduct as the model and the main subjects – or the target – of the parody of Mein Kampf. It had failed miserably to put its house in order. And it had also failed to act on the role and the obligation which it believed had fallen to it because of the perceived failure of Judaism. That obligation was to guide humanity towards a clearer understanding of its relationship with God or to enable humanity to reach that understanding. It had rejected and sought to put down a series of challenges to rethink its self-understanding and its theology which we have traced since even before it became established as an instrument of state. Those challenges had become progressively stronger and stronger during that long period. But in addition it had continued to pile burdens on humanity and to put stumbling blocks in the way of those it was supposed to be helping. Those burdens and stumbling blocks included: a fantastic load of canon law in spite of Jesus’ stinging criticism of the scribes and Pharisees on exactly that ground (Matthew 23;13–32); the burden of restrictive social teachings; the barrier of priestly authority between humanity and God; the support of oppressive authoritarian regimes; and the concurrent support of Capitalist economic and social policies, giving them what was represented as exclusive divine blessing, regardless of the exploitation of people and resources.

But in addition it has made its most divisive and contradictory theological concept preeminent in its armoury for evangelism. This concept has made rapprochement with Judaism and Islam unattainable, has led to the denigration of every other faith as inferior and inconsequential and has led to communal conflict on an ever expanding scale. The concept? That personal salvation is achievable only through belief in Jesus Christ as God and Saviour. That belief, when it is linked to the idea that one is saved simply by an expression of faith, by regular participation in particular sacraments, or by adherence to a book of canon law, places the pursuit of personal salvation through defined belief above personal conduct and responsibility. In doing so, it undermines humanity's capacity to understand the absolute authority of God, the basis and the nature of Divine judgement, and the essentials of Gospel teaching. It is a direct consequence of its Trinitarian doctrine and its evolved self-understanding. But, worse: that belief is not consistent with belief in the absolute authority and capacity of God to exercise influence and ministry through whom or by whatever means God may determine. This led to the rejection of both the divinely inspired ministry and challenge of Muhammad and all Qur'anic expressions of prophesy, and the continuing role of the Jews and the possibility of further prophetic inspiration. Thus its self-imposed inability to recognize the validity of either the Qur'anic Night Journey or Maimonides' understanding of the circumstances of the Messianic Age prevented it from recognizing the relationship between them and their pending interaction. It then failed to see three other things. First, that Hitler was the vehicle for a parody rather than the author of a book of ravings. Second, that the parody was a warning of another challenge through the interaction of the two prophecies. Third, that the coincidence or interaction of the prophecies confirmed that all three of the Abrahamic faiths are instruments in the exercise of divine will and judgement.

So: on December 8, 1942, the names 'A Bomb', Pearl Harbour and Chelmno were about to be etched deep into the pages of human history. But no one noticed that all three developments were a consequence of reactions against things which had been done over a very, very long period by people of the amorphous Christian gel within the self-understandings which had grown out of the teachings and attitudes which the church had evolved on the basis of its Trinitarian doctrines. If some people did notice, they were either not in a position to do anything about it, or they did not want to acknowledge it. They were caught in the whirlpool of the parody of Mein Kampf. And the world crisis of horrendous proportions had been brought to a head by the determination of the amorphous Christian gel to keep a firm grip on the people and the resources of Asia, to prevent the expression of other cultural values, and to prevent the development of competing or alternative systems of community organization and economics. This therefore is an opportunity to briefly review the situation as the powers of evil, Gog and Magog, took the field with their full teams.

WHO WAS INTERESTED IN THE JEWISH QUESTION?

By the time of Pearl Harbour, reports had begun to reach the west of Hitler's mass atrocities in Russia and other occupied or cooperating countries, and of the shooting of hostages, but neither the British Government nor the pope spoke out. In fact, in mid December, barely a week after Pearl Harbour, the British government refused to allow 769 Jewish refugees from Rumania on the small and totally unseaworthy Struma to land in Palestine or to travel overland from Istanbul where the vessel had docked for emergency repairs. Subsequently, when the Turkish Government tired of playing host to the ship with its uninvited guests and ordered it to sea on February 24, 1942, it sank with the loss of all except two of its passengers.⁵⁰¹ The government was therefore still influenced by the need to play down atrocities in order to lend credibility to its reporting. It had to play down the Jewish question in particular in order to avoid a backlash against its war effort and accusations of sheer hypocrisy for its refusal to accept refugees. It could certainly not do a 'beat up' on atrocities in the countries from which it refused to accept refugees. The pope's excuse for silence was that if he were to protest it might jeopardize the situation of German Catholics.⁵⁰² In reality his refusal to intervene was totally consistent with the Vatican's formal diplomatic recognition of, and support for, the ghastly Ustashe regime which Hitler had set up with its program of oppression and slaughter of Jews in Croatia coupled with rigid controls on who could seek protective membership of the Catholic Church through baptism. That was just across the border from Rumania. But in addition, if he had spoken out it would have called into question one thousand six hundred years of anti-Jewish programs by the Vatican and required him to defend them. If he did defend them, how could he attack either Hitler or Stalin – and continue to claim papal infallibility? Yet again, the church's self-understanding based on its Trinitarian doctrine would have been under challenge.

However when Hitler announced Germany's declaration of war he compensated for the reticence of both the pope and Churchill with copious references to the Jewish question and "the full diabolical meanness of Jewry rallied around this man [Roosevelt]," and there was another person who was also quite happy to be heard on the Jewish question, from his particular perspective: the former Grand Mufti of Jerusalem, Haj Amin el-Husseini. The attack on Pearl Harbour was only one of six attacks on Allied bases that day in the opening round of the war in the Pacific but the coincidence of timing – some would call it fate – that the Chelmno mobile gas chamber came into use the day after that traumatic attack swept aside all opposition in the United States to participation in the war. The pious pretext for commercially inspired neutrality was shattered and the New Israel was shaken from its perch into the cauldron of conflicts of Gog and Magog. It was a ludicrous situation. It was the paradox par excellence. The country which saw itself as the paragon of corporate Christian principles was paired with the nation which saw itself as the paragon of national Christian principles, Great Britain, and another which was hell-bent on challenging the concept that economics and government had to be linked with religion, Soviet Russia, against the country whose leader and his paradoxical writings and alternative regime constituted an equally direct challenge to the self-understanding and doctrines of the Christian church, together with the country which was the home base and a most reluctant prop for the dominant un-reformed portion of the church, Italy, plus another which dared to challenge the domination of those paragons of Christian principles, Japan.

But because of the national trauma which Pearl Harbour generated within the United States it also ensured that whether the original justification for the development of the atomic bomb was still relevant or not, the bomb would be used in anger. And Chelmno was just the first of the series of units purpose-built for Hitler's settlement of the Jewish question which would so shock the world that it become the trigger for a radical change to Western Christian attitudes to the Jewish question – even if it failed to trigger a new understanding of that question. The guilt complexes which Hitler's methods precipitated then underpinned Western Christian support for the establishment of the State of Israel and ensured that if 'the final solution' was not sufficient to generate a fresh look at messianic theology, then the ensuing phase of the trouble in the triangle, commencing with the establishment of the State of Israel, certainly would be. The major issues in human affairs – race and communal relations, the morality of exploitation and domination, love, hate and religious self-understanding – were being exposed for all to see. Each was an ingredient for the cauldron of conflict which was bound to boil and splutter with progressively increasing violence until the real issues are resolved. So the war of Gog and Magog progressed, and because of the way it was triggered the leaders and people of every major religious faith had become involved. It was a war without precedent. This leads us to the question: was the pause for reflection between June 22, 1940, and December 7, 1941, put to good use, or was it simply taken as a pause to regroup? The answer is now self evident.

When we look at the facts which are available on the public record (and there are a lot of records and decisions still not released), and when we strip away the posturing, the misrepresentation and selective reporting for propaganda purposes, it becomes apparent that Hitler wanted, and expected, a peace agreement with Britain which would enable him, by coercion and negotiation, by annexation, or by military invasion, to achieve his linked primary objectives of 'breathing space' (pseudo colonial expansion to the east), the elimination of Jewish influence in Europe, and the elimination of Communism as a political and social system. He was a product of the amorphous Christian gel with a typically distorted sense of history, he had no better understanding of the trouble in the triangle than his counterparts in any segment of the triangle, but he had some sort of visionary understanding that he was (within an Augustinian understanding of predestination) at the centre of events of eschatological significance and he had delusions about his 'messianic role.' He had never concealed his belief that Jewish influence had to be eliminated. Nor had he concealed his intention to achieve that objective. From January 1939 and his emotional outburst on the subject when he realized that his plan to force total emigration by heavy handed coercion was being undermined, he talked of genocide. However he had not planned it nor tried to implement it until July 1941, by which time he had clearly given up hope of coercing total Jewish emigration. It was then that he gave orders for genocide to be put into effect but it was not until December, coinciding with Pearl Harbour, that the emphasis shifted from the long established (traditional?) methods of brutal individual or community slaughter, as proposed by Professor Vosa Cubrilovic at the Serbian Cultural Club in March 1937, less than four years earlier, (chapter 20, p. 33) to the practical efficiency of mass gas chamber slaughter that the world was shaken from its complacency. Even so it was still some months before the program was fully operational.

It is therefore clear that there was a point during the pause up until which the genocide program could have been avoided if Britain had been prepared to negotiate a peace agreement with Germany. But it also becomes clear as we consider the alternative scenarios for such a peace agreement that the Jewish community – and that basically means the Zionist Organization for this purpose – would have had to be a party to the agreement. And so do other issues. Such a peace agreement would have been of an interim nature and it may not have avoided the eventual escalation of the war because it would not have resolved the basic issue of the trouble in the triangle – the self-understanding of the church based on its Trinitarian theology. Ultimately it is this issue which has to be confronted and this still requires the collaborative reassessment of messianic theology which would not have been achievable in the super-heated religious atmosphere of the time. The basic requirements for the kind of peace agreement which Hitler had been offering and pressing for would have been:

- British and Russian agreement to 'breathing space' for Germany by the reduction of the small countries of central Europe, and a slab of Russia territory as well, to the status of colonies, dependencies, or annexed territories;
- the immediate emigration or repatriation of all Jews from those territories;
- the control of the church throughout those territories under coercive concordats of the Vatican-German model;
- the agreement of other countries to accept all of the Jewish refugees involved;
- the acquiescence of the United States in such arrangements; and
- a secret treaty of non-aggression with Britain, (or some such), to enable Hitler to wage war with Soviet Russia in due course to determine the political question.

The cut-off point to Britain's 'window of opportunity' for such a peace agreement was probably the early days of Hitler's invasion of Russia in June, 1941, rather than either the earlier date of September 10, 1940 when Churchill rejected Hitler's 'final' peace offer or the later date of the instruction for the planning of genocide, six weeks after the invasion of Russia began. This is because, having expressed support for Hitler at the expense of Russia, the Catholic Church would have supported a territorial settlement in Germany's favour because it was eager to gain control of the church in the region by that means; and the Japanese move into South East Asia, by courtesy of Hitler's puppet, Vichy France, was also an accomplished fact. By mid July, when the genocide planning was ordered, the British-Russian alliance against Hitler was set in deeds instead of words and, (not withstanding the contradictory deals which the powers had been entering into and breaking; its action against the Bolsheviks at the end of the Great War, and the subsequent 'cold war'), Britain would have found it extremely difficult to reverse its position to do a Munich-type deal with a piece of Russian territory or to justify entering into a non-aggression pact with Germany aimed against Russia. Considering that former President Hoover expressed surprise when Churchill rejected Hitler's 'final offer' of a peace settlement in which the British Empire would have been left intact, it is unlikely that the US would have stood in the way of such a settlement.

Among the implications of such a settlement would have been:

- the acceptance of continuing German imperial sovereignty by each of the occupied countries but, considering that they were already occupied, they would have had little option;
- a major change in the balance of power world wide, with greatly increased German influence;
- the expectation of German demands for the return of some or all of its former overseas colonies in due course and a further weakening of Britain's position;
- the continuing domination of much of Asia and Africa by the European powers in one form or another, unless Germany and Japan collaborated to break the pattern;
- a significant rise in the population and influence of Jews in a range of countries overseas, almost certainly accompanied by a sharp rise in the level of anti-Semitism, unless the church was persuaded to change its self-understanding and its attitude to the Jews remarkably quickly.

However the most important factor in the outcome of such an agreement would have been the response of the Jewish community and the opportunities or the manner of their emigration or evacuation from Europe. Several possible scenarios can be recognized and we can identify some of the implications of each of them.

1. That they agreed to leave Germany and the occupied territories promptly for any country offering refuge without the Zionist demand for a Jewish homeland or state.
2. That they agreed to leave Germany and the occupied territories promptly for any country offering refuge but retained the Zionist demand for a Jewish homeland or state in Palestine.
3. That they agreed to leave Germany and the occupied territories promptly for any country offering refuge while also accepting the long-standing opportunity to develop an autonomous Jewish State of BiraBidzhan within the Soviet Union, or accepting resettlement under the Fugu Plan.
4. That they were refused any resettlement opportunities and could not leave Germany and the occupied territories.

The first, agreeing to leave without Zionist demands, would have extended the history of Jewish expulsions and therefore consolidated the belief in some sections of both the Jewish and non-Jewish communities that such was to be their perpetual lot. It would have continued the 'tradition' which had been imposed by the Christian Church and its associated powers ever since the beginning of the Christian Era that it was the proper role of the Jews to be pushed around the Diaspora to demonstrate that they had been rejected by God and succeeded by the church as the sole earthly representative and arbiter of God's will. In doing so it would have satisfied the ego of the Catholic Church and encouraged it to continue even more strongly down the path of arrogant anti-Semitism, anti-ecumenism, the continued development and imposition of dogma, the pursuit of Ultramontanism and the hunt for concordats. It would have deepened the gulf between Rome and the Reformed Churches but it may have prompted them to look more closely at Karl Barth's theology of the fate of the Jews and therefore at the theology and the self-understanding of the church. For the majority of Jews it would have demonstrated that nothing had really changed and while it may have killed immediate Zionist plans it certainly would have stimulated Zionist aspirations in the long term, and strengthened their demands for the future consideration of a national home for Jews. Therefore, in political terms, while it would have relieved the pressure on Britain in the Middle East for the time being, it would have bottled up that pressure while the relative influence of Jews increased in countries in which they settled, and it would have been ready to burst out at some critical future point.

Second, agreeing to leave, but retaining Zionist demands for a Jewish state in Palestine, would have met with strenuous opposition from the Palestinians and their Arab neighbours. It would almost certainly have resulted in an immediate war in the Middle East in which Britain would have been embroiled in action in support of the Jewish State, and Britain's strategic interests would have been in turmoil. A whole host of religious questions would have come tumbling out for very public scrutiny and church-sponsored anti-Semitism would almost certainly have reached new depths.

Third, agreeing to leave occupied Europe but also accepting the opportunity for an autonomous Jewish State in the Soviet Union's Birobidzhan region, would have left the Zionist community divided while satisfying some of its aspirations. It would probably have deferred a crisis in the Middle East for Britain, and it would have strengthened the position of the Soviet Union, but it would have further antagonized the Nazis and the Catholic Church while making a non-aggression pact between Britain and Germany aimed against Russia unacceptable. It would have also brought into sharp focus all the questions about the relationship between Christianity, Judaism and Communism, and dredged up more anti-Semitism as well.

Fourth, being refused any opportunity for resettlement, would have simply encouraged Hitler to bring forward his decision on genocide. Britain could not possibly have remained aloof, sheltering behind the terms of such a peace agreement, and the war would have re-commenced, with great ferocity. In due course the churches and their relationship with both Britain and Hitler, their self-understanding and their relationship to other faiths would have come under even harsher scrutiny than after the Great War. The issues of Zionism and Jewish self-understanding would have become a preoccupation throughout the Diaspora, and Palestine, the role of the church and Britain's strategic interests in the Middle East would have come into immediate focus as the centre of the trouble in the triangle.

It is now apparent that if Britain had entertained any of these scenarios as the basis of a peace agreement with Hitler, the first is the only one which could have resulted in a reasonably stable peace. However, in reality Churchill could not negotiate around any of them and he must have realized this. He could not offer the first for two reasons: the world had shut the gate on substantial migration and he had to be prepared to put all of Britain's cards on the table, expose its position of weakness for all to see, and appeal directly to the world for help with emergency settlement; and the Zionist Organization had insisted that the gate to Palestine be left open. Churchill could not offer the second because the Arabs had insisted that the gate to Palestine be shut. He could not offer the third because the Zionists had rejected both the BiraBidzhan and Fugu plans. But, in addition, Hitler was unlikely to permit mass emigration to Russia because it would have strengthened that country's position, and Britain was just about to go to war with Japan. And finally, Churchill would not offer the fourth out of personal conscience. Therefore he had to reject Hitler's overtures whether he wanted to or not. [See above, pp. 20 and 26; 'Peace Party' contacts and Hess' flight to Britain.]

These considerations meant that, in effect, scenario four was selected by default and Hitler thereupon issued his instructions for genocide. The Zionist Organization must accept some of the responsibility for this because of its insistence that Palestine had to be the focal point of any resettlement plan. But again, because of the processes which we have traced at length and the Church's erroneous self-understanding, policies and actions based on its faulty Trinitarian theology, it is the amorphous Christian gel which must shoulder the bulk of the responsibility. Unfortunately not enough people recognized the coincidence of the twin prophecies of Muhammad and Maimonides and the challenges which these involved. The opportunity for reflection and a change of direction during the pause – the calm before the storm – which could have avoided the genocidal phase of the Holocaust and led smoothly into the vital reassessment of theology was therefore lost. The world was locked into the experience of the Night Journey. The next question was: how long would it take for the world to recognize its significance, for the church to reassess its self-understanding and its relationship with God and to act responsibly? Regrettably it would be a long haul.

GOG AND MAGOG REGROUP

On December 7, 1941, Christian Europe's war suddenly became the whole world's war. In one sense it was a war of new orders and old orders. In another sense it was a war of new movements, ideas or ideologies, and old movements, ideas or ideologies. And yet the new orders, movements, ideas and ideologies and the old orders, movements, ideas and ideologies crossed the battle lines in a very confusing manner. The new were represented by the social, economic and political systems which each of Germany, Soviet Russia, Japan and the United States sought to impose. The old were represented by the dominant imperial systems which Britain, France and the other 'old' European colonial powers sought to maintain.

The influence of religion, or more correctly the want to reduce, harness or exploit the influence of institutional religion, was a significant consideration in each of the movements and in each of the volatile relationships as powers made and broke alliances of convenience and sought some basis to justify their actions. And while one of the new movements – Zionism – was in fact the focal point of the crisis, the leaders of each of the movements and ideologies involved in conflicting coalitions of convenience, except one, added to the confusion by their unwillingness or their inability to discuss their own policies, plans and their motives. They were thus able to turn the spotlight and keep it focused on National Socialism (Nazism) and away from the issues which had spawned each of the new movements, including both Zionism and Nazism. Thus in an all encompassing sense it was the war between Gog and Magog – forces of evil – in association with the establishment of the State of Israel and the return of the Jewish people to Zion, just as Maimonides had anticipated. Hitler, the only key player in the drama who was prepared to give vent to his distorted motives, was obligingly acting out the role of the scourge from Muhammad's vision of the Night Journey. The coincidence in time of these overlapping plots had been made possible or had been imposed on all the players by the self-understanding and the conduct of the Christian amorphous gel: the church and the powers associated with it. And the inevitable coincidence of those plots escaped attention because each of the three partners in the triangle of Semitic Messianic faiths was only concerned with its particular interests as it perceived them at the time.

In fact it was a ludicrous situation. It was the paradox par excellence. Reduced to the simplest terms, it had six key players. Eventually, on one side would be Britain, the United States and Soviet Russia. On the other side; Germany, Italy and Japan. The country which had been drawn into the game last, the United States, saw itself as the paragon of corporate Christian principles. It would be teamed with the nation which saw itself as the paragon of national Christian principles, Great Britain, and another which was hell-bent on challenging the concept that systems of economics and government had to be linked with religion, Soviet Russia. They would be teamed against the country whose leader and his paradoxical writings and alternative regime constituted an equally direct challenge to the self-understanding and doctrines of the Christian church, together with Italy, the country which was the home base and a most reluctant treaty-prop for the dominant un-reformed portion of the church which Hitler was most intent on harnessing (the Vatican), plus another which dared to challenge the domination of those paragons of Christian principles. That country, Japan, was the only key player which was non-European and without an essentially Christian heritage.

Hitler's National Socialism was still in alliance with Christianity, as was Mussolini's Fascism, the Colonialism of Britain and France, and the New World version of Capitalism of the United States. Even Soviet Communism was now happy to acknowledge its alliance with its arch enemy, Orthodox Christianity, which it had done so much to suppress. Thus the only one of the new movements which totally rejected any links with Christianity was Japan's neo-Fascist militarist movement for a Greater East-Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere. It had its own incarnation of the Divine Being in its emperor and it therefore found no place for another incarnate god imposed by European colonizers. As far as its leaders were concerned the Christian concept of an historical God-incarnate simply confirmed the validity of the Shinto understanding of God personified in a living emperor. Even the Zionist movement had to acknowledge its complex, albeit very uncomfortable, paternal relationship with the amorphous Christian gel in its bid for the recognition which it sought.

LET THE GAMES BEGIN!

In essence the war-game started this way. An anti-clerical Christian fanatic who believed that he was called to do God's appointed work because the church (which saw itself as the divinely appointed agent-on-earth of God and successor to the Jewish people) had failed in its task, declared war in the name of Christian Germany against the Jewish community and invaded a number of Christian countries in a bid to share their imperial colonial glory, or 'breathing space'. The Defender of the Faith, principal Christian colonial power and the principal promoter of the Zionist movement, Britain, had responded by declaring war against Germany together with the equally Christian France, thus forming the Anglo-French Alliance, and in collaboration with the Jewish communities of the world.

Being unable to cope without them, Britain invoked the support of its Christian dominions and essentially non-Christian colonies and territories and, in addition, some of those of its allies. Some of the non-Christian dominions and territories (including the Muslim communities of India) supported Britain, while some (including the Hindu communities of India) sought to remain neutral or pacifist. Britain had sought to recruit Italy to the Anglo-French Alliance but its leader, in a concordat alliance with the leader of traditional Christianity, decided it was advantageous to keep his powder dry and wait to see what happened in the early phase of play. Some of Britain's other territories (such as Muslim Iraq and Iran), then supported the German team – until they were later subjugated by the supplemented Anglo-French Alliance which had become the Western Alliance. Governments-in-exile of other European Christian countries which were overrun by Germany also joined the Western Alliance. Of course large and small populations of these and other religious faiths would also become caught up in due course on both sides of the conflict according to where they happened to have been born in relation to the dominant European interests, but this was basically the make up of the two teams as their masters either chose, or were forced, to go to war.

However Britain was soon in deeper trouble when France was defeated and the Anglo-French Alliance became, for a time, more or less simply the British Team. Britain then sought the support of its Christian former colonies which were grouped within the United States which had somehow proclaimed itself the 'New Israel'. Deeply divided between those pressing for neutrality, or non-involvement in Europe's war, and with both opponents and supporters of Hitler's Germany, the US sat profitably on the fence, supplying arms and services for the British Team and oil, chemicals and equipment for both sides. Then Christian Italy, (the seat of the dominant segment of the Christian church), threw its lot in with Christian Germany and its anti-clerical leader and enabled Germany to form the Axis Team and turn its guns against the complex multi-religious Soviet Union with its atheistic and oppressively anti-religious Communist government which had, like the New Israel, managed to remain aloof from either of the teams.

The result was a new alliance between the most trenchantly anti-religious, anti-capitalist government and a large part of the demonstrably Christian and capitalist world which, being both east and west had to be simply called The Allies, against the two countries most closely identified through their concordats and their leaders' statements with claims that they acted on behalf of God: The Axis.

Finally the vigorously Christian 'New Israel' was forced to join the Allies in what then, strangely, became the Western Alliance after it had successfully supported Britain by provoking Japan, the only major country in which the state religion still sought to inspire homage and allegiance to the emperor as a demigod, into attacks against both it and Britain with which it was not yet in a formal alliance. Japan was thus forced to confirm its uneasy alliance with the Christian Axis powers whose leader was definitely acting as a demigod.

Through all this the Jewish community, the object of Hitler's ire and a focal point of the complex conflict, sought the protection of the evolving Western Alliance, strenuously supported its war against Hitler, and applied enormous pressure on the key members of the Western Alliance to ensure that, in due course they would be able to achieve the national homeland which Britain had promised them. In doing so they subjected other peoples to oppression in much the same manner that they had been subjected to it over a long period and forced them into collaboration with Hitler. They were acting out their part in the preliminary stages of the Night Journey with just as much certainty as Hitler.

The two teams had thus gathered all their recruits and were ready to do battle. Gog and Magog could go to their war games. The trouble was that no one knew which was Gog and which was Magog.

THE ORDER OF BATTLE

In essence the teams to do full scale battle on behalf of Gog and Magog consisted of:

On the left

- Christians of Britain and the Commonwealth: led by Churchill, a committed Zionist who professed no religious belief, rejected the concept of predestination, and clung tenaciously to both Capitalism and Colonialism while he took full advantage of Britain's Christian establishment.
- Christians of the United States: led by Roosevelt, a professing Christian who, committed to a New Deal for ordinary people within a Capitalist framework, was vigorously anti-colonial.
- Christians of the Soviet Union led by a vigorously nationalist Russian Orthodox patriarch in an uncomfortable alliance with the Communists and in abject subordination to the state.
- Jews: under assault by Hitler but largely rejected by the Christians of both teams, and fighting even more vigorously for control of the mandated territory of Palestine.
- Muslims: in non-Arab countries, responding to European Christian colonial authority.
- Muslims of the Soviet Union, without the central organization of the Christians but also in an uncomfortable alliance with the Communists and in equally abject subordination to the state
- Buddhist peoples of several countries of Asia also responding to European Christian colonial authority.
- Buddhist and Confucian peoples of China already caught in a nationalistic conflict with Japan, and now required to provide a buffer between Japan and the European powers and America in their bid to maintain control of their Asian dominions and colonies.
- Irreligious Communists of the Soviet Union: led by a trenchantly anti-Capitalist dictator, Stalin.

On the right

- Christians of the Third Reich: led by Hitler, a fanatically anti-Semitic baptized Catholic who professed continuing allegiance with the church, accepted the concept of predestination and believed himself to have a messianic role.

- Christians of Italy: led by Mussolini, an anti-clerical, anti-Capitalist, anti-Socialist nominally Catholic Fascist who was an ally of convenience for both the Vatican and Hitler.
- Muslims: in Arab countries, in revolt against colonial rule and the imposition of Zionism.
- Buddhist and Shinto peoples of Japan for whom their emperor was the personification of a god and to whom the enforced presence of the amorphous Christian gel was an embarrassment.

Neutral and pacifist

- The Hindu community of India
- Jehovah's Witnesses in the countries of both teams

Japan's attack on all the European colonial powers of the Western Alliance in Asia plus their would-be sole successor, which is usually characterized in the West as an attack on the United States, was in fact a consequence of the long term effects of Western Christian interference in the affairs of Asia. It was a fascinating contrast to its position in the First World War when it sought to push Germany out in league with the other European powers. Japan had seen that war as the first step towards easing all of the European powers out of Asia. That first step had been successful, and now, with competition having turned the European powers inside out, Japan was in league with Germany in phase two of its bid: this time to remove all of the remaining European powers. But European interference (being a combination of Old Europe and the New Europe of America) had greatly influenced the national religious patterns of both Japan and China with which Japan was already at war. And Japan's twentieth century tendency towards 'emperor worship' was a direct outcome of the destruction of the Shogunate in a civil war which had been triggered by the meddling of those Great Christian powers, including the United States. (See chapter 15) The introduction of a new constitution to enable the nation to respond to the demands of those powers and the adoption of State Shinto in 1868 were simply reactions to all the interference. And one claimant to the leadership of China's enormous population of Confucians and Buddhists was one of the Christians who owed their positions of power to their 'understanding' with Britain and the United States.

So: the situation on December 7, 1941, should have been cause enough for the world's leaders, both political and religious, to take stock and ask "how did we get into this mess?" But they were all too intent on ensuring that they would win. And of course they would. They each had God on their side – or everyone except the Communists – didn't they? And besides that, they didn't cause the war anyway. It was that other fellow. Actually there were some writers and religious leaders in the Western Christian Alliance who were prepared to challenge that view that "it is all the other fellow's fault" and to suggest a few different approaches to achieving peace. Among them were the Anglican Archbishops of Canterbury and York, the Catholic Archbishop of Westminster and the Moderator of the Free Church who had jointly signed a letter to the London Times twelve months earlier, before the war had engulfed Asia and the Pacific as well as Europe.¹ They supported the Pope's five point peace proposal and then set out a series of points which read like a cross between the Atlantic Charter and the Communist Manifesto.

They called for the recognition of independence and equality for all nation states; disarmament to prevent the slavery of nations through military and material tyranny; an international juridical institution to guarantee agreed conditions; recognition of boundaries and the rights of racial minorities; laws based on the laws of God and justice based on "the most general expression of the Christian idea" That was a shorthand way of saying "based on Gospel teaching and not on doctrine and dogma." They then set out five points by which economic proposals might be tested: the abolition of extreme inequality in wealth; equality of opportunity for education; the safeguarding of the family as a social unit; the restoration of a sense of divine vocation in daily work; and due consideration for the needs of present and future generations in the use of resources.

But running through their letter, and most commentaries of the period, was still the deeply ingrained assumption of Christian superiority. The church had – or was – the answer for everything and other faiths had nothing to contribute and no lasting role. Their letter opened:

The present evils in the world are due to the failure of nations and peoples to carry out the laws of God. No permanent peace is possible in Europe unless the principles of the Christian religion are made the foundation of national policy and of all social life. This involves regarding all nations as members of one family under the Fatherhood of God. [Emphasis added.]

Writing soon afterwards in Diplomacy and God, George Glasgow, diplomatic correspondent for the Observer, analyzed the situation in Europe, dismissed Gandhi's call for a non-violent response to Hitler as "foolish" noted that "theoretic Christianity" does not work, and then agreed with the general thrust of the letter from the churchmen, saying: "The world is demonstrably not yet Christian in its collective behaviour, though God's purpose is equally clearly working out, slowly as it may be, to that end." ² Discussing the hypocrisy of 'holier than thou' attitudes in war he said that in Britain the general feeling of indignation against German brutality in both world wars was "a shallow and even a misguided emotion" although in a superficial sense there was cause enough for it. "The origin of international war is to be found in the fact that nations fight for their selfish material 'interests'," he said.

The nations are all of them wrong. The differences, substantial though they may be, even in a relative moral sense, and gross enough to make the cause of one side just by comparison with that of the other ... are yet irrelevant in the highest sense: ... these wars themselves take place only because no nation yet in the history of the world has pursued a truly Christian policy. The political cry "May God defend the right!" is as familiar and as honest as in its context it is essentially perverted and unprofitable.³

Glasgow then challenged the churches to face up to the reality of their disunity.

There are difficulties about the Christian religion as a unifying influence between the nations, when it cannot unify or even harmonize the body of professing Christians themselves. Therefore we have to dig deeper. The realist problem in foreign affairs is to get back to Christ: and that process cannot be started until the so-called Christians themselves go back to Christ. In other words the very beginning of wisdom towards the solution of the diplomatic problem in Europe must be sought in the religious field. Until the professed followers of Christ decide either to unite as one body and one church, or at least to abandon their recriminations and bitterness on denominational distinctions, we waste our breath when we cry for international unity.⁴

Glasgow was absolutely right ... as far as he went. At the level of Christian beliefs, actions and ecumenical relations ... absolutely correct. But he, like the vast majority of the church, saw only a part of the picture. He saw it only as a denominational issue and not one of interfaith relations and fundamental theological belief: the so-called 'Jewish question' or, more correctly, the Christian question.

GEARING UP FOR THE PROPAGANDA WAR

So the whole world went to war. As it did so, the enormity of the naval and air force losses suffered by the United States in the first strike attack by Japan and the circumstances in which they were reported to have occurred so shocked Americans that for the first time they began to think that the unthinkable – defeat – was even possible. They did not know, at that time, that in spite of its slow start America had, with Britain's help, developed extreme sophistication in message interception. They had been kept totally ill-informed about discussions with Japan and naturally they had no idea at all that their authorities knew of most of Japan's diplomatic and military traffic by telegraph and radio just as quickly as the people to whom it was directed. They could not conceive the notion that their leaders had deliberately withheld vital information from key field commanders and that their own facilities and service personnel had been set up as a decoy to ensure that Japan opened the offensive and, on that basis, could be blamed for the start of the war. Nor could they know – and they certainly did not want to be told – that their president had received an intercept of the Japanese ambassador's instructions to break off diplomatic relations, in a form which the president knew very well was a declaration of war, before the ambassador had received that instruction himself – and that he took no action. American leaders ... Christian leaders just did not act like that. They were honourable men! At least that was the way history was interpreted for them.

The Japanese Government certainly intended the enemy to get minimal warning before the initial simultaneous attacks at British, Dutch and American targets, and it had no way of knowing that 94 percent of its diplomatic traffic had been intercepted. So, when the delivery of its declaration of war was inadvertently delayed in Washington and it could not be handed to Hull until one hour after the devastating attack on Pearl Harbour had taken place, the United States was handed a propaganda coup and the most effective camouflage they could possibly have had to conceal their deception. With the sinking of Britain's Prince of Wales and Repulse off the coast of Malaya only two days after all except two US vessels had been sunk or damaged at Pearl Harbour, Japan's naval superiority in the Pacific was, temporarily, absolute. With landings in Malaya on December 8, the Philippines on the 10th and Hong Kong eight days later, the Japanese ground forces made rapid progress, aided by strong local elements whom the British and Americans regarded as 'fifth columns' but who were freedom fighters or liberators in the eyes of the Japanese and many Asians. Recognizing the threat to Britain's imperial possessions, Churchill ordered that maximum military forces be committed to India, Burma and the island fortress of Singapore.⁵ He had to. He had an especially difficult imperial relations job on his hands in Australia because the Prince of Wales and Repulse had been sent to Malaya especially to gain Australia's agreement to send its troops to the Middle East on the understanding that the dominion's defence was assured by the presence of those mighty battleships. They were not much use at the bottom of the ocean.

PLUMBING THE DEPTHS OF BIGOTRY

The situation was ready made for another round of rabid racist recruiting and propaganda to support whatever programs both sides wished to carry out. An overview of the propaganda approach is therefore useful before we pick up the threads of the action again. The Allied propaganda machine plumbed new depths. It totally ignored the fact that Japan had no designs on Australia and New Zealand and that Churchill and Roosevelt were both well aware of that. Japan's only strategic interest in those countries was whether American forces would seek to use their coastal bases for operations in South East Asia and, if so, to destroy them to enable Japan to gain unimpeded access to, and control of, the resources in the Dutch East Indies which America had denied it. The principal resource was oil.

The Allied propaganda machine beat up the idea of the inhuman way in which the 'Yellow Peril' had mounted such a secret and dastardly attack against the United States in contravention of all the proper rules and treaties of war. It whipped up fear of the 'yellow hordes' which had raped Nanjing in 1938 and which were sweeping across Asia and would certainly do the same to Australia, and it capitalized on Australia's deep seated racism, expressed officially in its White Australia Policy.

Within weeks of the extension of the war to Asia and the Pacific the Allied propaganda machine was handed just the sort of ammunition which it had been longing for to add to its exploitation of the rape of Nanjing. It was on weak ground having to rely on the Nanjing incident because it had taken place four years earlier, there were circumstances in the conflict between Japan and China which the Western Allies did not wish to admit, and it was not directly connected with World War Two. There were two key issues in the new propaganda opportunity. Each would later become the subject of war crimes investigations and trials and one would also become the centre of protracted international dispute and compensation litigation. The first issue involved two related incidents. One was the rape and murder of a number of British and Chinese nurses and volunteer aides following the capture of an emergency hospital in Hong Kong on Christmas day 1941, exactly two weeks after the Pacific phase of the war opened. The other was the massacre on Banka Island in the Dutch East Indies on February 16, 1942, of 21 Australian nurses out of 65 who had been evacuated from Singapore on February 11, four days before Singapore fell to the Japanese, and who had surrendered to a Japanese unit after their ship was sunk. The second issue was the staffing of brothels or ‘comfort houses’ for Japanese troops with women from occupied countries, under compulsion.

Hong Kong was the jewel in the British Far Eastern colonial crown and although, by international law, it was only held on lease, the government had no intention of ever vacating it. The occupation of the territory so promptly following the outbreak of war was therefore a major set back for Britain, even though it was a relatively easy target. But the naval outpost of Singapore had been touted as the key to Britain’s Far East defence strategy and, as already noted, it was the centre of controversy between the British and Australian governments. Its importance was very well recognized by the Japanese military planners and the first Japanese military forces actually landed at Kota Bharu, only 550 kilometres north of Singapore, an hour and twenty minutes before the attack on Pearl Harbour. The dramatic fall of Singapore and the taking of large numbers of prisoners of war only two months into the war – because totally inadequate provision had been made for its defence against invasion by land via the Malay Peninsula – undermined the basis of military cooperation between Britain and Australia. The commonwealth government, not being aware of Japan’s limited strategic aims, (or if it was it chose to ignore the implications of them) was fearful that Australia would come under immediate threat. Panic had already set in with the sinking of the Prince of Wales and Repulse and Australians had no confidence that Britain could assist in their direct defence.

The Australian government, bitterly critical of Churchill’s policy, turned cap-in-hand to the United States for defence support. It undertook to provide bases for American operations in South East Asia and the Pacific and, in doing so, it ensured that Australia would become a target of Japanese operations aimed at eliminating those American bases. The British government could not admit that it had misjudged both the international situation and the nature of tropical region warfare so badly. Nor could it admit that it had bungled the defence of Singapore so badly because the situation in the Middle East had become a critical pre-occupation and over-stretched its ill-planned and under-strength military capacity. It therefore had to continue to portray Singapore as the impregnable base it had always claimed it to be and, in order to explain the disaster, it chose to portray the Japanese as barbaric, sub-human, demonic, totally devoid of decency and scruple, and requiring superhuman effort and skills to defeat. How else could it explain that a force of only 20,000 Japanese, attacking at three points along the Malay Peninsula, had overwhelmed a British Commonwealth force of 88,000 troops, (15,000 of whom were on Singapore Island itself) and captured Singapore in only a matter of days after a mere 4,000 troops crossed the narrow strait between Malaya and Singapore? The situation was manipulated for propaganda in exactly the same way that the United States was exploiting its own great blunders and deceit at Pearl Harbour.

SETTING THE GROUND RULES

One of the first acts of the Allies was to prepare and publish the Inter-Allied Declaration on Punishment for War Crimes which related to both theatres of war. It is significant that during the conference which preceded the signing, the Chinese observer, Wanz King, in directing his message to Tokyo solemnly condemned the inhuman treatment of his compatriots by the Japanese and pledged that his country would ‘vindicate’ the “elementary principles of justice and morality” and deal equally with “all guilty persons” according to law, adding that the “authors” of war crimes would be held accountable for them.⁶ That conference was held after the Hong Kong incident but King’s remarks appear to have been directed at the Nanking Massacre and it is possible that at the time of the conference the details of the Hong Kong incident were not known.

Subsequently each of the situations, both Hong Kong and Banka Island, were seized upon as the basis of Allied propaganda, especially in Australia, and the Allied propaganda machine also took full advantage of the issue of religion. United States politicians and military leaders reached for their Bibles and a religious ‘revival’ began in the wake of Pearl Harbour “as men in foxholes turned to their chaplains for solace.”⁷ And Australians, the publicists said, with their superior British Christian heritage were fighting for God, King and Country. On the other hand, they said, the ‘barbaric Japanese’ were fighting to overrun Australia, to swamp it with the ‘yellow peril’ and to impose the dominance of their Emperor-god. As a consequence the United States was able to play down its dependence on Australia for bases from which to subsequently re-occupy its own colony, the Philippines, to grossly exaggerate its role as the protector and saviour of Australia, and to conceal the fact that its bases were the real reason for Japan’s drive towards Australia. It was also able to avoid debating its policy of European decolonization which had been a part of its price for supporting Britain in the war in Europe, to conceal its protracted discussions with Japan about power sharing in the Pacific Basin, to conceal its own proposal that Australia’s Melanesian colony and mandated trust territories of Papua and New Guinea might be a suitable ‘prize’ with which to reach an ‘understanding’ between the US and Japan, to conceal the importance of its own economic embargoes against Japan in that country’s decision to go to war, and to conceal its aspirations to impose its own form of economic imperialism on Asia. And in addition it was able to establish or impose a relationship on Australia which resulted (during the years following the war) in it assuming the position of influence which imperial Britain had previously enjoyed, and by linking this with the ‘Red Threat’ it was able to insist on near-sovereign rights over a series of strategic communications bases.

But as the Allied propagandists proceeded to exploit those situations with even greater efficiency and effectiveness than their predecessors had exploited the harrowing stories of inhuman German conduct in World War One, they and their political masters – some of whom were still in office – extracted a very high price from the whole world. It soon became evident that it would take even longer to overcome the disastrous effects on human relations of the hatred generated with the primary motive of type-casting a race of people in that manner. But they showed little concern. The ‘exercise’ might help them recover their colonial territories after the war. (see above, chapter 16, p. 41 ff, and chapter 17, pp. 1 ff.) Thus, when the Japanese army committed atrocities and enforced slave work conditions on prisoners of war as the tide of war turned against them, the Allied propaganda machine exploited them in a manner and on a scale that it had chosen not to exploit Hitler’s atrocities against the civilian Jewish population, the churches and political dissidents in Europe. There were two key reasons for this. Firstly, the behaviour of the Japanese armed forces provided a distraction from the Jewish question and a means of gaining support for the war from those who still had reservations about the war against Hitler’s Germany. Secondly, if the European powers were to have any chance of re-imposing their colonial rule in Asia and the Pacific after the war, against the combined influence of both Japan and the United States, then at the very least the Japanese had to be portrayed as much more inhuman than Asia’s prewar European masters.

So we return to the Hong Kong and Banka Island incidents. It was eventually established that the same officer and the same troops had been involved in both of the nurse massacres, that the officer was apparently influenced by the widespread Japanese understanding that active warfare involved only men and never women, and that women in uniform at the front line must therefore have been part of the armed forces and were to be treated no differently to men. There is no simple explanation for why he acted on a ‘no-prisoners-to be taken’ basis and massacred a mixed party of British troops and the Australian female nurses who had surrendered together. However it is known that he separated the nurses from the men who were then bayoneted on the beach, and that the women were then herded into the sea and machine gunned from the beach. There was one survivor to tell the story. It has been suggested that the officer was motivated by the ‘need’ for his troops to personally kill their enemy in ‘combat’ to establish their superiority, that he was aware of the Geneva Convention which protected nurses and non-combat women, and that this was why he separated the men from the women and sought to conceal the evidence that he had ordered the massacre of women by having them shot in the water so that their bodies would be washed out to sea. Unfortunately this will never be established conclusively. The officer, referred to as Lieutenant M.O., was eventually located in a labour camp in Siberia in June 1948 where he had been taken as a prisoner of war of the Russians when they finally entered the war against Japan. He was released by the Russians to enable him to return to Japan where he was arrested in Tokyo by an Australian Military representative to be tried for war crimes, then committed suicide in detention on September 13 before his formal interrogation began.⁸

It was also established that the decision to set up ‘comfort houses’ for the Japanese troops was a deliberate effort to reduce the problem of rape in war. The Japanese government and its imperial forces were eager to avoid a repeat of the bloody ‘Rape of Nanjing’ and massacre which had occurred during the invasion of China in December 1937 and the wave of anti-Japan revulsion which swept the world when news of the rape of thousands of Chinese women by Japanese troops was carried by the Western World’s media. A military brothel which had been set up by the Japanese commanding officer in Shanghai five years earlier, in 1932, in a bid to reduce the incidence of rape (after many Chinese women had been raped there) apparently provided the model for the general policy adopted in 1938. It can be assumed that while the primary aim of the military command in establishing Comfort Houses was to eliminate rape in the community, another aim was to reduce the incidence of venereal disease by providing a supervised environment for intercourse, and condoms were also available to Japanese troops on issue. The women who were forced to work as prostitutes in the Japanese army brothels after the outbreak of World War Two were essentially drawn from countries with which Japan was at war or which were fighting in collaboration with the Allies, and not from countries which were simply occupied in the course of the war. Thus eighty percent of the estimated 100,000 women who were 'mobilized' and treated as 'military supplies' in each theatre of the war in the Pacific were from Korea. Some women, including small numbers of Dutch nationality, were also 'recruited' in Java (a major island in the Dutch East Indies), Vietnam (part of French Indo China), China, Taiwan (a region of China), Malaya (a British colony), and the Philippines (an American colony) but it appears that most of these women were required to work locally and were in addition to the Koreans who were transported in.⁹ There was also a determined but unsuccessful bid to force another 32 Australian nurses who had been captured following their evacuation from Singapore into prostitution.¹⁰ The provision of Comfort Houses did not totally eliminate rape by Japanese troops, but in any case the forced employment of women as prostitutes in Comfort Houses was no different to rape and it was a war crime of considerable proportions. As such it was exploited by the Allies in the later stages of the war, and afterwards, to deepen anti-Japanese sentiment and war crimes prosecutions were launched.

However that is not the complete story. Japan was not the only country which had to confront the management of the male sex drive during the war. Every country has to consider the consequences of either the rape of its own women by invading forces or the rape of women by its own troops in countries which it invades – or both. Of course no country likes to admit that its armed forces are involved in rape on a large scale. The conduct of their armed forces has been ignored or camouflaged and governments, even during the twentieth century, have preferred to keep discussion at the level of sex education and avoiding servicemen bringing venereal diseases home to their families. Prior to World War One there was apparently little attempt at government intervention, except the isolation of personnel who were infected. Community attitudes based on religious teaching and the assumed conventions of male conduct resulted in little effort being made to prevent the abuse of subject women or to ensure the use of available means for the prevention and treatment of venereal disease.

In Western, Christian countries there has inevitably been an effort to idealize the role of the armed forces in a bid to perpetuate the myth that they have gone to war for only the purest of motives, to protect the national interest, to maintain peace, to provide for the 'development and good governance' of backward peoples, or to put down some foreign rogue who stood in the way of international peace. It was never for exploitation of resources or other commercial reasons, or imperial aggrandisement. The myth was encouraged that after they enlisted, men remained pure and chaste until they returned home. This was totally inconsistent with both their conduct in the field and the fact that if troops were to be effective and survive armed combat they had to be physically fit, psychologically tough, and ‘manly’ in the broadest sense of the term. Those characteristics are inevitably associated with sexuality and sexual drive, and in the modern era this linkage has been recognized, taken into account in training – and also exploited. However, during the Victorian Era, notably in England and America, increasing moral suppression resulted in deceit, clandestine activities, guilt complexes and problems of male self-understanding, psychological adjustment and marriage patterns ¹¹ which impacted on many aspects of the life of the nation. This situation was aggravated by the hardening of attitudes within the churches between the two world wars when there was a vigorous effort to reverse the trend to the perceived greater personal freedom of the “Roaring Twenties” and notably by the papal encyclicals Divini Illius Magistri and Casti Connubii, the effective prohibition of sex education, the separation of males and females in the school system as much as possible (see above, chapter 18, pp. 16 ff.), and attempts by the church to impose total sexual abstinence prior to marriage. It also involved the statutory restriction of personal and community conduct to patterns which the church approved of by means of massive criminal codes quite out of proportion to the law enforcement needs and capacity of the community. This resulted in some 85 percent of the younger male population being converted into unconvicted criminals on the basis of a literal interpretation of the law. ¹²

In Australia (and no doubt in other countries as well) the military authorities quickly recognized that they had major problems to overcome when mass recruiting began at the beginning of World War Two. Against strong opposition from church authorities, small booklets explaining human sexuality and reproduction were produced, systematic programs of sex education for enlisted men were introduced and the subject of appropriate personal conduct in war and the dangers of venereal disease were confronted. The churches feared that sex education would encourage promiscuity within the armed forces and that community moral standards would be undermined. It was also seen as a direct challenge to the Catholic Church’s exclusive social and moral teaching authority. As a result, ‘enlightenment’ and changed attitudes came only slowly and realistic measures to provide for the sexual health of troops could only be introduced progressively during 1940, 1941 and 1942. The change from a moralistic to a medical response was said by some to be excessive and rigid discipline and efforts to conceal the situation continued for some time. Some non-medical officers regarded soldiers with venereal disease as criminals and in February 1941 an isolation wing at the Puckapunyal Hospital was established as a compound under armed guard with the atmosphere of a prison camp. It was not until 1943 that preventative centres, staffed with specially trained personnel, were systematically set up in Australia, but commanders overseas were more realistic and from March 1940 special arrangements were made in the Middle East. These included educational programs and group counselling, prophylactic centres, the provision of special sporting and recreational facilities, and field treatment centres. In some areas controls were introduced and brothels were supervised to ensure that prostitutes free of infection were available and to monitor the ‘attendance’ of troops.

In Tripoli, when 13,500 troops were based there, 11,955 ‘attendances’ were monitored at supervised brothels in a 12-week period. No estimates are offered for either rape or ‘voluntary intercourse’ with prostitutes, or other women, outside the supervised brothel system. However, during that 12-week period 134 cases of suspected venereal disease were reported. That is a rate of 10 per 1,000 troops in a very short period and many of these were attributed to intercourse with women not in the supervised brothels. By the time Japan entered the war in December 1941 with its cadres of 25 to 30 carefully supervised Comfort Women per 1,000 troops accompanying its armies, the overall rate for all venereal disease infections in the Australian army was 67 cases per 1,000 troops, with the rate in the Middle East being about 82 cases per 1,000 troops. During 1942 the rate of infections among troops in Syria actually rose by some 18 per cent to about 97 cases per 1,000 troops and a senior medical officer reported that the problem of venereal disease was still serious, “especially with the Australians who appear to be either more promiscuous or more careless.” These rates compare with an estimate of 133 cases per 1,000 troops in the Middle East in 1916 and it is therefore clear that the measures which the army introduced had a significant effect. The ‘constant treatment’ rate reached a peak of 2.35 percent during the Palestine campaign in 1916 and it is quite apparent that the fighting efficiency of the army was reduced, quite apart from the social consequences of the infections for both the host countries and Australia.^{13 14} The debate about whether Japan’s system of Comfort Women was a greater war crime than the systems of male gratification implemented or permitted by the Allies is therefore not at all one-sided. The issue arose again in the period of post-war occupation of Japan. (See chapter 27.)

A GRAND ALLIANCE ... OR UNITED NATIONS?

So! The war mushroomed and the United States government and the American people smarted from the humiliation of the drubbing they suffered at Pearl Harbour. Even before the disasters of Hong Kong, Malaya and Singapore – in fact within 24 hours of learning that the United States had finally been forced into an undeclared alliance with Britain – Churchill proposed another personal meeting with Roosevelt, this time in Washington. He wanted not merely cooperation and continued aid but total coordination – virtually integration – of military and political action by Britain, the United States and the Soviet Union in which he “gladly accorded first place” to the United States.¹⁵ But the war would not mushroom quickly enough to secure Britain’s position for Churchill’s liking. On December 12, 1941, just five days after the Japanese landing at Kota Bharu and the bombing of Pearl Harbour, he quoted the Chiefs of Staff when he instructed Eden, in Moscow to liaise with the Soviet government, that a “Russian declaration of war on Japan would be greatly to our advantage, provided, but only provided, that the Russians are confident that it would not impair their Western front either now or in the spring.” He noted that the US, China and “I expect” Australia had a strong wish for Russia to declare war on Japan and raised “for consideration whether the exercise of any pressure required should be by the Americans rather than ourselves.”¹⁶

Stalin then demonstrated the same protectionist attitude which had been made necessary by Western European and Vatican covetous policies towards Russia, adopted much the same imperialist stance as the United States had towards Asia, and listed the Soviet Union’s post-war territorial demands which were to be a condition of any Anglo-Soviet Agreement. They amounted, in effect, to the restoration of the pre-W.W.I Russian Empire with a row of barrier countries as a buffer between it and Western Europe. He did not look for additional annexations. His demands, as reported to Churchill by Anthony Eden while the Prime Minister was at sea en route to the US, can be summarized thus: the restoration of independence for Austria; independence for the Rhineland, Albania, Yugoslavia (which was to receive certain Italian territory) and possibly Bavaria; Poland to have East Prussia and Czechoslovakia the Sudetenland; Greece to gain certain Aegean islands; Turkey to gain the Dodecanese and certain districts from Bulgaria and Syria; other occupied countries to be restored to their pre-war boundaries; Russia to support Britain in securing bases in France, Belgium, the Netherlands, Norway and Denmark; the Soviet Union to incorporate the Baltic States; the Finnish-Soviet frontier to be restored; Rumania to provide bases for the Soviet Union and to receive territory from Hungary as compensation.¹⁷

Formal Anglo-American talks began on December 22, and concentrated on strategies for Britain (aided by its dominions), the US and the Soviet Union to jointly reverse the Allied defeats and to gain the upper hand against the Axis. These included whether to try to entice Vichy France into the Allied camp and how this might be done without enabling Hitler to gain some pre-emptive advantage. And as much as the leaders might try to camouflage them, the tensions which the fact of wars on two sides of the globe generated were always present. This was partly because they involved different powers and related but different immediate issues, but it was mainly because the twin inter-linked wars had been brought about by different aims and motives. The alliance was therefore very much a matter of convenience and self interest. Churchill’s main concern was to defeat Germany in order to preserve Britain’s empire. On the other hand Roosevelt’s interest in the defeat of Germany flowed through the need to support Britain as a buffer against Germany, and his equal interest now was to keep his colonial grip on the Philippines as a stepping stone to future influence in South and East Asia as successor to Britain and the other European colonial powers. This made the defence of Singapore important for both of them. Thus when Churchill cabled a report to Curtin on Christmas Day he noted that the president and his advisers were “anxious to move a continuous flow of troops and aircraft through Australia for the relief of the Philippine Islands, if that be possible.” He said that: “Should the Philippine Islands fall the President is agreeable to troops and aircraft being diverted to Singapore. He is also quite willing to send substantial United States forces to Australia, where Americans are anxious to establish important bases for the war against Japan.”¹⁸ [Emphasis added.]

Then, clearly sensing the difficulties ahead, on December 24 Roosevelt grasped the initiative and proposed a Grand Alliance. This would draw together all countries which were at war with one or more of Germany, Italy or Japan, plus every country which could be persuaded to throw in its lot against Germany. Several of them were definitely not at war with Germany, but Roosevelt wanted to ensure that they were not tempted to join Hitler. They were Costa Rica, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Honduras, Nicaragua and Panama. His plan had the effect of expanding the alliance, diversifying the interests of those involved, and submerging differences in motives and aims within a bigger picture in which there could be one easily promoted aim common to all. The defeat of Hitlerism. In pursuing that course Roosevelt hoped, in part, to lay the basic foundations for one of his major post-war objectives: cooperation with the Soviet Union. Believing that the United States and the Soviet Union would emerge from the war as the world's two strongest nations, and that the American people would not consent to a post-war peacekeeping role in Europe, Roosevelt was convinced that gaining Soviet cooperation was vital to ensure post-war peace. The proviso, of course, was that the Soviet Union had given up on its aims of world-wide communist revolution which Roosevelt, along with increasing numbers of Americans, also believed to be the case.¹⁹

Churchill did not share Roosevelt's vision of the post-war division of power. He believed – or at least he told Eden in a cable on January 8, 1942 – that probably “the United States and the British Empire, far from being exhausted, will be the most powerful armed and economic bloc the world has ever seen, and that the Soviet Union will need our aid for reconstruction far more than we shall then need theirs.”²⁰ However, he and Roosevelt worked together on a draft declaration for the expanded alliance in the same way they had in preparing the Atlantic Charter and Churchill later noted that they were in full accord in principle, sentiment and language. In fact they were still in disagreement over the status of the countries of the British Commonwealth and in spite of the fact that Britain had agreed, under pressure, to the drafting of a new constitution for India after the war, Churchill wrote that “The War Cabinet very rightly did not wish to include India as a separate sovereign state” or signatory to the declaration.²¹

RINGING THE CHANGES

Clearly the United States held most of the trump cards and on January 1, 1942, when the declaration was ready for the signatures of the principal allies, four significant issues had been resolved to Roosevelt's satisfaction. The China of Chiang Kai-shek was included as an immediate signatory together with Britain, the United States and the Soviet Union; India was included in its own right in the list of twenty two other nations to be invited to participate; and a reference to religious freedom had been agreed to by the Soviet Union. Roosevelt had not forgotten the demands of his Catholic bishops conference. And the term ‘United Nations’ had been substituted for the description ‘Associated Powers’ of the Grand Alliance. The declared aims of the original signatories were simple: “to defend life, liberty, independence and religious freedom, and to preserve human rights and justice in their own lands as well as in other lands” through the defeat of the members of the Tripartite Pact and its adherents and through “victory over Hitlerism.”²² They did not realize that in using that ill-defined term to which Churchill had turned when he was struggling to express war aims on behalf of Britain they were mocking the self-understanding of the amorphous Christian gel and its accumulated sins. They simply believed they were taking the first steps towards a system of collective security through an international arrangement which would succeed the ineffective League of Nations – and prop up that self-understanding and the privileges which went with it even more firmly.²³

Before the release of that declaration the decision had been taken that the armed land, sea and air forces of the United States, Britain, the British Empire [sic., not ‘the dominions’] and Holland (in respect of the Netherlands East Indies) would be brought under a common command structure with a Supreme Commander for the South West Pacific. That command was to include the strategic bases in Northern Australia, but it excluded India and the balance of Australia – except that Churchill “procured from President Roosevelt his promise to accept responsibility and use the United States Fleet for the ocean defence of Australia, and to send upwards of ninety thousand American soldiers there ...”²⁴ And that decision was taken against the background that it had been “generally agreed that the defeat of Germany, entailing a collapse, will leave Japan exposed to overwhelming force, whereas the defeat of Japan would not by any means bring the war to an end.”²⁵ Then one of the last acts of the conference just before Churchill returned to London, was to publish the Inter-Allied Declaration on Punishment for War Crimes.

Another act while Churchill, the non-believer, was in Washington was to attend a church service on Christmas Day with the president and to speak, with him, to an enormous crowd gathered around a traditional Christmas tree in the grounds of the White House on Christmas Eve. He later wrote: “I found peace in the simple service and enjoyed singing the well-known hymns Certainly there was much to fortify the faith of all who believe in the moral governance of the universe.” [Emphasis added.] He did not try to present himself as either Christian by faith or as rejecting that faith, but he was quite happy to exploit the religiosity which is integral to the amorphous Christian gel. Addressing the crowd he referred to “the commanding sentiment of comradeship in the common cause of great peoples who speak the same language, kneel at the same altars and, to a very large extent, pursue the same ideals” while nations advance upon each other with the most terrible weapons which science can devise. “Ill would it be for us this Christmastide,” he said, “if we were not sure that no greed for the land or wealth of any other people, no vulgar ambition, no morbid lust for material gain at the expense of others, had led us to the field.” Then, talking of the children, he said “let the gifts of Father Christmas delight their play ...” and, invoking the name of God, he called for the adults to resolve that “by our sacrifice and daring, these same children shall not be robbed of their inheritance or denied their right to live in a free and decent world.”²⁶ [Emphasis added.] His sense of history, his memory of India’s colonial chains which he had so recently refused to break – including his exploitation of its people in the defence of Britain’s interests, his knowledge of the frenetic efforts being made to develop an atomic bomb, and his own non-profession of faith at the Christian altar to which he alluded all seem to have deserted him in his bid to capitalize on a touch of rhetoric. It was jingoism masquerading as patriotism and clinging limply to the religious skeleton of the amorphous Christian gel.

While its Allies were still in conference, on January 7, the Soviet Union mounted its counter-offensive against the German armies which had been virtually encircling Moscow. Bolstered by fresh troops and Allied aid shipments it was devastating. The Germans withdrew, piecemeal, with as much order as they could muster while they struggled to establish firm defensive positions from which they could hope to move forward again after the spring thaw. But the merciless Russian counter offensive in pathetic conditions which contributed to frightful losses on both sides prevented them from stabilizing the front and within two months they had forfeited, generally, about one hundred miles along the length of the front. But Hitler's parody was continuing to bring to the surface pent up tensions linked to colonial exploitation, religious manipulation and ethnic and political allegiances so, while Roosevelt and Churchill debated the words of their declaration there was significant activity in each of Europe, Asia and Latin America. The pattern of ethnic affairs world-wide was beginning to look rather like a game of 'beggar my neighbour'.

When the terms for Lend Lease supplies were finally settled, The US required Britain to agree to the elimination of all forms of discriminatory treatment in international commerce and the reduction of tariffs and trade barriers after the war. It had achieved one of its key war aims almost as soon as it formally became a belligerent. Work therefore started almost immediately in both the US and Britain on plans for new international monetary and trade organizations which would govern the new post war international economic order.

About the same time, in Asia, Thailand and Japan signed a treaty of mutual support and a few weeks later Thailand declared war on both the US and Britain. Christian missionaries from Britain and America in Japan and Japanese controlled regions of China were interned and either expelled or forced to collaborate in Japan's war effort, and Shinto was made obligatory.

In contrast, when the countries of Catholic Latin America met in conference in Rio de Janeiro all except Chile and Argentina which were anti-US, broke with Germany and, no doubt influenced by the invitation to sign the United Nations statement, formed the Inter-American Defence Board. The Office of Coordinator of Inter-American Affairs, otherwise known as "the Nelson Rockefeller Committee" was set up in the State Department, the US built bases in Panama and Brazil, set up a 'Joint Rubber Effort' on the Amazon with funds and staff from the United States and arranged for the handling of tin, copper, nitrate and other strategic materials out of Latin American mines. Trading with Japan and Italy was eliminated and in twenty one countries companies with German connections were closed, their operations 'absorbed' and their funds frozen. The Monroe Doctrine notwithstanding – or perhaps conveniently interpreted – United States domination of Latin America became a reality. It was to be reinforced relentlessly in the years following the war.

And the US was rapidly capitalizing on a new relationship with Australia at Britain's expense as a result of the fiasco in the South West Pacific. On January 23 Prime Minister Curtin cabled Churchill to say very bluntly that the planned evacuation of Singapore was regarded as "inexcusable betrayal." Australia had been led to believe that it was to be made "impregnable" and there was grave uneasiness at Allied impotence to do anything to stem the Japanese advance. Australians, having volunteered for overseas service in large numbers found it difficult to understand a situation in which "irreparable damage may have been done to their power to resist, the prestige of Empire, and the solidarity of the Allied cause." Stung by such criticism, Churchill moved quickly to ensure that Australia was kept informed on what was happening in the Pacific theatre and given a greater opportunity to influence the course of events. Pacific War Councils were set up in both London and Washington with provision for representation from Australia, New Zealand and the Netherlands, and on behalf of India and Burma.

At that time the United States was also exerting pressure to prevent the Soviet Union from gaining a foothold in the Baltic states and Eastern Europe. Aware of Stalin's territorial demands in its discussions with Britain over the terms of an Anglo-Soviet Treaty, Roosevelt urged the British to resist. Despite British attempts at formulating a compromise involving assurances of Soviet demands in the future, the US remained uncompromisingly committed to its Atlantic Charter strategy of postponing territorial settlements, necessary if the principle of self-determination was to be upheld – and if electoral support was to hold up in the US. Roosevelt did consider supporting a compromise involving the transfer of populations affected by the proposed border changes, but the State Department was adamant. Eventually the Russians dropped their territorial demands, and a purely military treaty was signed some months later, on May 26.²⁷

For the United States, which interpreted Soviet actions in dropping their territorial demands as deference to US opposition, the episode merely served to postpone the formulation of a concrete policy on Eastern Europe. But if the Americans thought that the implications ended there, they were sorely mistaken. In opposing Soviet territorial ambitions Roosevelt believed that they stemmed solely from Russian fears of a resurgent Germany, and thus would eventually just disappear once Hitler had been defeated. They wouldn't, of course, and the contrast between America's action in blocking Soviet interests and its pursuit of its own interests in Latin America and the Pacific would not go unnoticed either. The British, aware of how their earlier reluctance to grant Moscow a free hand in Eastern Europe in pre-war negotiations had contributed to the Nazi-Soviet Pact, had argued that Soviet security demands could not be met by German disarmament alone, and that Lend Lease supplies to the Soviets weren't a sufficient indication of good faith. They were right. For the Soviets, single handedly facing the bulk of the German war machine in the third devastating invasion in 130 years, the issue of Eastern Europe – the gate-way to Russia – was a crucial test of Allied attitudes to cooperation both in war and in peace.²⁸

Just why the Soviets chose to drop their territorial demands has therefore been a matter of some contention. One explanation is that Roosevelt and the Americans used the prospect of a second front as a bargaining chip. When Molotov had arrived in London in May to continue treaty negotiations with the British, Roosevelt invited him to Washington to discuss, as he wrote to Stalin, a “very important military proposal involving the utilization of our armed forces in a manner to relieve your critical western front.” According to historian John Gaddis, “the tacit arrangement soon became clear.” The Soviets would drop their territorial demands in return for a British and American promise to open a second front in 1942. Soon afterward, Roosevelt formally promised the Russian foreign minister a second front in 1942.²⁹ Others, however, have disputed such an assessment, arguing that such a strategy was never consciously pursued, and that the invitation and the pledge were primarily an effort to reinforce the Soviet war effort which at the same time might serve to take the pressure off the Soviet requests.³⁰ If that was the case, however, the effort was certainly a ham-fisted one, for it is clear that if the Soviets did not come away with the belief that a bargain had been made, they were certainly, at the very least, going to act as if it had.³¹

When the second front failed to materialize, not only in 1942 but also in 1943, the Soviets had been refused the one thing that might have fully convinced them of Western bona fides: the willingness to make sacrifices on the same scale as their own.³² But by then their armies had substantially turned the German tide and they were in a position to take what they wanted in Eastern Europe whether the Western Allies agreed to it or not, and the United States was left with the problem of resolving the tension between its twin desires for self-determination in the region and cooperation with the Soviets. Unless the Western powers could find some other way to cement the trust of the Soviet Union, one of those desires would eventually have to go.

Back inside the Third Reich, where Hitler’s lackeys were rounding up Jews as fast as circumstances would permit, the military action was not going all Hitler’s way. Rumbblings of discontent spread as Germany’s armies suffered heavy losses battling better equipped Russian troops in frozen conditions like those which had led to Napoleon’s retreat from the gates of Moscow. The number of senior officers who were prepared to risk being involved in plotting Hitler’s overthrow or assassination began to swell, while others openly defied his orders to dig in and hold the winter front, and began to plan withdrawal. Sensing that they lacked the will to carry out his plans for a new order in Europe, Hitler dismissed the Commander in Chief of the Army and assumed direct personal command on December 19, 1941, just eight days after declaring war against the United States. He was able to set his own ground rules. And far from distracting him from his Final Solution, the troubles which bore down on Hitler focused his attention on that program and increased his determination to complete what he saw as his life’s mission.

THE WANNSEE CONFERENCE

On January 20, Heydrich held a conference which was to be a key step towards the fulfillment of Hitler’s mission. It appears that after receiving his instructions on July 31, 1941 to proceed with the Final Solution, Heydrich received approval for his plan late in November because on November 29 he issued invitations for the appropriate government authorities to attend a conference on December 9. However, as already noted, the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbour and the American declaration of war on December 8 caused the postponement of that conference for five weeks. It was a very select gathering, chaired by Heydrich, with the documentation provided by Eichmann. Only fifteen people attended. They were the heads or representatives of the government and military agencies which were to actually carry out the planned mass deportation of Jews from Germany and the occupied territories to the concentration camps and extermination gas chambers which were being constructed in the east. The operation was to be conducted with brutal efficiency and the conference was required to ratify all of the measures being put in place and to adopt a list of countries, drawn up by the Foreign Ministry, from which Jews were to be deported to 'labour camps'. The list included all Jews from the Greater Reich and, on the assumption that their governments would agree to their deportation, Croatian, Slovak and Rumanian Jewish citizens who were resident in the Reich. It also included former German Jews who were then living in the occupied countries and who had been declared stateless, and Hungarian Jews employed in labour camps. The German authorities were to "proclaim their readiness" to "evacuate" the Jews of Rumania, Slovakia, Croatia, Bulgaria and Hungary, and the last two named countries were to be "persuaded" to introduce anti-Jewish legislation.

Pressure was also to be brought to bear on all other European countries to pass similar laws. The Foreign Ministry advised that no particular difficulties were expected in getting the cooperation of occupied countries in Western and South Eastern Europe. Eleven million Jews were expected to "fall away" but Eichmann made special reference to the fact that Croatia, the Catholic state that had enjoyed Pius XII's special approval, was declared a place where there was no longer a problem because "the essential key questions have already been resolved."³³ However the ministry proposed the temporary deferral of the program in the northern countries where it said there could be some "problems." The conference was advised that the transporting of Jews from the Reich and from "the Protectorate to the East" (Czechoslovakia) had begun on October 15, and that the "emigration" of 537,000 Jews from Germany, Austria and the Protectorate had been arranged prior to the ban which had been imposed for security reasons. It is not clear whether it was advised that 'small scale' gassing, at the rate of up to 1,000 persons per day, had actually started at Chelmno on December 8, using a mobile gassing van, and that limited operations had also started at Auschwitz, using Zyklon-B, in early January,³⁴ but it is reasonable to assume that it was, on the basis that even the most heartless psychologically steeled officials would find it easier to act on a program of mass murder if there were precedents and they were not the first persons to be involved.

Detailed operational planning commenced immediately after the Wannsee Conference and Eichmann despatched representatives to each of France, Belgium, Holland, Luxembourg, Norway, Romania, Greece, Bulgaria, Hungary, Poland and Czechoslovakia to negotiate the deportation arrangements. The plan received Hitler's emotional 'blessing' in his address in the Berlin Sports Palace on January 30, to mark the ninth anniversary of his rise to power. After raving and ranting against Churchill, Roosevelt, and the Russians – without discussing the plight of the German armies which were being pounded by them in the frozen fields of the Volga – he turned to international Jewry which backed them all. He returned, as expected, to his well established theme, repeating the “prophesy” which he had made in his corresponding anniversary address three years earlier, seven months before the outbreak of war.

This war will not end as the Jews imagine, namely, in the liquidation of all the European and Aryan peoples; the outcome of this war will be the extermination of Jewry. For the first time it will not be other nations who will bleed to death. For the first time we will practice the ancient Jewish law: an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth!

Indicating that anti-Semitism would spread further as the struggle widened, he added:

It will find fertile soil in every prison camp, in every family to whom we explain why, in the end, they must make sacrifices. And this world enemy, the wickedest of all times, will play his role no longer, at least for one thousand years.³⁵

When he delivered that impassioned policy speech he was not trying to conceal his intentions or his program. He just didn’t talk about figures or methods. He could have said that of 3,601 enemies of the state and other undesirables who had been shot in the Crimea in the previous six days 3,286, or 91 percent, were Jews. The hour would come, he warned, “when the most evil universal enemy of all time will be finished, at least for a thousand years.”³⁶ Only a few days earlier he had explained to some of his colleagues why the Final Solution was necessary in these terms.

At the time of the rule of the Popes, the Jews were mistreated in Rome. Until 1830, eight Jews mounted on donkeys were led once a year through the streets of Rome. For my part, I restrict myself to telling them they must go away. If they break their pipes on the journey I can’t do anything about it. But if they refuse to go voluntarily I see no other solution but extermination.³⁷

It was as if Hitler had just put aside the La Civiltà Cattolica article of September 22, 1938, in which Fr. Enrico Rosa had ‘conceded’ that “if the Jews are on our soil, they have not come to it innocently, but rather in order to take it away from us Christians, or to plot against our faith,” since ultimately “they are an enemy whose goal is to appropriate our land and deprive us of heaven ...” [see chapter 22, p. 3] Rosa had then reflected that a remedy such as “expulsion of Jews as foreigners” ... would not be possible in a generalized way, especially if it had to be applied in all civilized countries. Hitler thought he knew better. Perhaps he had privileged access to the unpublished encyclical Humani Generis Unitas which had been Pius XI’s derailed attempt to lead the Catholic Church into a new view of the Jewish Question and it was still fresh in his mind. “... many thousands of Jews [are] wandering as helpless persons from frontier to frontier as ‘a burden to humanity and themselves’³⁸ ... [and] ... this campaign [of permissible anti-Semitism] against the Jew has at least this advantage, if one can put it so, over racial strife, that it recalls the true nature, the authentic basis of the social separation of the Jews from the rest of humanity. This basis is directly religious in character. Essentially, the so-called Jewish question is not one of race, or nation, or territorial nationality, or citizenship in the state. It is a question of religion and, since the coming of Christ, a question of Christianity.”³⁹ That draft went on to say: “The Church’s ardent hopes for Jewish salvation “do not blind her to the spiritual dangers to which contact with Jews can expose souls, or make her unaware of the need to safeguard her children against spiritual contagion ... (and) ... so long must the Church use every effort to see that the effects of this (persisting) unbelief and hostility are not to rebound to the ruin of the faith and morals of her own members.” And the facts that anti-Semitism involving persecution is pitifully inadequate, utterly unfit for the Church’s task, and defeats its own purpose by producing only greater obstacles to cope with, “clearly demonstrate the need for energetic measures to preserve both the faith and morals of her members and society itself against the corrupting influence of error ...” [chapter 22, p. 25. Emphasis added.]

A BASIS OF HATRED

Hitler followed his Sports Palace performance with another hysterical broadcast on February 9 in which he declared that “the Jews will be liquidated for at least a thousand years!” The speech was printed in Rome’s Messaggero newspaper and the British minister to the Holy See, Osborne, discussed it with the Cardinal Secretary of State, Maglione, in his continuing effort to get the pope to intervene with a statement condemning the atrocities. However the responses from the Vatican confirmed that Pius XI’s bid to change the Catholic Church’s attitude to the Jewish question had been totally rejected. On February 16, the day on which the murder of Australian nurses occurred at the hands of Japanese troops at Banka, the BBC reported in broadcast on the situation in Croatia which has been described as “typical”, that: “The worst atrocities are being committed in the environs of the archbishop of Zagreb [Stepinac]. The blood of brothers is flowing in streams. The Orthodox are being forcibly converted to Catholicism and we do not hear the archbishop’s voice preaching revolt. Instead it is reported that he is taking part in Nazi and Fascist parades.”⁴⁰

During March the Vatican received a stream of reports of deportations and anti-Semitic measures in Slovakia, Croatia, Hungary, and Unoccupied France, and the papal nuncio in Bratislava commented that “deportation was the equivalent of sending a large number to certain death.”⁴¹ Among them was a substantial aide-mémoire from the World Jewish Congress and the Swiss Israelite community jointly which was sent to the Holy See through the papal nuncio in Berne. Dated March 17, it described situations much like those referred to Maglione in the August 1941 letter from the Israelite community at Altari. (See chapter 24, p. 75.) A note on Croatia read: “Several thousand families were either deported to desert islands on the Dalmatian coast or incarcerated in concentration camps ... all the male Jews were sent to labour camps where they were assigned to drainage or sanitation work and where they perished in great numbers. ... At the same time, their wives and children were sent to another camp where they, too, are enduring dire privations.”⁴²

Every indication was that Pius XI's intention in commissioning Humani Generis Unitas was being totally disregarded or even dismissed as misguided, and the representative who Eichmann sent to France was given a very good authorised Catholic base to work from. The leading Dominican theologian and neo-Thomist, Garrigou-Lagrange, a theological adviser to Pius XII and a keen supporter of Marshal Petain, was a close friend of the Vichy ambassador to the Holy See. In "an infamous dispatch" to his government the diplomat was able to advise that "the Holy See did not object to the Vichy anti-Jewish legislation" and he supplied source notes from Thomas Aquinas which had been assembled by Rome-based neo-Thomists.⁴³

Among the difficult questions which the German authorities had considered at the Wannsee Conference was the definition of a Jew, an issue which had taxed religious and political leaders before, which would do so again when the State of Israel was being established and which has done so again as recently as 1997. How were the partners and offspring of mixed marriages to be dealt with? A second degree 'Mischling' who had previously been considered as 'persons of German blood' were in future to be treated as Jewish if they were of "especially unfavourable appearance in racial terms" except that some discretion was allowed and they may be sterilized as an alternative to being 'evacuated to the east'.⁴⁴

As the impact of enforced dissolution of mixed marriages and the 'deportation' of the Jewish partner and offspring became apparent the Catholic Church became concerned. In March 1942 Archbishop Bertram intervened on behalf of all bishops, not because they underestimated the harmful Jewish influences upon German culture and national interests, but because Catholic marriage was indissoluble and other races involved in such marriage should be treated humanely!⁴⁵ And about the same time those who had been involved in the pathetic effort at interfaith dialogue just prior to the outbreak of war were stirred to rekindle their efforts. A Council of Christians and Jews was established in Britain and the Provisional Committee of the World Council of Churches strengthened its informal refugee network by establishing the Ecumenical Committee for Refugees in Geneva. That was certainly a worthy move in the circumstances of the time, but in reality everyone was missing the point then, and everyone who tries to define or classify ethnic groups on the basis of race for political, population control or welfare purposes since has also missed the point. What they were trying to do was define a basis for hatred, or a basis for exclusion on grounds which might be seen to justify hatred which had no valid basis, or, on the reverse side of the debate, a basis for privilege. When seen in that light the real issue is the self-understanding of the people who are doing the debating. And when that point is recognized the discussion should centre on understanding the basis of cultural and religious diversity.

JAPAN'S SWIFT ACHIEVEMENT

We have seen that the British Government was no different to anyone else in this regard and, with very little real help coming from the church and with the complication of conflicting recommendations coming from the various wings of the church, it was still almost totally incapable of understanding the issues involved in interfaith conflict. In the wake of both the Joint Declaration, which was becoming known as the United Nations Pact, and the dramatic Japanese successes it stirred the pot still further in its efforts to maintain control of India, where debate raged about who was less welcome: the Japanese or the British. Japanese forces had occupied Manila on January 2, then Singapore on February 15 with the capture of 32,000 Indian, 16,000 British and 14,000 Australian troops. Four days later, on February 19, Japan had struck at the Australian-American naval and air base at Darwin as part of its strategic plan to destroy American strike capacity. Next day President Quezon of the Philippines left Luzon by American submarine and Churchill wrote to Curtin about planned troop deployment. After telling him that he had to take part of the blame for the loss and imprisonment of thousands of Australians at Singapore because of his insistence that the island garrison be defended, he wrote: "Your greatest support in this hour of peril must be drawn from the United States. They alone can bring into Australia the necessary troops and air forces, and they appear ready to do so."⁴⁶ Thus, when Roosevelt ordered General MacArthur to evacuate his headquarters in the Philippines next day, February 21, and relocate in Darwin the coincidence of timing of the bombing of Darwin and the arrival of MacArthur quickly established the myth of the defence of Australia.

The fact was that the Japanese had succeeded in pushing the United States command out of the Philippines and both Britain and the US needed bases in Australia if they were going to be able to reverse the situation. When the Japanese then continued their swift sweep through South East Asia and occupied Batavia on March 9 and Rangoon on March 10, they had actually reached the limit of expansion anticipated when Japan's war aims were approved by the Imperial Conference. The Japanese government was ready to call a halt. It confidently expected that only the consolidation and political pressure phase remained. Roosevelt knew that. When he wrote to Curtin on February 20 to brief him on the forces which he was about to send to Australia as a base for service in the Asia-Pacific theatre he said: "While I realize the Japs are moving rapidly, I cannot believe that, in view of your geographical position and the forces on their way to you or operating in your neighborhood, your vital centres are in immediate danger." That was the same day that Churchill had sent his bullish letter to Curtin. And he knew, too.⁴⁷ Immediately Japan had achieved all of its basic territorial aims to enable it to rid East Asia of the European Colonial Powers, Emperor Hirohito instructed Premier Togo not to miss any opportunity to terminate the war.⁴⁸ In accordance with Japan's treaty obligations Togo thereupon summoned the German ambassador and proposed a joint approach by Japan and Germany to the Allies. Hitler declined. He wanted Japan to join Germany in its war against Russia and to concentrate its major effort towards India so that the two powers could link up through Persia, to which Hitler was then planning to drive through the Caucasus and, in doing so, isolate British interests in the Far East through a giant pincer movement in exactly the manner Britain had feared. The fact that the Axis partners could not agree forced Japan to contemplate whether it could negotiate its way out of the war on its own while Hitler pressed on with his plans.

But Churchill was pressing hard to ensure compliance with the Anglo-US war plan. Japan was not to be allowed to either hold or liberate the countries which it had occupied. If it was allowed to, its plan for a Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere would be fait accompli, US ambitions to succeed the European colonial powers in East Asia would have been totally frustrated, and Britain's imperial authority would have been in tatters. He need not have worried. Fear and loathing of the Japanese had been whipped up so effectively in Australia that it would have agreed to anything which either Britain or the United States asked for, in spite of feeling so let down by "the Mother Country."

And while Japan's flush of success had exposed disagreements between the Axis partners it also brought to the surface tensions between the British and United States governments over Britain's policy in India and whether Churchill's hard line would aggravate the overall war situation. Roosevelt wrote to Churchill on March 11 to press him to take a conciliatory line towards India. Conceding that strictly speaking it was none of his business "except in so far as it is part and parcel of the successful fight that you and I are making," he suggested the immediate establishment of a "temporary government in India, headed by a small representative group, covering different castes, occupations, religions, and geographies – this group to be recognized as a temporary Dominion Government." This temporary government which would "of course represent existing governments of the British provinces" and the Council of Princes would have a life of five or six years, or at least until a year after the end of the war, and "it would be charged with setting up a body to consider a more permanent Government for the whole country ..." Then, referring to the "travails and problems" of the United States as it moved from separate former colonies through civil war to a negotiated constitution, Roosevelt said that "some such method ... might give a new slant in India itself, and it might cause the people there to forget hard feelings, to become more loyal to the British Empire, and to stress the danger of Japanese domination, together with the advantage of peaceful evolution as against chaotic revolution." Such a move, he said, "is strictly in line with the world changes of the past half-century and with the democratic processes of all who are fighting Nazism ... [and] ... I hope that whatever you do the move will be made from London and that there should be no criticism in India that it is being made grudgingly or by compulsion."⁴⁹

INDIAN ASPIRATIONS SUPPRESSED

Churchill was more than a little displeased. He reacted as if Roosevelt's proposal was nothing more than a further step in the dismantling of the British Empire which was being pursued through the conditions which were imposed on Britain under the Atlantic Charter as a price for United States support, in the conditions for Lend-Lease aid, and in the recently drafted Grand Alliance or United Nations plan. He had good reason to be suspicious, but he was adamant that Britain was not going to be pushed out of India that easily and that the only way forward was to retain a firm grip and give as few concessions to the Indians as possible. He moved to suppress or to camouflage the disagreements and tensions as quickly as possible.

Sir Stafford Cripps was sent to India as a matter of urgency, arriving on March 22, in a bid to rally support by promising an Indian Union which would have the status of a dominion after the war. Cripps proposed that an all-Indian constitution-making body be set up after hostilities ceased; that a union be established with any province free to elect to join or not to join; that Britain's obligations under a treaty would include the protection of racial and religious minorities; and that Britain would remain responsible for 'the defence of India' until the new constitution took effect. The existing arrangements for "the defence of India" had been very beneficial to Britain. The British view was that India's "defence" included the requirement for it to provide armies to fight in Britain's wars as well, and only a few months earlier, in August 1941, Britain had relied heavily on units of the Indian Army in the occupation of Persia in the joint operation with the Soviet Union.^{50 51} In addition to gaining control of Persia's oil and the need for a southern supply route to Russia, the justification for the invasion of Persia had been that Germany might leapfrog Iraq and drive through the territory of another ally, Persia, to link up with Japanese forces in the Arabian Sea via the Persian Gulf. If that had happened one of Japan's war aims – the isolation of Britain from India and independence for India – would have been fait accompli. Britain had actually used Indian armies to suppress Indian aspirations for independence previously and it would do so again. [In addition, three years later, of the one million-strong 14th Army which was engaged in the re-conquest of neighboring Burma, the majority (600,000 of them) were Indians. They suffered 180,000 casualties, including 30,000 deaths.]⁵²

The Cripps initiative was, overall, a failure although he did receive an assurance of total war against the Japanese from Mr. Pandit Nehru, the Congress president, and of continuing support for Britain from the Muslim leader Mr. Mohammad Ali Jinnah, and on April 11 he relayed to Churchill the gist of a letter from Congress and advised that he would leave for London next day. Congress rejected the British offer mainly because it wanted immediate National Government and the scheme which Cripps carried with him provided no real change from the existing system of British control. What was required was "a new psychological approach to the people to make them feel that their own national freedom had come [and] that they were defending their new-won freedom."⁵³ Shocked at the news which reached him almost immediately of Cripps intended departure from India, Roosevelt cabled the US ambassador in London, Harry Hopkins, with an urgent appeal that Churchill soften his line and have Cripps to stay "until one more effort has finally been made to prevent a breakdown of negotiations." The president said, in part:

It is impossible for American public opinion to understand why if there is willingness on the part of the British Government to permit the component parts of India to secede after the war from the British Empire it is unwilling to permit them to enjoy during the war what is tantamount to self-government. ... Should the current negotiations be allowed to collapse because of the issues as presented to the people of America, and should India subsequently be invaded successfully by Japan, with attendant serious defeats of a military or naval character for our side, it would be hard to over-estimate the prejudicial reaction on American public *opinion. ... I feel that if the component groups in India could be given now the opportunity to set up a Nationalist Government in essence similar to our own form of government under the Articles of Confederation, with the understanding that following the termination of a period of trial and error they would be enabled then to determine upon their own form of constitution and to determine, as you have promised them already, their future relationship with the British Empire, probably a solution could be found. ...*⁵⁴

That appeal reached Churchill and Hopkins while they were together at 3 am on Sunday morning, April 12. He rejected it out of hand. When he replied later that day he used the lame excuse that he could not act on it without convening cabinet, which could not be done until Monday morning. Such a problem had never bothered Churchill before. He had ordered the invasion of a country without consulting cabinet so why should he be bothered about asking them if a special emissary could stay a few days and await further instructions? Or even, seeing that Cripps had actually left already, get a message to him at an intermediate air port and tell him to turn around and go back? Churchill even refused to raise the matter with cabinet. He wrote: "As your telegram was addressed to Former Naval Person, I am keeping it as purely private, and I do not propose to bring it before the cabinet officially unless you tell me you wish this done. Anything like a serious difference between you and me would break my heart, and would surely deeply injure both our countries at the height of this terrible struggle."⁵⁵ [Emphasis added.]

The combination of Churchill's suspicions of American motives and his determination to hang on to India as the centrepiece of Britain's empire meant that he did not adequately consider either the alternatives or the implications of the course he was taking. If the thought occurred to him that Britain might not be able to walk back into its other Asian colonies at the end of the war he gave no hint of it and he certainly excluded it from his planning options. But Roosevelt clearly understood the possibility and he was therefore locked into acting on the basis of Churchill's decision whether he liked it or not. He would either be helping Britain protect its position, or he would be securing the United States' position so that it could move in instead of Japan. He therefore needed a distraction which would draw some of Japan's effort away from South East Asia or even possibly cause Japan to stop in its tracks and sue for peace. The US solution was a direct raid on Tokyo. It had exactly the reverse of the intended effect. The raid took place on April 18, six days after Churchill rejected Roosevelt's plea to relieve the pressure in India and thus avoid any encouragement for Japan to go further. As a bombing raid it was ineffective but spectacular and it forced the Japanese war command into an immediate reassessment of its needs and its strategy.

Some eight days after the US raid on Tokyo, about April 26, the All-India Congress Committee, being unaware of the motives behind that raid or the unfolding circumstances and being affronted by Britain's withdrawal from negotiations and its insistence that British control and defence arrangements must remain in place, confirmed that it was impossible for Congress to consider "any schemes or proposals which retain even a partial measure of British control in India ...[and] ... Britain must abandon her hold in India." Even so, with real independence being the Indian objective, Nehru made it clear that the Japanese must also be resisted. In spite of all that has happened, he said, “We are not going to surrender to the invader ... [or] ... embarrass the British war effort in India.” The reactions were natural enough. Churchill held to his line that it was not a time for constitutional experiment with a trial and error approach to determine the future relationship between India and the British Empire. He maintained that: “Without the integrity of executive military control and the power to govern in the war area hope and chance alike would perish.”⁵⁶ Japan saw the Congress statement as good reason to step up its efforts to expel Britain from Asia. By the end of April the Japanese Command had completed its revised strategy plan to support its new aim to ensure that there were no US bases within striking distance of Japan itself or territories considered basic to its New Order. Having reassessed their security needs on the basis of that aim and the positions adopted by Britain and the United States they decided to extend their net to include the Aleutian Islands, Midway, Samoa, Fiji, New Caledonia and the whole of Papua and New Guinea.⁵⁷

However, instead of allowing a halt to consolidate their position while negotiations were entered into, the Japanese command let itself be provoked into immediately stretching its defensive perimeter, and the momentum of their offensive operations was promptly stepped up.⁵⁸ What they did not allow for – could not allow for – was the fact that US Intelligence services were by then even more efficient than they had been before the Pearl Harbour. They knew the Japanese naval operations plans as soon as their own commanders did. But this time they were not sitting, twiddling thumbs, waiting for the Japanese navy to strike to generate an American strike-back mentality. That had already been generated very effectively. Having read the Japanese plans and tracked their fleet, the US Navy was in place from May 3 and waiting to pounce when the Japanese fleet arrived in the Coral Sea area on May 6.

As was to be expected Churchill’s continuing hard line encouraged the Congress of India to a further show of non-cooperation with the British authorities or what Churchill described as “the total pacifism of Gandhi” who wrote in his newspaper on May 10: “The presence of the British in India is an invitation for Japan to invade India. Their withdrawal would remove the bait. Assume however that it does not, Free India would be better able to cope with invasion. Unadulterated non-co-operation would then have full sway.”⁵⁹

The consequences of the stand-off between Churchill and Congress in India, the US provocation and the Japanese response to that provocation was awesome. If Japan had not responded to the American provocation of April 18 and had concentrated on securing the area of influence which had been their aim, the war may have taken a substantially different course. But they did respond to American provocation – for the second time – and in doing so they stretched their resources too thinly. On June 4 they lost both the decisive battle for Midway and with it the capacity to control their own supply routes. Some Japanese commanders had already directed terrible atrocities against prisoners of war in the islands, with 646 POW, mainly Australians, executed in five separate incidents during the capture and occupation of Timor.⁶⁰ But after Midway, to offset the loss of supply capacity, they turned prisoners into slaves against whom they threw all the venom of impending defeat. Fifteen thousand POW died of malnutrition and physical abuse during the building of the Burma railway alone.

In adopting that policy the Japanese forfeited the high ground of anti-colonial morality to the United States and the old European powers, who took full advantage of it in the psychological war for the allegiance of the people for whom the New Order had been intended. It was a simple and convenient matter for the Western Alliance to portray the Japanese and Germans as tarred with the same brush and to whip up nationalism based on the superiority of that peculiar Western Christian ethic on which the policies of the Alliance were supposed to be based. After all, what reason did the people of the West have not to believe their leaders who kept telling them it was so?

WHY NOT ANOTHER PAUSE?

Little attention has been paid by historians to the probable wider consequences of an end to hostilities between the Allies and Japan at the point at which Japan had occupied all of the territory from which it had set out to expel the colonial powers, but the implications are enormous. It has been assumed that the assessment expressed by Churchill in Washington in January as a “general agreement” was correct: *“the defeat of Germany, entailing a collapse, will leave Japan exposed to overwhelming force, whereas the defeat of Japan would not by any means bring the war to an end.”*⁶¹ That assessment on which the war was pursued must be examined very carefully. The defeat of Japan was certain to require a drawn out war on a massive scale with ever more rabble-rousing propaganda, devastation, long term broken relationships, and the need for equally massive rehabilitation, reconstruction and reconciliation programs if the Western powers were to return – as they were determined to – and retain the privileges of colonial authority. But there was an alternative, which Japan expected: a negotiated settlement. After all, the trade negotiations which had been allowed to continue as an integral part of the provocation process right up to the outbreak of war, as insincere as they were, could have been used as a starting point or a lever in a bid to find a compromise between the complete withdrawal of the Western colonial powers, which Japan wanted, and the return to total colonial political and economic domination. Roosevelt was pressing Britain to adopt such an approach in India. Why not extend that approach across the whole region?

The possibilities of such a negotiated settlement instead of the massive extension of the war in the manner in which it was provoked must be seen against the eventual outcome of the war. That outcome, discussed in later chapters, involved the totally unnecessary use of the A Bomb and the headlong charge into the nuclear arms race, the political division of China, Korea and Vietnam, a series of regional wars involving the Soviet support of insurgents and massive anti-Communist rhetoric, an eventual end to the European colonial presence, and the need for economic reconstruction which still led to an extended period of Western economic domination. The key fact was the end of the colonial presence which had been Japan’s primary aim and the wish of the people of the entire region and, in particular, the dismantling of the British Empire which Britain had gone to war to prevent. But in addition the division of resources, which the continuation of the war in the Far East and the Pacific made necessary, resulted in the extension of the primary war in Europe, the division of Europe into Western and Eastern blocs, the need for unprecedented post-war reconstruction which enabled the United States to retain the political and economic initiative, and the skewing of the world's economic system by the introduction of practices and procedures which has enabled the exploitation of the non-Western world without the political structures of the former colonial system.

It is possible to make a reasonable assessment of what would have happened if Britain had acted on Roosevelt's proposal and if both Britain and the United States – knowing how costly and destructive the war was likely to be – had accepted Japan's occupation of South East Asia, the establishment of its Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere and the economic and political adjustments which went with it. The first series of considerations relate specifically to Asia. The second series relate to Europe, the trouble in the triangle and, in particular, the course of the Night Journey or the Holocaust.

CONCERNING ASIA

The countries which were drawn into the war when Japan extended its area of operations in response to the provocative US bombing of Tokyo would not have been drawn in.

A number of post-war crises would not have developed in the way in which they did. These include the humiliation and devastation of Japan by nuclear bombings and the immediate precipitation of the nuclear arms race.

The occupation of Japan and the consequent domination of Japan's economic and social life by the United States, and the destruction of its long-established system of ethics and community values would not have occurred.

The independence of East and South East Asia under some sort of Japanese neo-imperial umbrella would have allowed the release of the whole area from Western colonialism without the trauma of the partition of Korea and Vietnam and a series of wars of independence. The argument that these countries fared no better during their brief period of 'independence' under Japanese suzerainty than they had under the former colonial administrations is spurious. The entire period was, in reality, one of military occupation in full wartime conditions with the Western Allies pounding on the door and doing all they could through fifth columns, infiltration and propaganda to undermine stability and Japanese authority.

The end of Anglo-US supplies to China would have ensured that Japan and China would have been able to negotiate peace reasonably easily without the Western powers being present either as a cause of tension or to divide and rule. Therefore, as the dominant leadership groups of both countries at that stage were non-Communist or anti-Communist there could have been a smooth transition to a new set of relationships.

The rise to dominance of the Chinese Communist Party and the consequent crisis of the Two Chinas may not have occurred.

CONCERNING EUROPE AND THE HOLOCAUST

A negotiated settlement in Asia would have totally realigned the military powers in Europe. As we have seen, Japan was only circumstantially aligned with Germany and it was unhappy with, and did not cooperate with, Hitler's anti-Semitism and other social policies. Neither had it responded to Hitler's urging to declare war against the Soviet Union, and its failure to do so had undermined Hitler's position on his eastern front very seriously by permitting Russian armies to be re-deployed to the front against Germany. Therefore, having achieved its basic aim of removing the Western colonial powers from Asia in a negotiated settlement it would have certainly withdrawn from the Axis. That would have released all Allied forces which were occupied in Asia for re-deployment against the Axis in the European and North African theatres. The total war zone would have been compressed, not enlarged. Hitler would have therefore lost power very quickly by any of three mechanisms: defeat at the hands of concentrated superior power; a coup triggered by total disenchantment with Hitler's direction of the war; or a settlement imposed on him without the main program of the Final Solution being put into effect. The war would have ended with Hitler's armies and the Soviet armies still facing each other half way across White Russia. The questions of the future of Poland, the partition of Germany, the confrontation of Eastern and Western Blocs, the need for near-total reconstruction of major cities across Europe, and the nuclear arms race of the Cold War era would not have arisen. In addition the refugee and resettlement crises would have been of far lesser proportions, and the dismantling of Europe's remaining colonial structures – especially the British Empire – could have been approached in a much less frenzied manner.

However Britain, because of its perceived dependence on the bounties of empire, the influence of the dominant market forces of the day – otherwise simply called greed, and its self understanding as a part of the amorphous Christian gel would not let go. Neither would the United States because it was committed to supporting Britain in its major war – out of self-interest, not altruism – and because it still yearned to replace Britain in Asia and would not permit Japan the honour of doing so. Thus the opportunity for another pause or for some mid-battle negotiations was lost and the war games just had to go on with increasing fury. The superior White Western Powers had decreed that there would be no negotiation, no peace without victory. The parody of Mein Kampf had to be acted right through and the Night Journey could not be cut short. However there was a major change at that point. The war in the Far East changed from being Britain's war with Japan – with the US playing a support role – to the United States' war with Japan for dominance in Asia.

When Japan reached the perimeter of its planned zone of operations and the opportunity for a pause occurred, the peak of the Holocaust – the commissioning of the major gas chambers – was still three or four months away and Hitler's main armies were held down in the east, against the Soviet Union. If the war had ground to a halt shortly after that – between April and August 1942 – the world would have been shocked when the scale of Hitler’s atrocities against the Jews were unveiled for all to see, but the worst of the Final Solution would not have been carried out and therefore neither the Jewish community’s alarm and pressure on the United States for more vigorous intervention, nor the Zionist campaign for Palestine would have developed in the way that they subsequently did. The refugee crisis, although it would have still been very serious, would not have required the virtual complete evacuation of Jews from Europe. The pressure on Britain over the question of Palestine would not have reached the level which, subsequently, it did, and therefore Arab concerns may have been audible above the din. There would certainly have been a more temperate atmosphere and a less critical environment in which all parties involved could have considered the Jewish Question.

However it is clear that the Jewish Question – or the Christian Question – would not have been spontaneously resolved. The Night Journey had not yet gone far enough. The trauma had not yet reached a level sufficiently great for the Vatican to recognize itself in the parody of Mein Kampf – that is apparent from its conduct and the pattern of later developments in doctrine and dogma – and it would have continued its push for concordats and the consolidation of its temporal authority. Therefore, although there would have been a more stable environment in which to begin a fundamental reassessment of relationships within the triangle – and of messianic theology – that reassessment was not about to begin. The world war might have been resolved, but certainly not the trouble in the triangle. The scourge, under some other name, would have been waiting in the wings for some other combination of circumstances to bring it to centre stage.

Churchill’s words to the crowd in the White House grounds on Christmas eve are worth recalling. He referred to “the commanding sentiment of comradeship in the common cause of great peoples who speak the same language, kneel at the same alters and, to a very large extent, pursue the same ideals” while nations advance upon each other with the most terrible weapons which science can devise. “I’ll would it be for us this Christmastide if we were not sure that no greed for the land or wealth of any other people, no vulgar ambition, no morbid lust for material gain at the expense of others, had led us to the field,” he said. ⁶² [Emphasis added.] His sense of history and his understanding of the concerns of humanity-at-large had failed him.

But Stalin’s memory of how Britain manipulated religious groups had apparently not faded. If Britain had been able to use Russia’s Jewish community to its advantage at the time of the Bolshevik Revolution, then surely he could try the same trick. In August 1941 two leaders of the Polish Bund, Henryk Erlich and Wiktor Alter, were convicted of sabotage against the Soviet Union and sentenced to death, but their sentences were commuted to prison sentences and they were offered a reprieve if they would help the Soviet Union in its fight against the common enemy, Nazi Germany. The Soviet Government believed that Jews abroad, especially those in the neutral United States, could make a great contribution to the Soviet war effort. Erlich and Alter were invited to head a Jewish World Committee (also referred to as the Jewish Anti-Hitler Committee) which would be specially formed for the purpose and would operate internationally. They agreed and planning began, but in December Stalin identified them as Menshevik leaders who had opposed the Revolution. He ordered their arrest and summary execution. But apart from the question of their politics, it appears that Stalin did not favour the establishment of a major international Jewish group which, with links in the Soviet Union but not under its full control, could influence domestic politics.⁶³ However the plan was not dropped after those executions. It was simply modified. In April 1942 the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee (JAC) was established under the Soviet Information Bureau (Sovinformburo) to operate strictly as a Soviet-based organization.

JAC's chief was Solomon Lozovsky who also held the posts of Deputy Commissar of Foreign Affairs, subordinate to Molotov, and deputy chief of the Sovinformburo. Its chairman was Solomon Mikhoels. Broadly representative of Soviet Jewry, it published Aynikayt, mobilized Soviet Jews for the war against Nazi Germany, encouraged Jewish enlistment in the British and US armies, and raised millions of pounds in Britain and America in aid of the Red Army and Soviet civilians. As victory became certain the committee changed from being basically an instrument of Soviet policy and dealt with Anti-Semitism, other wartime problems and the post-war future for Soviet Jewry.⁶⁴ It survived until November 1948 when it was disbanded on the grounds of subversive links with American Zionist organizations and the campaign for the establishment of Israel, but its leaders came under scrutiny in 1943–44 because of a proposal for an alternative program. (Chapter 27) About the time that the JAC was beginning its work, seven countries of Latin America denied entrance to fugitives from Axis-dominated areas of Europe altogether, and Turkey, which provided the logical route out of the neutral Balkans, adopted a thinly veiled policy of internal racism and denied all transit rights. No doubt they had been encouraged by the earlier action of the United States in tightening visa regulations on the grounds that German agents might be traveling disguised as refugees.⁶⁵

THE BILTMORE CONFERENCE

Stung into action by the deteriorating position, especially in Europe, by Britain's refusal to relax controls on refugee settlement in Palestine, by concern that war time conditions made it impossible to hold a formal conference of the World Zionist Organization, and no doubt by Hitler's extermination speech in the Sports Palace on January 30, Zionist groups in the United States convened an extraordinary Zionist Conference at the Biltmore Hotel, New York. About 600 persons drawn from the Zionist Organization of America, Hadassah, Mizrachi and Po'alei Zion met from May 6 to 11.⁶⁶

The conference proved divisive. It polarized the American Jewish community around the issue of an exclusive Jewish homeland in Palestine, split the Central Conference of American Rabbis, and led to the formation of the anti-Zionist American Council for Judaism six months later. The Council maintained that its members were Jews by religion alone, that their religious belief made it incumbent upon them to take a universalist position, and to oppose strong ethnic bonds and Jewish nationalism. It maintained that Zionism and the concept of a State of Israel worked against the assimilation of Jews into the general American society and called into question their loyalty to the United States.⁶⁷

On the other hand the Biltmore Conference galvanized a large proportion of the American Jewish community into cohesive action to ensure that Palestine was adopted as the basis of a Jewish National Home. The tide of events in Europe, with the decimation of its Jewish community and the dispute with Britain, were relentlessly sweeping the centre of gravity of Jewish affairs into the United States. It was almost inevitable that a program adopted by the American Jewish community would be adopted by the Jewish community world wide. The radical and militant eight-point Biltmore Program called for the fulfilment of the “original purpose” of the Balfour Declaration and the League of Nations mandate, “which, recognizing the historical connection of the Jewish people was Palestine,” was to afford them the opportunity, as stated by President Wilson, to found there a Jewish Commonwealth.⁶⁸ It also called for the rejection of Britain’s White Paper, recognition of the right of the Jews of Palestine to play their full part in the war effort and in the defence of their country through a Jewish military force fighting under its own flag.⁶⁹

But it also reflected and confirmed the conviction which dominated the war aims of each of Germany, Japan and the Grand Alliance that the war was about the establishment of a new world order.

*The conference declares that the new world order that will follow victory cannot be established on foundations of peace, justice and equality, unless the problem of Jewish homelessness is fully solved. The conference urges that the gates of Palestine be opened; that the Jewish Agency be vested with control of immigration into Palestine and with the necessary authority for upbuilding the country, including the development of its unoccupied and uncultivated lands; and that Palestine be established as a Jewish commonwealth integrated in the structure of the new democratic world. Then and only then will the age-old wrong to the Jewish people be righted.*⁷⁰

Because of the need to maintain the closest possible contact with Churchill and the British Government, the headquarters of the World Zionist Organization had remained in London in spite of intense debate over whether that continuing close relationship was in the best interests of the Zionist Movement in view of Britain’s conflicting interests. The Biltmore Conference brought that issue to the fore again and Ben Gurion sought to have Weizmann removed from the office of president on the grounds that he was excessively pro-British, weak and unreliable, but American Zionist leaders rejected those accusations as baseless.⁷¹ However in spite of the controversy which the Biltmore Program triggered there was general agreement that it had progressed the cause of Zionism and that it was better to ask for more than might be achievable rather than less. In the dominant Zionist circles it was argued that other nations and ethnic minorities were pressing their claim for either independence, decolonization or both, and that the Jewish people should therefore not remain silent. The significance of the argument was to become painfully clear from 1948 onwards.

The Biltmore Conference confirmed more clearly than anything else could have that Churchill would have been quite unable to negotiate an armistice between Britain and Germany on the basis which Hitler had repeatedly proposed during ‘the pause for reflection’. [See above, chapter 28, pp. 46–48] And falling between his decision to supersede forced emigration with an extermination program, and the full scale operation of that program – when the large scale death camps were actually under construction – the conference would have also satisfied Hitler that his decision was the only way he could go.

There were other personally very influential opponents of the Biltmore Program as well as those who established the American Council for Judaism. One was Dr. Judah L. Magnes who had established the Hebrew University in 1924. Drawn into the Zionist Organization under the influence of Herzl and his supporters in Germany at the turn of the century, Magnes served for some time in the contradictory roles of Chief Rabbi of the influential Reform Temple Emanu-El in New York and honorary secretary of the Federation of American Zionists. He then took a step towards the centre ground in both theology and politics, adopting a Conservative religious position and Spiritual Zionism in place of Political Zionism. He resigned from the Zionist Organization in 1915, adopted a pacifist position, defied arrest and physical abuse as he campaigned strongly against US involvement in the war, played a prominent part in the establishment of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, and attacked the Balfour Declaration as “imperialism’s iniquitous gift to the Jewish people which ought not to have been accepted.”⁷² In 1926, two years after the founding of the Hebrew University, Magnes helped organize Brith Shalom (The League of Peace, see above, chapter 19, p. 13) to foster Jewish-Arab understanding with the eventual aim of a binational self-governing community in Palestine.⁷³ During the Palestinian uprisings of 1929, with his score already on the board, he told Lord Passfield:

*The Jews have more than a claim upon the world for justice ... but ... I am not ready to try to achieve justice to the Jew through injustice to the Arab ... I would regard it as an injustice to the Arabs to put them under Jewish rule without their consent. If I am not for a Jewish State, it is solely for the reason I have stated. I do not want war with the Arab world.*⁷⁴

Writing in the same vein at that time he said:

*Will the Jews here [Palestine] in their efforts to create a political organism become devotees of brute force and militarism as were some of the late Hashmoneans? We seem to have thought of everything except the Arabs ... If we have a just cause, so have they ... Is our nationality like that of all the nations, pagan, and based upon force and violence, or is it a spiritual nationality? The right of the Jew does not confer the right of political majority.*⁷⁵

Then, convinced that the 1936 partition plan would bring bloody war he opposed it and continued to plead for a binational state. It was therefore completely consistent with that understanding and a continuing commitment to peace and joint development with the Palestinian Arabs that, following the decision of the Biltmore Conference, Magnes set up an independent political association, Ihud, to promote discussion of the binational state plan as an alternative to the Biltmore Program. The Ihud proposal was that Jews and Arabs would live, work, vote and govern together in Palestine as a Commonwealth without partition.⁷⁶ That proposal was totally consistent with the teachings of Ezekiel and the conduct of the Israelites returning from the Babylonian Exile. [See chapter 24, p. 100] It was shortly after this that the American Council for Judaism, already mentioned, was also established.

It took a few months after the Wannsee Conference for the Final Solution to get into full swing. After Chelmno, which ‘processed’ about 70,000 persons by June 1942 and about 145,000 by the end of the year, Belzec was the next extermination centre to become fully operational and several others, including Sobibor, Treblinka and Majdanek became operational during mid to late 1942.⁷⁷ But Heydrich, the head of the Final Solution program, did not survive to witness the worst of its excesses. Appointed deputy Reichsprotektor for Bohemia and Moravia, he was lulled into a false sense of security by the success of his measures in “pacifying” the Czech population, and on May 27 two Free Czech resistance fighters who had been flown in by British Intelligence bombed and shot him while he was riding in his car without an armed escort. After he died on June 4, Gestapo officials exacted vengeance for his death by arresting 10,000 people, executing 1,300 of them and wiping out the entire village of Lidice ... and the pope expressed his displeasure at the British Foreign Office interference and the assassination.⁷⁸ It was a distraction from the ‘reality’ of his world and his efforts towards ‘peace’ in Europe on the basis of his particular understanding.

PASTOR ANGELICUS

The reality of peace as he saw it was that the popes, as successors to Christ,⁷⁹ would assume the moral leadership of the world in collaboration with governments with which it enjoyed concordats and that the “vale of tears” of the contemporary world was shadowy and ephemeral. He saw himself as the Pastor Angelicus named in ‘the prophecies of St Malachy’ and the divine commission of his position required him, or enabled him, to make the ultimate decisions in detached and timeless solitude as “the superior of all earthly kings” free from ordinary human distraction – so much so that gardeners in the papal precinct were required to hide behind bushes while the pope was walking, contemplating, in order not to distract him. Thus, at about the time of the slaughter at Lidice and while the world’s earthly powers were tearing each other apart and while the Final Solution was building towards a climax Pius XII was collaborating with the president of Catholic Action in Italy in the production of an hour-long film which he had commissioned, himself. It was for screening around the world to depict the “daily life of the Pope and how he exemplified the prophecy of the Irish monk Malachy that the 262nd successor to St. Peter was to be indicated by the name Angelic Shepherd.”⁸⁰

It is indeed surprising that Pius XII should have chosen to give credibility to ‘the Prophecies of St. Malachy’ at a time when the papacy was in a love-hate relationship with Hitler, the credibility of the church was being questioned in many quarters, and the prospect of either the papacy or the Italian government vacating Rome was under serious consideration because of the implications of an assault on Rome, one of the Axis capitals, by the Western Alliance. A bid to promote the office of the papacy as the pinnacle of Christendom and the Vatican as the seat of the world wide church in order to dissuade the Allies from bombing Rome was one thing, but to give credibility to those prophecies was quite another. The bishop of Armagh who was known by that name and who was instrumental in establishing the first Cistercian house in Ireland in 1142, in the middle of the Crusades, was canonized in 1190. But the prophecies which bear his name and which were attributed to him for a long time are now thought to have been written by a monk during the papacy of Gregory XIV, possibly at the close of the Huguenot Wars (1598) when France was regained for the Roman Catholic cause and limited toleration and financial support was granted to Protestants under the Edict of Nantes. (See chapter 10, p. 17.)

The Prophecies of St. Malachy purport to set out the future of the papacy and designate names for future popes. They are described in the Catholic Almanac as “vague, fanciful, and subject to wide interpretation.”⁸¹ The designation ‘Angelic Shepherd’ which Pius XII assumed for himself in 1942 is given in the prophecies to the 262nd pope. According to the listing of popes which the Catholic Church officially recognizes, Pope John Paul II is the 263rd Successor of St. Peter and therefore, on the basis that St. Peter is designated as the first, John Paul II the 264th pope. That being the case, Paul VI should be designated the 262nd pope and Pastor Angelicus, and Pius XII should be designated the 260th. That can be regarded as semantics and of little consequence, because if he wished, Pius XII could have designated a couple of the 37 whom the church now regards as Antipopes as legitimate. But that is not the point. In giving credibility to the prophecies of St. Malachy in the interests of his own aggrandisement and the protection of the Vatican’s interests at a time of extraordinary world crisis, Pius XII was drawing attention to, and by implication giving credibility to, the whole package. And according to those prophecies John Paul II will have only two successors before the end of the world – or at least before the end of the papacy. It is incredible that Pius XII should have chosen to take that course.

WHO WILL STOP THE FINAL SOLUTION?

By the time of the Biltmore Conference a great deal was known in the West about the nature and the extent of general atrocities being carried out against the Jews of Europe by the Nazis and although it appears that – apart from reports of Hitler’s vitriolic extermination speech in the Sports Palace in January – no firm reports of the operation of the ‘trial’ extermination centres or the construction of the major death centres which was in progress had been received, there was some further agitation for Hitler’s overthrow. Not all of it was prompted by Hitler’s assault on the Jews. Some of it was prompted, at least in part, by Hitler’s demand for absolute plenary powers which placed him above the challenge of the Reichstag and the law: powers which the Reichstag had agreed to unanimously when it was called – for the last time – on April 26, ten days before the Biltmore Conference.

In the early stages of the war the British Government had talked a lot about encouraging internal conspiracies with the aim of a coup against Hitler and it continued to support resistance groups as a means of destabilizing his regime. But as the war proceeded the government seemed to be so intent on a military victory that it was no longer interested in non-military solutions, even in the face of evidence that genocide was being attempted. But between May 30 and June 2⁸² (the day the BBC broadcast a report from the Warsaw underground about mass murder of Jews for the first time) organized resistance and conspiracy actually reached new heights in several countries of Europe. In an important attempt to establish contact with the British government, Pastor Bonhoeffer and Dr Hans Schoenfeld met the Anglican Bishop of Chichester, Dr George Bell, in Stockholm.⁸³ Bonhoeffer and Schoenfeld handed Bell a list of conspiracy leaders to pass to the British Government with a request that it make known, either by private message or public announcement, whether the allies would make a decent peace with a non-Nazi government once Hitler had been overthrown. Bell passed the message to Eden but no action was taken. Apparently Eden was sceptical at the inaction which had followed previous approaches by conspirators, even though on this occasion the conspirators were well respected people who had freely provided their names. However the discovery of his attempt – some called it an ‘indiscretion’ – later cost Bonhoeffer and a number of co-conspirators their lives.⁸⁴

However firm evidence of extermination camps was not long in coming. Some time in May the Jewish underground in Warsaw sent an account to the Polish government-in-exile in London and on June 2, after it had passed through the processes of British government censorship, the BBC broadcast a report of the mass murder of 700,000 Polish Jews. A week later that report was formally brought to the notice of each of the Allied governments by the Polish National Council in London. The BBC’s news report was then rebroadcast on June 26 – while filming of Pastor Angelicus was in progress – prompted by publication on June 25 in the London Daily Telegraph of the first of two prominent reports on the situation in Europe. The Daily Telegraph report noted that more than 700,000 Polish Jews had been slaughtered by the Germans in what it said was “the greatest massacre in the world’s history.” In the second, a few days later, it reported the use of poison gas, that the number slaughtered had passed 1,000,000 in Europe overall, and that the Nazis aim was “to wipe the race from the European continent.” Those articles were promptly reported by the BBC, drawn to the pope’s attention by Osborne, and republished by the New York Times on June 30 and July 2

The British Minister for Information was thus forced to hold a press conference on the subject and he released the Warsaw Underground’s complete report on July 10. If anything was required to do so, that action sealed the fate of those remaining in the ghetto. Then deportations from France started on the 16th, when an indoor sports stadium in Paris was turned into an internment centre for Jews destined for Auschwitz, and from Holland a few days later. The Nazis were not pleased with the results of the initial roundup – less than 13,000 when they expected 28,000. From Holland their haul was about 15,000. Reports could no longer be kept out of the press, the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Westminster, Cardinal Hinsley, one of the first public figures in Britain to do so, broadcast to Europe about the suffering of the Jews, and a protest rally was held in Madison Square Garden on July 21. Calls for the Vatican to speak up increased but the pope still chose not to intervene⁸⁵ and Hinsley quickly found that he had little support from other authorities in his own church. The person who took most notice of the Madison Square Garden protest was Hitler. The growing influence of the Jewish community in the United States impressed on him the urgency of eliminating Europe's Jews before steps could be taken to prevent it, and he ensured that deportations from the Warsaw Ghetto began next day, the July 22. He also prepared his Directive No. 45 for concurrent campaigns to capture both Stalingrad and the Caucasus. It was issued on July 23. His "fanatical determination" to pursue both campaigns against the advice of his staff in his attempt to end for all time the influence of the hated 'Jewish Bolshevism' has been described as "one of the most fateful of Hitler's moves in the war." It would soon result in Germany's most humiliating military defeat – in the very heart of Stalingrad – and that defeat would ensure that he could never win the war.⁸⁶ After that he could prolong the agony. But he could not win.

However, while the Vatican was being very accommodating to Hitler in its policy of non-intervention in both the Third Reich and the occupied countries, neither of his Axis partners were cooperating very well at all. In spite of his relationship with Mussolini, not a single Jew had been deported from the Italian spheres of occupation⁸⁷ and the Japanese were not providing the level of cooperation on the Jewish question which he had sought either. Gestapo chief Josef Meisinger therefore paid a visit to Shanghai from the German Embassy in Tokyo to arrange with the Japanese Consulate for an East Asian version of the 'Final Solution' to be put into effect. The Nazis were very disappointed that although Japan had issued orders after the Wannsee conference for the internment of all 'enemy nationals' or, as Britain had termed them, 'aliens', little had been done. The special measures for the preferential treatment of Jews arising from the Five Ministers' Conference were set aside, the Fugu Plan [see chapter 24, p. 28 ff.] was declared a failure, and all Jews were required to register and those of enemy nationality were interned – in the same manner as non-Jews.⁸⁸ But no more. The JDC office in Shanghai remained open and normal contact was maintained with Jewish organizations in New York for another four months, until May 21, 1942, when the JDC found it necessary to comply with the Anglo-American Trading with the Enemy Act.⁸⁹ To 'correct' the situation, Meisinger detailed a plan at a meeting with the Vice Consul and senior officials for all 21,000 of the region's Jews to be rounded up and disposed of. He proposed several simple options. They could be set adrift in derelict ships to starve and sink in the East China Sea; put to work in abandoned Yangtse River salt mines until they starved; or to be herded into a concentration camp on Tsungming Island to provide guinea pigs for 'medical experiments'. Shocked by what he had heard, the Vice Consul, Mitsugi Shibata, risked his life by briefing the leaders of the Jewish community and through various contacts the matter was raised with the former Foreign Minister, Matsuoka. In due course Foreign Minister Togo issued orders under the title Emergency Measures for Jewish People with the prominent directive: "Nothing shall be done to or with the Jews that might inspire 'enemy counter-propaganda'." That was the end of the matter. Japan refused, point blank, to accommodate Hitler's Final Solution.

On August 4 while Churchill was on his way to Moscow for talks with Stalin he stopped in Cairo for talks with the Chief of the Imperial General Staff, General Sir Alan Brooke. Brooke advised him that the threat from a German-Japanese pincer movement around India was now very real. That could mean the loss of the oil fields of Abadan and Bahrain and that would mean a twenty percent drop in Britain's military capacity. Therefore, in the view of the Chiefs of Staff, if Hitler got a hold in the Caucasus and became a serious threat to the Persia Gulf it would be necessary to consider abandoning Egypt and North Africa altogether and shifting the British forces then in North Africa and Egypt, securing the canal, to the Persian Gulf.⁹⁰ Britain's relations with the Zionists and the Arabs would then become even more critical with regard to the security of the Eastern Mediterranean oil terminals, the canal, its access to the Far East and its relations with Japan. But Japan continued to try to initiate peace talks. A second approach to Hitler by Ambassador Oshima since Japan had reached its intended limit of occupation was also rebuffed.⁹¹ It is reasonable to assume that Hitler was not prepared to seek a deal with Stalin which would permit the survival of Bolshevism in return for land for Germany's 'breathing space', and that he would no longer approach the hated Churchill for an imperial compromise until he had cleared western Europe of its Jews. In any case, Hitler was still so confident that in August, while his armies were driving towards Stalingrad, he again talked with his inner circle about the terms he might be able to force on Britain and the United States after he had knocked Russia out of the war and could turn west once more. In the meantime, with its catastrophic naval losses at Midway Island on June 5 and American landings at Guadalcanal in the Solomon Islands in August, the tide began to turn against Japan as well, and it lost some of its negotiating strength.

Also early in August the Geneva representative of the World Jewish Congress, Gerhard Riegner, received a report from an industrialist who had access to German headquarters that Hitler had decided on the use of gas to destroy the entire Jewish population of occupied Europe. Riegner passed that report through British diplomatic cable channels to an MP friend in London and to Stephen Wise, President of the American Jewish Congress, in Washington, through the office of the Under Secretary of State, Sumner Welles. Welles suppressed the report, instructing that it was not to be handed to Wise who therefore did not receive a copy until August 28 when a copy reached him direct from London.⁹² Wise then agreed to keep it suppressed until he received Welles' confirmation that it was authentic. That proved to be on November 24, five days after the Zionist Action Committee had confirmed the Biltmore resolutions.⁹³

JEWISH SETTLEMENTS? WHERE?

As a result of the Biltmore call for the establishment of a Jewish National Home, when it was becoming clear that the Western Alliance was gaining the upper hand over the Axis, the Allies had to consider initiatives which would lift the level of the debate on the Jewish Question and provide for proper adjustment after Hitler without prejudicing their other interests – especially in the Middle East. Very deliberately they focussed attention on refugee assistance and resettlement, and not on Jewish assistance and resettlement. They were expert at exploiting the politics of hatred – they had been doing it for years, not only in the Middle East but in every continent of the world – but now they had to do the reverse. They had to try to put the genie back in the bottle, and that was much more difficult. Several initiatives were taken, rather stealthily, by the British and United States governments to focus on the general issue of refugees.

They knew that the large scale resettlement of refugees into a country with a different ethnic heritage was always difficult. There are many reasons, or issues, but two are basic. Enormous areas of underutilized land are required, relatively speaking, for such resettlement, and a high level of community understanding, tolerance and acceptance is necessary to achieve settlement within established urban areas. It was widely considered that each of the United States, Canada, Southern Africa and Australia offered relatively good prospects for large scale refugee settlement, but the Evian Conference had clearly shown that none of them were enthusiastic about the prospect. In some cases the renewed debate following the Biltmore Conference became very acrimonious, and Australia's experience illustrates the point.

During 1937 and 1938 the Australian government had adopted a policy that steps should be taken to prevent "a serious influx of Jews" into Australia, that no facilities should be granted for group migration and that applications by the Australian Jewish Welfare Association in favour of 500 individual Jews from Austria or Germany would be approved. Its objections to admitting a large number of Jews were their "non-assimilability," their disregard for Australian living and working conditions and that the number of "alien migrants" would be considerably swelled in relation to British migration. And it noted that "it would appear desirable to give preference to Austrian and German Jews because of their greater need to find a new home and because, on the whole, they have become more assimilated in European ways, say, than the Jews of Poland where they have practically formed a state within a state."⁹⁴

On the basis of that policy the Australian delegate at Evian in July 1938 is reported to have told the conference that: "It will no doubt be appreciated that as we have no racial problem, we are not desirous of importing one."⁹⁵ [Emphasis added.] Unfortunately Australia's communal psychological complex over its British convict heritage; the Protestant-Catholic antagonism which had resulted from its British-Irish settler mix; its deeply ingrained White Australia Policy enshrined in legislation; and the trauma of abuse and suppression for its indigenous populations were all matters of record. Thus, when the Australian High Commissioner in London recommended in November 1938 that Australia should accept 30,000 refugees over a three year period the government was faced with a problem. At its December meeting the cabinet adopted a figure of just half that – 15,000 over three years – to be made up of 4,000 Jews and 1,000 "Aryans and non-Aryan Christians" each year.^{96 97} In the circumstances Jews were acceptable, but not non-Christians of other faiths!

Also in 1938 the Freeland League for Jewish Territorial Colonization was formed in England for the purpose of settling Jewish refugees in north-western Australia. It proposed that 10,800 square miles of the Kimberley region of Western Australia would be taken over and developed in two stages for pastoral, agricultural and industrial settlement. The secretary of the League, Dr Isaac Steinberg, who was (according to a letter in the files of the Department of Immigration) the People's Commissar for Justice in the first Soviet Government, arrived in Australia for discussions with the state and federal governments in May 1939. The proposal was considered by federal Cabinet in January 1941 and the decision was taken that further consideration should be deferred. However Steinberg remained in Australia and in spite of Cabinet confirming its rejection of the scheme in December that year he continued his investigations and lobbying. From mid 1942, after Biltmore and with the crisis in Europe deepening, public debate on the Freeland proposal became more intense. The Labor Council of New South Wales, the Australian Council of Trade Unions and the Anglican Bishop of Sydney were among those who supported the plan while many Labor Party branches, the Canberra Times, the Australian Natives Association and the Housewives Association of New South Wales were among those opposed. In January 1943 committees of prominent academics, church leaders and professional people were formed in both Melbourne and Sydney to press for acceptance of the plan and large scale refugee settlement. These were followed in March with a formal approach to the government by the heads of the Anglican, Presbyterian and Methodist churches. Steinberg tried again in September with a four page personal letter to Prime Minister John Curtin, but the issue was so divisive that the government would not budge. Curtin eventually replied – on October 28, ¹⁹⁴³:

*The Commonwealth Government sympathizes with the serious plight of your people in Europe. It will be appreciated, however, that the whole question of immigration into Australia, particularly having regard to the conditions that will exist at the conclusion of hostilities is one that requires to be fully explored from all aspects. Plans are at present in progress to set up a committee to study the various phases of the general problem and, until recommendations are made by that body, the Government is not in a position to formulate a definite policy.*⁹⁸

Actually the position was very similar everywhere in the Western World. By mid 1942, shortly after Biltmore, London and Washington had reached agreement on the tactic of restraining local political foment over the Palestine question by delaying a settlement of the issue until the conclusion of the war. That decision was actually quite consistent with the British blanket suppression of news about the Palestine question which had been implemented from the beginning of the war. However when a joint Anglo-American statement to that effect was prepared, with an assurance that no decision would be made without prior consultation with both Jews and Arabs and also that no changes brought about by force would be recognized, it could not be released because of pressure on the White House from Zionist groups.⁹⁹

Hitler reacted to reports of these and similar decisions by Christian Western countries to reject or limit resettlement plans – and by Zionist groups to reject emigration packages except if the refugees concerned were allowed to enter Palestine – in exactly the same way that he had to the failure of Evian. They strengthened his determination to solve 'the Jewish problem' in his own way and encouraged the teams which were working on the planning and construction of mass gassing chambers to press on with all speed. The conclusion is therefore inescapable that these decisions contributed directly to the deaths of inestimable numbers of Jews.

Certainly there was still a large reservoir population of Jews in occupied Europe when Germany surrendered, so it is impossible to say with any certainty how many more Jews would have survived if Hitler had continued with the release of some Jews – as many as countries would accept during wartime under negotiated emigration packages of one sort or another – in parallel with his program of ‘deportations to the east’. However it is well established that during the ‘pause for reflection’ he urged the powers of the Alliance to take the Jews off his hands and it is therefore reasonable to assume that the number of deaths would have been reduced significantly and the course of the “final solution” may have been different if large scale refugee resettlement had been agreed to. The timing of Hitler’s decision to proceed with extermination in place of emigration and how this relates to Britain’s rejection of his overtures which we have already considered, support that contention. However a distinction must be drawn between planned emigration as a factor in an armistice deal, and ‘rescue’ either from the death camps or from the ‘holding pens’ of the major ghettos and concentration camps after the extermination program had been set in motion. Large scale rescue from the major ghettos, concentration camps and death camps after the extermination program had been set in motion was not achievable. At that stage the slaughter could only be ended either by ending the war through Germany’s defeat, or through a change of German policy which may have followed Hitler’s death (by assassination or otherwise) and succession by an alternative leader. Even the outcome in the event of Hitler being replaced is not certain because of the level of acceptance of the idea that a secure future for Europe was dependent upon the elimination of Jewish influence, and the fanatical grip which the Nazis had achieved on the German mind. In any case it was a fundamental ingredient of the parody of Mein Kampf that Christian self-understanding and the acceptance of the Jewish community were incompatible, and the parody therefore still had to be acted out.

LET’S NOT TALK ABOUT IT

In August, as already noted, London and Washington received an account of the gas chambers and crematoria from the Polish Government in exile. Although these were soon confirmed by reports from other sources, including transferred prisoners of war, the State Department’s response was to impose a ban on the transmission of such news through diplomatic channels. This effectively reduced the credibility of reports which did get through. The government was already coming under pressure to act following the Biltmore Conference and it wanted no publicity or information in circulation which could lead to more pressure or draw attention to anomalies in the Allies’ strategies or motives. When funds were solicited by certain Jewish organizations for possible rescue efforts, both Washington and London discouraged contributions on the grounds that the money would probably fall into enemy hands but, if it didn’t, it would relieve Germany and its partners of the legal burden of supporting all of their inhabitants.¹⁰⁰ Their real concerns related to the fact that a plan to rescue Jews required an explanation of why they needed to be rescued; why they had been subject to oppression; where they would be resettled; who would be placed at a disadvantage if they were taken to their place of choice, Palestine; and what the consequences might be for the Allied powers if the rescue plan went ahead. The answers to those questions were all so embarrassing and so potentially threatening to either the Allied war effort directly or through its relations with the Vatican that anything which would expose them to public discussion just had to be suppressed.

That episode was due to the fact that the influence of the Jewish community had forced the ‘moral imperative’ and Hitler’s Final Solution to the top of the American agenda alongside the original reasons for United States entry into the war: self interest. Thus, when Mussolini permitted Myron Taylor to visit the Vatican and meet Pius XII on September 19, much to Hitler’s displeasure, the president’s personal emissary aimed to convince the pope that “the Americans could not lose the war and that their determination was fired by a moral crusade against a gangster regime.”¹⁰¹ [Emphasis added.] That was only a year after Roosevelt, like Churchill in Britain two years earlier, had floundered around looking for a justification which the people of the US would accept for going to war and had found it necessary to rely on a response of hatred generated by a Japanese attack which he had secretly and deceitfully provoked by using US forces at Pearl Harbour as a decoy. [See chapter 24.]

In case the pope’s ignorance was as profound as his silence on the question of the Final Solution – which it was not – Taylor had brought “fresh information” about Germany’s unprecedented war crimes in occupied Europe, especially in France. Actually Hitler’s crime of genocide was not ‘unprecedented’ either in the planning or the execution. In planning, there was the precedent of the plan outlined by Professor Vosa Cubrilovic at the Serbian Cultural Club in 1937 for the elimination of the Albanian Muslim population in Yugoslavia, and in execution there was the precedent of the elimination of the Armenian population from Turkey. But as Hitler had confidently predicted they would, the world’s leaders had soon overlooked that episode – except to the extent that they could exploit it for political advantage – and he expected them to do the same again. If they had not been bothered by a couple of million Christians, they would be much less bothered about a few million Jews. He was only following established precedents in exactly the same way that he had with every other questionable policy he had espoused in Mein Kampf or put into practice since he gained power. However the circumstances of the Jewish Question were different to the others, and the world’s leaders were not being allowed to overlook it. [For the Serbian plan see chapter 20; for Armenia, chapter 16; for the details of Mein Kampf, chapter 18.)

Taylor’s visit to the Vatican appears to have had two aims, but they were intimately linked. One is indicated by his statement to Pius XII that: “There is reason to believe that our Axis enemies will attempt, through devious channels, to urge the Holy See to endorse in the near future proposals of peace without victory.”¹⁰² His use of the expression ‘peace without victory’ is an illusion to Hitler’s readiness to make a territorial settlement with Britain as long as he could have a free hand in the Jewish Question and indicates that Roosevelt, or the administration, had shifted ground a lot since Hoover expressed surprise that Churchill had rejected a proposal along those lines. [See chapter 24, p. 25.] The other aim of Taylor's visit was directly related to the Final Solution and his appeal to Pius XII to speak out. He said: "Because we know we are in the right, and because we have supreme confidence in our strength, we are determined to carry through until we shall have won a complete victory." He was going much further and saying, in diplomat-speak, that the US expected the Vatican to end its bid to generate support for Hitler's assault against Soviet Russia and to cease its tacit support for Hitler's racial policy or face the music. Forced onto the defensive, Pius XII agreed, through Maglione, to issue an appropriate statement. When it was released – coinciding with the destruction of the Warsaw Ghetto and the slaughter of its residents – it contained no mention of Jews or Nazi atrocities and was cast in very vague terms.¹⁰³ It read, in part:

*The Holy See has always been, and still is, greatly preoccupied, out of a heart filled with constant solitude, with the fate of civil populations defenceless against the aggressions of war. Since the outbreak of the present conflict, no year has passed that We have not appealed in Our public utterances to all the belligerents – men who also have human hearts moulded by a mother's love – to show some feeling of pity and charity for the suffering of civilians, for helpless women and children, for the sick and the aged, on whom a rain of terror, fire, destruction, and havoc pours down out of a guiltless sky. Our appeal was little heeded."*¹⁰⁴
[Emphasis added.]

Hitler should have been very happy indeed to learn that Pius XII had told the world that he, no less than Roosevelt or Churchill, was a man of human heart moulded by his mother's love, that his ethereal environment was guiltless, and that people in his care suffered no more than the aggressions of war. He could hardly complain about a reprimand like that!

It is no wonder that Pastor Marc Boegner had received a severe rebuff from Vichy French President Pierre Laval on September 9 when he challenged him to stop the hunting, arrest, surrender and repatriation of Jews to Germany. In The Long Road to Unity Boegner quotes Laval as saying: "I cannot act otherwise, and what I am doing is a prophylactic operation ... I do not want a single foreign Jew to remain in France. Some countries take a high moral tone with me, but when I say to them, 'All right – you take them', they back out of it ... I am paying for the mistakes of others, of a government which allowed them in ... they are Gaullists, operating on the black market; if there was trouble, you'd find them leading the gangs'."

On manhunts: "They will be searched out wherever they are hiding." On saving children: "The children must stay with their parents ... I will not have [adoption] ... No one must remain in France." On opposition from the churches: "The Churches? They have done plenty of the same sort of thing themselves. I said as much to the representative of the nunciature who came to see me. They can do as they please, I shall continue to do what I have to do."¹⁰⁵

Laval was much more at home with the Pope's approach to the Jews than with Boegner and the Protestants. In June 1941 when the Vichy government had introduced the first of its 'Jewish Statutes' the cardinals, archbishops and Reformed leaders in France had jointly made known their strong disapproval, but the Vichy Ambassador to the Holy See had reported favourably after his discussions with Vatican officials. The Vatican did not consider such laws in conflict with Catholic teaching, he said. The Holy See merely counselled that no provisions on marriage be added to the statutes and “that the precepts of justice and charity be considered in the application of the law.”¹⁰⁶

Those responses from Laval and the Vatican make it perfectly clear why the Reich Foreign Ministry representative could advise the Wannsee Conference in January, 1942, with confidence, that no problems were expected in getting the cooperation of governments in western Europe for the ‘final solution’ program, and Hitler could therefore continued to do what he believed he had to do with equal confidence. Quite apart from the systematic slaughter of Jews and Commissars by the Einsatzgruppen, which were responsible for the deaths of about two million people, largely Jews, by the end of the war,¹⁰⁷ the transport of Jews from Germany and the occupied territories was gradually increased as the death camps came into full operation after the Wannsee Conference. [See above, chapter 28, pp. 31,32.] By June 1942 several thousand people were being ‘processed’ each day. From July 22 the figure jumped sharply with one train load of 6,000 Jews leaving Warsaw for the extermination centre at Treblinka each day.¹⁰⁸ Then in mid-August the authorities in Budapest were told that the deportation of Hungary’s one million Jews should start immediately and be completed within a year. That decision meant an additional 2,700 deaths every day.¹⁰⁹ About the same time Zalman Friedrich, from Warsaw, acting for the Bund, set out to explore where the deportation trains were going. At Sokolow he met a bruised and bleeding escapee from nearby Treblinka who was able to describe in detail its killing installations and procedures.

But in the meantime the rapidly dwindling Warsaw Ghetto-bound community which had started at about 400,000 people had faced an horrific week beginning on September 5 when the German authorities announced that all Jews in the ghetto, without exception had to report immediately for registration for deportation. Each day for that week the remainder watched helplessly as up to 10,000 people were railed out in squalor to certain death and as another 2,648 people were simply gunned down in cold blood. Until that week the Ghetto Jews and their colleagues of the highly organized Polish Resistance had been divided among themselves about whether the death camp rumours were correct or exaggerated and about whether resistance would relieve the pressure or make it worse by encouraging even more determined Nazi recrimination. But they were now agreed that if death by murder was virtually a certainty they should not accept it without resistance and there was just a small chance that they might be able to force a change of policy. They realized that more than 250,000 people had made their dreadful final journey in seven weeks in spite of efforts to stem the flow by sabotaging the railways. On September 10, 1942, when only 70,000 ghetto residents remained – 40,000 of them armed with weapons smuggled in with the help of both Jewish and ‘Aryan’ collaborators in the underground and concealed in fortified underground passages and rooms – they decided to fight it out. It was better to fight for their lives and take a few Nazis to their graves as well, rather than go like lambs to the slaughter. Then, after an especially vicious day to mark Yom Kippur when more than two thousand people were rounded up and deported and before they could put their stand-and-fight plan into action, there was an unexpected pause in the deportations. The reason was not a humanitarian change of heart by the authorities. It was a matter of the combined effects of economic and material sabotage by the underground, direct pressure on the local administration by non-Jewish groups in league with the underground, and complaints from the same groups about the effects on productivity of the dramatic depletion of the labour force. When Friedrich arrived back in Warsaw his report on Treblinka was published in an underground newspaper on September 20.¹¹⁰ The question was, would deportations to the death camps be resumed?^{111 112} The answer would not be known for six months and before we turn to it there are some related matters to consider, together with some of the other action during that period.

THE POLITICS OF LIFE AND DEATH

It was about this time, the third quarter of 1942 (and about four months after news of the mass murder of Jews had reached London and Washington), that the nature and organization of relief for the remnant Jewish community in Poland changed dramatically. During 1940 and 1941 the Polish government-in-exile in London had coordinated relief work as best it could through its Delegatura for the Homeland. However, although a host of political, community and church organizations were involved, there was a reluctance within the general Polish community to take part. In large measure that was because the pre-war environment in their country had been complex and confused. Alongside a mixture of freedoms which Jews were not accustomed to in some countries, there were repressive emigration laws which encouraged 'excess Jews' to emigrate and stay out once they had left. Anti-Semitism showed at times as physical oppression and communal attacks, but it has been exaggerated by some writers and had fallen in intensity after the death of Pilsudski. The country was deeply poverty stricken and some commentators have found it difficult to distinguish between the consequences of poverty and the consequences of deep-seated anti-Semitism, or perhaps they have found it convenient to confuse the two issues.¹¹³ Overall, there was an environment which encouraged, among Jews, both nationalism and pride in their Jewish heritage. For Poles, however, the situation had been complicated by the governor-general of Warsaw, Fischer, who had made it known in his proclamation of November 10 1941 that the death penalty awaited all those who 'provide refuge or any other kind of help' to Jews in hiding.¹¹⁴

Nevertheless, the situation was so horrifying that many ordinary Poles were galvanized into action in spite of fear and their conditioned reserve. On September 27, two weeks after deportations from the Warsaw Ghetto stopped unexpectedly and one week after the circulation of Friedrich's report, the Delegatura established the Aid Committee for Jews which drew in a number of additional underground organizations and operated until December 4 when it was disbanded in favour of the even more broadly based Council for Aid to Jews. The Council included Jewish representatives. It operated in Cracow and Lwow as well as Warsaw, and tackled rescue, relief, foster care and medical programs, anti-extortion security and publishing work with incredible tenacity in the circumstances.¹¹⁵ But the world at large was not immediately told about the deportations from the Warsaw Ghetto, either by responsible governments or the church. Whether in collusion with the British Foreign Office or not, the Polish Government in exile in London suppressed the details and when it did advise the other Allied governments it was accused of exaggerating. Even after the details of the mass slaughters were verified and accepted by the British and American authorities, both governments showed great concern that the incidents should not be given too much publicity.¹¹⁶

The Vatican's dilemma is illustrated by the contrasts and contradictions in the conduct of senior clergy and officials. The Roman Catholic Archbishop of Westminster, Cardinal Hinsley, was one of the first public figures in Britain to broadcast to Europe, in July 1942, about the suffering of the Jews, but he was soon to find that he had little support from other authorities in his own church. During the eight days beginning August 27, the pope was asked by six diplomats representing either neutral or belligerent governments to condemn the Nazi excesses. There was a clear understanding that the impact of such a statement coming from the ultimate Catholic authority would be greater than one coming from a national government. The pope's biographer, Michael O'Carroll justifies the rejection of these approaches on the basis that the pope was "the one man in Europe who had been dealing directly with German rulers for a quarter of a century, the only neutral leader trusted by the German Resistance, [and] recipient of confidences from the head of the armed forces Intelligence." [Emphasis added.] That is a remarkable admission in view of the debate over the source of the pope's information on Hitler's plans for Barbarossa and whether the pope took action to suppress the information. (See chapter 24, p. 51.) O'Carroll then drew on the quotation that "for a sensible opinion voiced only once [against Hitler] a man could be destroyed for ever."¹¹⁷ But even before that spate of direct approaches to the Pope, Harold Tittmann, Taylor's assistant, had told Vatican officials that its silence was "endangering its moral prestige and is undermining faith both in the Church and in the Holy Father himself." In fact the Holy Father – the ultimate Catholic authority – had his mind set on other ways of solving the world's crisis. A touch of Marian mystique.

THE MARIAN FACTOR

In the same way that the Jewish factor had been exploited by Britain in a bid to keep Russia in World War One at the time of the Russian Revolution, and the Christian factor had been exploited by both the Soviet government and the Nazis immediately Operation Barbarossa was launched, the Jewish factor was again exploited as the German armies pushed towards Moscow late in 1942. Reports began to circulate, notably in the Catholic press, that a wave of propaganda about German atrocities against the Jews was "Russian inspired." These reports were taken to mean that Russia was trying to generate international Jewish sympathy for the defence of Russia against Hitler. From the Vatican's perspective, if the support was real and was having an influence it had to be undermined, and if support was only being encouraged, it had to be discouraged. This illustrates another aspect of the drama and the parody of Mein Kampf. Statements by Pius XII as the Jewish extermination crisis gathered momentum make it clear that he wanted the world, and especially the Jews, to turn to the Catholic faith and the practice of Mariology in particular to solve their problems – not just any Christian church. He has been described as the pope who did most to foster Marian devotion and it has been said that he was “particularly devoted to our Lady of Fatima” but the timing of the Marian episode which follows makes it look more like another piece of religious manipulation for political purposes than a simple act of religious devotion.

In 1917 reports began to circulate that Lucy, one of three sisters who experienced a vision of Mary at Fatima, Portugal, had been told by the Blessed Virgin that God was going to punish the world by more wars. According to those reports Mary also said that this could be prevented and Russia would be converted (to Catholicism) if Russia were consecrated to her Immaculate Heart and if communions of reparation were offered on the first Saturday of each month. The reports circulated between the time that the Provisional Russian Government lifted the Tsarist restrictions on Jews and the publication of the Balfour Declaration. [See chapter 18.] But until the start of World War Two, no national conversion had taken place and there appeared to be no prospect of it taking place with a Communist government firmly in control. However, prior to his elevation to the papacy as Pius XII, Cardinal Pacelli had shown a consistent emphasis in his ministry on devotion to Mary, and during his long term as Vatican Secretary of State, especially after his predecessor, Pius XI, endorsed the Fatima apparitions, the celebration of the cult of Fatima gained such prominence that the dictators Salazar in Portugal and Franco in Spain used it as “a rally-rousing emblem of Fascist solidarity.”¹¹⁸ Then, sometime in 1940, after the outbreak of war but before Hitler’s invasion of Russia, Sister Lucia, the surviving seer, wrote to Pius XII and requested that Russia be consecrated to the Immaculate Heart of Mary in accordance with the command which she had transmitted from the Virgin. The pope did not immediately respond, but in June 1941, in spite of Hitler’s bid to suppress Vatican infiltration into Russia with the armies of Barbarossa, it was again used for the same purpose: the recruitment of Spain’s ‘Blue Division’ to help the Nazis in the assault on Russia. [See chapter 20, p. 20 and chapter 24, p. 56.]

Now, in the final quarter of 1942, with Hitler’s Einsatzgruppen slaughtering Jews by the tens of thousands and his conventional armies, blessed by his papal concordat and a gaggle of chaplains, Catholic and Protestant, in the process of occupying Stalingrad – and preparing for the battle which was expected to give him a decisive breakthrough and victory in Russia – Pius XII decided the time was right to act. He would not respond to diplomatic appeals to speak in an effort to stem the slaughter of the Jews. He would respond to both Lucy’s letter and the large numbers of requests which the Vatican said it had received to do so and consecrate Russia to the Immaculate Heart of Mary. It would help Hitler along to his well deserved victory in support of Christian values, the elimination of Communism and the Catholicizing of the nation. Surely any thinking Jew would respond also by turning to Catholicism to be saved.

German troops reached the centre of Stalingrad on September 22 and it looked as if victory was assured. Hitler was elated. Stalin, Churchill and Roosevelt were desperate. Everyone – Stalin, the Allies, Hitler and the pope – knew that if the Germans took Stalingrad they had control of the critical oil supplies from the Baku region and Moscow’s southern lifeline. Moscow could not, then, hold out. Victory would be Hitler’s and two parties would be happy. Hitler and the Vatican. The church in Russia – what would be left of it – would fall straight into the Vatican’s lap.

From a Western perspective the situation was now critical. With undeniable reports in from Warsaw about the fate of the ghetto and the impending loss of Stalingrad it was necessary for someone to pull a rabbit of the hat! In Washington next day, September 23, Roosevelt confirmed a top secret plan with the code name ‘The Manhattan Project.’ It was to be under the direction of General Leslie Groves as project controller. His role: to supervise every aspect from construction to final delivery of an atomic bomb. His instructions: to requisition or appropriate anything he required. Money was to be no object.¹¹⁹ A controlled chain reaction, the basis of a nuclear explosion, had not yet been achieved, but the scientists working on what had been declared a “practical project” under the control of the Office of Scientific Research and Development believed they were close to that point. (Enrico Fermi and his team at the University of Chicago actually reached it nine days later.) The Russians counter-attacked the same day, but while they caused heavy German losses the action was not enough to prevent German forces from occupying the Communist Party’s headquarters on September 27. On October 5 Stalin issued a stand or fall order: Stalingrad must be held and relieved at any price. The situation improved slightly at great cost, but on October 14 the German assault was renewed and the situation for Russia looked bleak indeed. On October 25, in spite of fanatical Russian resistance, General Paulus advised Hitler that he expected to have completed the capture of Stalingrad “at the latest by November 10.”¹²⁰ Pius XII was confident the Russian Orthodox Church was about to fall into his lap. To link Hitler’s anticipated victory with a touch of Catholic influence was too good an opportunity to miss and the pope had reason for his confidence that, whatever Hitler really thought of the church, he would soon be able to sign a Russian concordat. If not with Hitler, then with his successor. The Vatican’s ambition which had been thwarted so often over several hundred years appeared to be on the verge of fulfilment.

The world was transfixed by the titanic struggle for Stalingrad. Almost. Some people could think about other things, like the fate of the Jews. Even if the pope would say nothing there were some churchmen who would. At a public meeting in London on October 29, leading British churchmen and public figures protested against the persecution of the Jews. A message from Churchill was read to them: “The systematic cruelties to which the Jewish people – men, women and children – have been exposed under the Nazi regime are amongst the most terrible events of history, and place an indelible stain upon all who perpetrate or instigate them. ... Free man and women denounce these vile crimes, and when this world struggle ends with the enthronement of human rights, racial persecution will be ended.”¹²¹

Two days later, on October 31, Pius XII set his plan in motion with a tentative allusion to Russia and the Virgin in a message which was broadcast to Portugal. In the prayer which he composed for the occasion he avoided mentioning Russia by name, or Jews, but invoked Mary as Queen of the Rosary and Help of Christians. He asked for her help in the calamities of that time, which he and the faithful “hoped to receive, not through their own merits, but solely from the immense goodness of her motherly heart, imploring her to ‘give us peace’ and consecrating themselves forever to her Immaculate Heart,”¹²² and he prayed: “To those ... among whom there was not a house where Thy venerable icon was not seen ... give them peace and bring them again to the one fold.”¹²³ [Emphasis added.]

However not everything was going to Hitler’s liking. Following Montgomery’s victory there on October 27, the Axis retreat from El Alamein began on November 2, and the news from America that day was also disturbing. Public support for the Jewish cause was growing strongly. The fact that other nations and ethnic minorities were pressing their claim for either independence, decolonization or both, and that the Jewish people should therefore not remain silent had been a very powerful argument in the land of the Monroe Doctrine at the time of the Biltmore Conference and a call for the establishment of a Jewish National Home had now been published to mark the 25th anniversary of the Balfour Declaration carrying the signatures of 68 US Senators, 194 Congressmen and hundreds of community leaders and public figures.¹²⁴ The Allies landed in force in North Africa a few days later, on the November 7, the German Navy was having difficulty keeping trade routes open so that foodstuffs were in short supply, and the Russians still clung to Stalingrad and had recovered a sliver of territory. In spite of that Hitler was exuding confidence. He did not wait for confirmation of victory from Paulus and on November 9 he announced that a German victory at Stalingrad had been achieved. Was he really that confident? Perhaps he wanted to announce some good news to offset the retreat from El Alamein. In any case the German armies did recover the initiative and began to advance again in mid November.

At that point Japan found that the presence of its Jewish expatriates was becoming an embarrassment and it became necessary to try to prevent continuing contact between Shanghai’s Jewish community and “overseas organizations” – presumably US intelligence. Secret orders were given for a ‘Jewish district’ (in effect, Asia’s first Jewish ghetto) to be set up in the Hongkew area and for the city’s scattered Jewish population to be moved into it. ‘Surveillance, control and guidance’ were to be made a military function. But there was no rush. It was not until February 18, 1943, that orders were published that all ‘stateless refugees’ must move in within three months. Conditions in the poverty stricken Hongkew area which was taken over for the ghetto were primitive, slum-like and disease ridden, but at least it was only a ghetto. The orders covered stateless non-Jews as well as 17,000 Jews, but an additional 4,000 Jews of Russian citizenship were exempted under the Soviet-Japanese Neutrality Pact which was still in effect.^{125 126}

In fact the German forces reached their maximum advance on November 18. Next day the Russians launched their massive counter offensive and within two days they were close to encircling the Germans. General Paulus appealed to Hitler for permission to break off the siege and withdraw twenty miles to the River Don to regroup. Permission was refused. The news of the Russian counter offensive rather overshadowed the news that the Zionist Action Committee formally adopted the Biltmore Program by a vote of 21 in favour, 3 against and 3 abstentions, but Governments and the press were now beginning to discuss the Jewish question more openly. However in spite of strong congressional support for the call for the establishment of a Jewish National Home a minority of American Jewish leaders, prompted by Hashomer Hatzair, continued to oppose the Biltmore Program on the basis that the new policy assumed that no satisfactory solution to 'the Arab question' was possible, that it was likely to be interpreted by the powers generally as releasing them from their responsibilities and that the mandatory power, Britain, would not give real power to the yishuv, (the Jewish community settled in Palestine).¹²⁷ Hashomer Hatzair (Young Watchman) had evolved as a Zionist kibbutz settlement movement among young Marxist or left-leaning middle class Polish or Austro-German Jews in Galicia during the Great War and its first members arrived in Palestine in 1919–1920.¹²⁸ Harmonious relations with their Arab neighbours were important to them and their commitment to both Socialism and Zionism seems to have ebbed and flowed over the years.

On November 22 the Russian encirclement of the German armies in Stalingrad was complete. Paulus sought permission to fight his way out, but on the 24th Hitler refused. Stalingrad was not to be abandoned. He ordered a relief army to advance and break in to the trap but both arms and food supplies were getting dangerously short. On the 30th, to reserve more food supplies for the armed forces, the Reich government reintroduced the euthanasia program. The method: not gassing but simple starvation, assisted, some reports suggest, by the use of poisoned food. Mental home managers were instructed that "in view of the war-related food situation and the health of the working asylum inmates" it was no longer justified to feed all inmates equally and those who were cared for "without accomplishing any useful work worth mentioning" were to be subjected to the special diet "without delay."¹²⁹

By the time Pius XII had gathered forty cardinals around him at the Vatican on December 8 to complete his planned consecration, the German plight was pathetic. The trapped armies could not even be properly supplied by air drops. The twin bitter philosophical enemies – enemies of the church as well as each other – were pounding hell out of each other but the Russians had gained the upper hand. They were sensing victory with fresh reinforcements brought from the Pacific front which had been relieved of the threat of Japanese attack. The German generals knew they faced defeat. The pope knew it, too. Instead of consecrating Russia to the Immaculate Heart of Mary as he had planned, Pius XII found it more appropriate to encompass the whole world in the consecration. He and his advisers knew very well that for the planned declaration to be followed by a decisive defeat would either dint the faith of many in Mary's capacity to intervene or reflect badly on the pope's judgement about when it was appropriate to seek her intervention, or both. The decisions to initiate the declaration and then not to proceed were both political. There was nothing strange about that. But subsequently Pius XII was criticized by supporters of the Cult of Fatima for not going ahead with it, on that grounds that his failure to fulfill the letter of the message conveyed by Sister Lucia led either to the German defeat or the subsequent growth of Soviet power during the Cold War¹³⁰ and the loss of Russia to the 'true faith'. In raising that issue the critics seemed not to realize that they were really raising questions about the relationship between faith, superstition and mysticism, and the exploitation of any one, or all, of those concepts for either political purposes or proselytizing.

A CHANGE OF TACTICS

The British Political War Executive (PWE) which had withheld distribution of its press briefing notes 'Establish Hitler's plan to exterminate the Jews in Europe' for some time in spite of all the reports of atrocities which it had received, now released them, on December 10. The first declaration by the Allied governments formally acknowledging the mass murder of Jews was then issued on December 17, with a show of surprise, distress and concern by members of the Commons. It was very carefully stage managed. It was not issued in the names of individual leaders. It was issued concurrently by Britain, the Soviet Union and the United States and linked General de Gaulle's National Committee of Free French with it. It had to be done in such a way that it did not reflect on any of the governments or the policies and inaction which they had pursued. Nor could it reflect on either the underlying Western Christian anti-Semitism which underpinned Hitler's Final Solution or the Orthodox Eastern Church which had underpinned the Tsarist regime and its pogroms – a heritage which Stalin was saddled with. To do so would have implied direct criticism of the Vatican or the church in general and that could have been very counter-productive. It had to recognize the legitimate rights of the Jews and respond to the reality of the political awakening which the Biltmore Conference had generated among them in America in an effort to placate them. But the response could not be open-ended. It had to lower the tempo of their increasingly vigorous demands for rescue or decisive action to end the war and to stop the carnage. But it also had to be drafted in such a way that it did not give the Zionist Organization any grounds to increase its demands for Palestine; antagonize the Arabs in that territory; or imply the need for large scale refugee settlement programs which would be very unsettling in countries which had already rejected such programs. It had to gently draw the populations of the Christian Western world towards a sympathetic understanding of Jews and their plight without resulting in an anti-Jewish backlash, and it all had to have a slight ring of a non-specific moral crusade because that was, after all, the only justification for the war against "Hitlerism" which any of the Allies had been able to use. Honesty – self interest – had never been acceptable. And finally, to avoid any suspicions about the motives behind its release, it had to be a carefully crafted statement consistent with the manner in which news about the Middle East, the interfaith crisis and war news had been dribbled out. It was a masterly first step towards uncovering the painful truth. It noted that:

the German authorities, not content with denying to persons of Jewish race in all the territories over which their barbarous rule has been extended the most elementary human rights, are now carrying into effect Hitler's oft-repeated intention to exterminate the Jewish people in Europe. ... Jews are being transported, in conditions of appalling horror and *brutality ... (from all the occupied countries) ... to Eastern Europe. In Poland, which has been made the principal Nazi slaughterhouse, the ghettos established by the German invaders are being systematically emptied of all the Jews except a few highly skilled workers required for war industries. None of these taken away are ever heard of again. The able-bodied are slowly worked to death in labour camps. The infirm are left to die of exposure and starvation or are deliberately massacred in mass executions. The number of victims of these bloody cruelties is reckoned in many hundreds of thousands of entirely innocent men, women and children ... (and the Allies) ... condemn in the strongest possible terms this bestial policy of cold-blooded extermination.*¹³¹

About that time, an anti-Nazi member of the German Confessing Church, Kurt Gerstein, who had been drawn into the extermination program as supplier of the hydrogen cyanide gas granules, told a Swedish diplomat, Baron von Otter, of his role and what was being carried out in the death camps. Apparently the Swedish government did not pass a report of that meeting on to the British or US authorities¹³² Then on Christmas Eve, one week after the joint Allied declaration, while Britain's faithful again had their minds on higher Christian things, the PWE distributed its 'Special Annex on the extermination of the Jews, with supporting evidence, mainly from Polish sources, and specific reference to Treblinka, Belzec and Sobibor as extermination camps.'¹³³ There was still not a word from the Vatican except that, the same day, the London Catholic Times published a note that: "It is no secret that the recent wave of propaganda about German atrocities against the Jews was Russian inspired" ¹³⁴ [emphasis added]... and the pope followed with his Christmas message.

Pius XII's expectations of a Russian concordat were quietly put on 'hold'. The German relief forces were now trapped a few miles from Stalingrad as well as Paulus' main invasion and occupation armies. The relief forces had run out of fuel. Those facing Moscow were in a state of disarray. The failure of his Russian initiative in Mariology was becoming apparent. And there was growing pressure for him to condemn Nazi anti-Jewish atrocities at the same time that his own political position was weakening. He therefore had very little good news to talk about when he prepared his broadcast. He still could not bring himself to name either Nazis or Jews specifically, but a couple of sentences in his homily brought him as close as he ever got to denouncing the Final Solution. He picked up the threads of the Allied declaration and made a low-key reference to "hundreds of thousands, who without any fault of their own, sometimes only by reason of their nationality or race, are marked down for death or gradual extinction."¹³⁵ [Emphasis added.] No mention of their religion.

However that was a very brief portion of his address. The pope's theme was the Rights of Man and the relationship between the individual and the state. The imbalance between the rights and interests of the state and the individual had been brought about, he said, by the "damaging economic policies" of recent decades in which everything had become "subordinated to the profit motive." The individual had been reduced to a "utility of the state" to the exclusion of all ethical and religious considerations. He made no attempt to distinguish between totalitarianism and democracy, social democracy and communism, or capitalism and welfare capitalism. What the world lacked, he said, was the peaceful ordering of society offered by allegiance to Holy Mother Church. His concept of an ideal society has been described as based on appeals to individual and family piety with “a hybrid of corporatist nostrums and appeals to ‘responsible Christian’ spirit underpinned by the premise of papal primacy.”¹³⁶ When he turned from Catholic social doctrine to the atrocities of the war which had come about, he said, because the social order “concealed a fatal weakness and an unbridled lust for profit and power” he pleaded for a vow to be made by men of good will to bring society back to its immovable centre of gravity in divine law, and for all men to dedicate themselves to the service of the human person and the service of a divinely ennobled human society. “Humanity owes this vow”, he said, “to those innumerable exiles whom the hurricane of war has torn away from their native soil and dispersed in a foreign land, who might make their own and the Prophet’s lament: ‘Our inheritance is turned to aliens, our houses to strangers.’” [Emphasis added.] So much for the Jews. The pope still believed they were just getting what they deserved.¹³⁷

WANG’S DISTRACTION

Churchill and Roosevelt planned another meeting, with their advisers, from January 14 to 23, 1943, this time at Casablanca in French North Africa, (Morocco), which had been recently liberated. But before they met there was an unexpected addition to their agenda. On January 9, Premier Wang Ching-wei of Japanese occupied China, formally declared war on the United States and Britain in conjunction with Japan. The Emperor and Premier Tojo, waiting for an opportune moment to recognize China’s independence, were persuaded to this course by their ambassador in Nanking. It would facilitate the integration of two governments: those of Wang Ching-wei in occupied China and Chiang Kai-shek in Nationalist China. This would then enable the withdrawal of Japanese troops from China, take China out of the war altogether, and greatly strengthen both Japan’s relations with other Asian nations and its immediate position in the war against the US and Britain. It meant that the Greater East Asian Co-Prosperity Sphere would be effectively in place. There would be no reasonable basis for the return of any of the Western colonial powers to East Asia, and the powers of the amorphous Christian gel would, thereafter, have to justify any trading arrangements or other mechanisms of intervention, whether social, religious or political – as equals. Wang Ching-wei’s declaration was the first move in that plan and, by way of recognizing it, Japan undertook to give up its unequal rights and privileges in China and to turn over to the Nanking Government the former international settlements in Shanghai and Kulangsu, the legation quarter in Peiping, and all enemy properties in China which had been seized by Japan. This situation was totally unacceptable to both Britain, which had gone to war to prop up its imperial position and been able to draw in the United States in a support role, and the United States which had moved from a support role to a belligerent in its own right with the intention of preventing Japan from achieving regional pre-eminence and of succeeding Britain and the other European colonial powers. Clearly the Western Allies could not concede such a major coup. The new China-Japan arrangement had to be prevented.

On January 11 both Britain and the United States announced treaties with China – or at least the Nationalist portion of it – under which they also renounced their special and unequal privileges which had been extracted under the war-imposed treaties which were still in place. It was an expensive move but they were determined to play down their imperialist images and to undermine the dynamic diplomatic moves being made by Japan which were about to swing the balance of power heavily in Japan's favour. They were fortunate that on the same day that Wang Ching-wei made his declaration, January 9, Hitler refused permission for the trapped German armies to surrender and ordered that they were to stay until a major relief and advance campaign could be mounted. They knew that this was a hollow gesture. A combination of ruthless determination by the Russians, US Lend-Lease supplies, the most bitter Russian winter in years and the non-intervention of the Japanese, had defeated Hitler's armies and Russia no longer faced defeat. The struggle to eject the German armies and to recover occupied territory would still be long and bitter, but Russia was no longer under immediate threat. But Hitler's irrational decision gave them the opportunity to appear to be struggling, together with Russia, on that front and the justification to continue total war.

So: when they met at Casablanca, Churchill and Roosevelt reaffirmed, early in their discussions, that there was no alternative to the Allied policy which required the unconditional surrender of both Germany and Japan. However that decision was not announced immediately and they considered a number of other matters. There was some confusion over whether Italy was intended to be covered by that clause as an Axis partner. Some observers believed the door was left ajar for negotiations – or a touch of blackmail for the player in the middle to change sides – and this later became a matter of contention. The pope was very eager that Rome should not be bombed and that attitude provided both problems and potential advantages for the Allies. The two leaders talked about Lend-Lease supplies and, as far as the American Chiefs of Staff seemed to be concerned, now that the German offensive had been overpowered, Russia had served its immediate purpose as an ally. It had stayed in the war, kept Hitler pre-occupied in the east, and prevented him from turning against Britain and, ultimately, against the United States. At their final conference session Roosevelt therefore recommended to Churchill that “supply to Russia will not be continued at prohibitive cost to the United Nations efforts,” but Churchill would not agree. He said that aid to Russia “must be pushed and no investment could pay a better dividend.”¹³⁸ [Emphasis added.]

There was also the Jewish Question to talk about. Or at least the refugee question. The pause in deportations from the ghetto which had been forced by the Polish Resistance was about to end. It was actually broken on January 18, during the Casablanca Conference, when German troops surrounded the remaining occupied sections of the ghetto and ordered residents to start loading for deportation. Caught by surprise, five of the small armed Jewish Combat Organization (ZOB) groups opened fire on the Germans. They killed or wounded about fifty soldiers, seized some of their weapons and were able to keep the number of residents taken for deportation to a minimum, but at the cost of fairly high casualties to themselves. The action and the deportations continued on the 19th and 20th but then ceased again. Communications with the outside world had improved progressively along with the reorganization of the resistance movement and on at least three occasions, the first being January 21, radio messages with reports of the situation and appeals for help, especially through exchange measures to secure the release of children, were sent to government and Jewish leaders in London, New York and elsewhere. Their deep sense of anguish, frustration and growing bitterness at what they saw as the failure of the world to intervene is clear from portions of those messages: “Brothers – the remaining Jews in Poland live with the awareness that in the most terrible days of our history you did not come to our aid. Respond, at least in the last days of our life.”¹³⁹ At Casablanca it was agreed that officials from Britain and the US would meet to discuss the question of refugees.

Then, on January 24, the Casablanca Declaration, that the war would be pursued until the unconditional surrender of both Germany and Japan, was trumpeted around the world. It was the most important decision which Churchill and Roosevelt had reached. The implications were enormous. The message which the Jews were supposed to get was that no agreement would be reached which would permit the Nazis to retain control of any territory in which they could continue their anti-Semitic policies. The message that Stalin was supposed to get was that, despite their failure thus far to open a second front in Europe which would take the pressure off the Red Army forces in the east, the Western Allies would not consider cutting a deal with Hitler which would leave Russia to fight on alone. The message Germany was supposed to get was that there would be no repeat of the situation after World War I, when the circumstances of Germany’s surrender had allowed Hitler to exploit the popular claim that the fatherland had not been defeated, but stabbed in the back. But in addition, Britain and the governments-in-exile of the occupied European colonial powers wanted Japan to know that, in spite of the treaties just made with one part or the other of China, no agreements would be reached to provide independence for former colonies as a part of a package deal to end the war. This time it would be a fight to the finish, and the victors would make all the decisions. The Allied governments, whether still in the front line or in exile from occupied countries – were no more interested in peace in January 1943 than they had been in March 1942 and for precisely the same reasons. Greed. The want to either recover and then retain a position of imperial privilege or to achieve that position at the expense of others.

STALINGRAD AND CASABLANCA

The impact of the Casablanca Declaration was immediate. Complaining, quite rightly, that it would certainly prolong the war, the Pope objected. Quite apart from his self-interest-based sympathy with the German cause, he claimed that if the Axis powers had no chance of negotiating an honorable peace they would believe that they should throw everything they had into the war in an effort to recover the initiative and hope to be able to call the tune or at least coerce the Western Allies to the negotiating table. They did. The Nazi backlash was immediate. From January 26 Hitler Youth Movement members aged fifteen or more were drafted to staff anti-aircraft batteries within the Reich to release adults for the front line. And the German people knew that if it made no difference whether there was a change of government or not, what was the point of trying to overthrow the present government, except perhaps to shorten the war by an earlier abject surrender? The declaration was also a guarantee that the level of Anti-Semitism would rise, not fall, and that the abuse of prisoners of war in the Pacific theatre would increase.

It is a reasonable assumption that if the Allies had announced their readiness to negotiate peace terms with new Axis governments there would have been an avalanche of conspiracies in Germany. Hitler would have been overthrown or assassinated and peace negotiations would have begun promptly. That would not have been the case in Japan because it was the Japanese government which had been pursuing avenues for negotiation. In that sense it was a repeat of the scenario when the Allies rejected Japanese initiatives for peace when Japan, having occupied all of the territory it intended to, was ahead in March 1942. At the very least untold deaths and casualties, running into millions on both sides of the complex battle lines would have been avoided. These included service personnel on the battle fields, civilians in devastated cities and towns, including the victims of two atomic bombs in Japan, and the victims of the gas chambers which were only then reaching the peak of their murderous capacity – the overwhelming majority of the victims being Jews. Further destruction and economic loss on a massive scale would have been avoided and the international divisions and ideologically-based hatreds and barriers which the world had to learn to live with would have been less deeply entrenched. In addition, the scale of reconstruction programs which were subsequently required would have been nowhere near as great. In fact between March 1942 and January 1943 the net change in the area occupied by Germany had not been great. It was between January 1943 and May 1945 that the demographics of Europe and Asia changed most dramatically in terms of military occupation, deaths, political alignments, and destruction. Therefore if the opportunity had been taken to negotiate peace in January, 1943, at the time of the Casablanca Conference, the crises brought about by the trauma and the changes in military occupation and political alignments during the final two years of the war would have been much more easily resolved. Whether or not all sections of the German people would have accepted Hitler's overthrow and a negotiated peace is another matter. Perhaps the stage would have been set for another war, or at least a protracted period of international political instability. But the pattern of post war political and economic power would also have been quite different without the enormous imbalance in power, and in that respect the power brokers and policy makers of the United States also had their own agenda to work to. So the war had to go on.

Even allowing for the effect of government inaction, the inconsistency in media reporting was abominable. Although its information network was unique the Vatican maintained its remarkable silence. It had locked itself into an absolutely impossible position. Its self-understanding, its teaching and the conduct which flowed from that were, together, the largest single factor in the development of anti-Semitism. Its international politicking and relationships had directly and very greatly assisted the rise of the Axis and the implementation of its policies, and the theology which the Catholic Church had developed served to underpin the whole lot. It was still trying to coerce Jews into accepting baptism as a step towards security, although the policy of the hierarchy in Croatia contradicted this, and it was therefore not in a position to do an about turn without calling the whole lot into question. Situation normal. It was a vicious circle. If it now criticized Hitler's conduct it had to defend its own conduct over about one thousand six hundred years. But if it sought to continue to defend its own policies as Fr. Rosa had done in his La Civiltà Cattolica articles, how could it attack either Hitler or Stalin? Its credibility, the doctrine of papal infallibility and everything which propped up the self-sustaining self-understanding would be open to further attack.

The press in neutral Sweden was under instructions not to publicize atrocities and while the Swiss press was not under any such orders, Switzerland's papers gave a generally indifferent performance. It is very hard to justify a case that the Russians were any better or any worse than the British, the Americans or any of their Allies in this respect. While the Jewish Anti-Fascist Committee was being exploited to raise funds from Jews in Allied countries, no special effort was made to alert Jews in Russia to the fate which awaited them if they fell into the hands of the Einsatzgruppen during Germany's push through western Russia. It has been argued that the Russian authorities were deliberately avoiding any policies and actions which would highlight distinctions between Jews and non-Jews and thereby play into either Hitler's or the Vatican's propaganda traps; that to warn them would have resulted in an eastward stampede of Jews which would have weakened Russia's defences and increased the likelihood of its defeat; and that they were tired of the legitimate release of information about atrocities simply being turned back on them as 'Communist propaganda.' On the other hand it has been argued that they were anti-Semitic, insensitive to the fate of the Jews and happy for Hitler to solve their problem for them. That line of argument continues that if the Soviet authorities had overcome their anti-Semitism and if the Jews had been alerted to German plans, their resistance – and therefore Russia's war effort – would have been strengthened, just as the Catholic press was suggesting. There is probably some truth in each of those arguments, but as we have noted, similar reasoning and criticism can be applied in regard to Allied motives and inaction.

At the same time that these developments were taking place, Britain was doing all it could to suppress discussion about the effect of its disastrous religious relations policy in the Indian sub-continent. Five months after Cripps arrived in India, Congress demanded that Britain quit the country and immediately set up a national government with real responsibility and power. Britain's response was to outlaw Congress and jail its leaders, yet again, triggering riots and the sabotage of public and strategic installations across the nation which were put down by the usual methods. While the British and Indian Armies continued their build up and thousands of Americans arrived in India with the aim of relieving China, Bose, a former president of Congress, set up a 'Free India government-in-exile' under Japanese sponsorship in Singapore and formed an Indian National Army with the expectation that Japan would support it in an invasion of India. But the Japanese were not the only people to note Britain's oppression of Congress and Indian aspirations for independence. The Chinese did, too, and Chiang Kai-shek, whom the Americans were championing as the leader of Asia, sought Roosevelt's intervention to have the suppression and imprisonment reversed. Anglo-Chinese relations became strained but Churchill stood firm.¹⁴⁰ Cooperation between Congress and the Muslim League became impossible and steadily worsening Hindu-Muslim antagonism made it obvious that there was no longer an alternative to the establishment of a separate state of Pakistan.¹⁴¹

The stage-managed release of the British PWE's instructions to "Establish Hitler's plan to exterminate the Jews in Europe" two weeks before Christmas, 1942, followed by the joint Allied Declaration, is clear confirmation that the Allied forces knew exactly where the German death camps and gas chambers were. It was not an instruction to establish what Hitler's plan was for the information of the government, in a military intelligence sense. It was an instruction to establish in the public mind what was already known to the government. It has led to vigorous criticism that it made no attempt whatsoever for the duration of the war to destroy them by bombing and thus interrupt – and possibly end – the extermination program. If they had done so they would in all likelihood have destroyed the credibility of Hitler's 'teaching' on matters of race, undermined his capacity to subjugate the ordinary German people, greatly impaired his domestic management and greatly enhanced the resistance movement, thus significantly changing the course of the war. The question must therefore be asked: were there genuine military considerations which prevented such a program, or were the Allies simply so engulfed by their deeply entrenched Western Christian self-understanding, so anti-Semitic and so insensitive to the fate of the Jews that they were also happy for Hitler to solve their problem for them?

It appears that without a substantial change in Western Alliance priorities and military strategy, the bombing of any of the death camps, including the very controversial Auschwitz, was simply logistically impossible until December 1943 because they were out of reach of fighter-protected bombing sorties.¹⁴² Rubinstein's contention that because of this there were no proposals made to bomb the death camps by either Jewish or Christian authorities until May 1944 appears well supported. In addition it must be noted that a lead time of several weeks would have been necessary for intelligence gathering and planning for such an exercise; at that stage of the war a coherent strategy aimed at winning the war was the best way to ensure the liberation of the remnant Jewish population rather than the diversion of resources into side issues; that gassing operations ceased at Auschwitz on November 28 1944, and that the Russians liberated the camp two months later.¹⁴³ We thus have confirmation that once the 'pause for reflection' had been wasted and the extermination plan had been put into operation there was no practical means of mass rescue – except for the possibilities offered by Eichmann's 'blood for goods' proposal which we shall come to shortly – and the parody had to be acted out in full.

While German forces had lost ground in Russia ahead of the catastrophe of Stalingrad; the Allies recovered their first patch of ground from the Japanese at Milne Bay in the New Guinea theatre and Guadalcanal followed soon after; and they were poised to destroy the Axis positions in Libya and Tunisia. But there were major questions of strategy to be determined by both Gog and Magog: which fronts to concentrate on or extend, whether to attempt a cross-channel invasion of the opposing territory, and how to achieve more effective co-ordination between collaborating forces in the field, how to shape their particular New World Orders, and what terms and conditions to insist upon for 'peace' once they got on top – or what terms and conditions to agree to if they did not get on top. The only major power which had been interested in pursuing a negotiated end to hostilities was, as already noted, Japan – the only one which was not part of the amorphous Christian gel.

Hitler's wrath at his crushing defeat at Stalingrad, the turn around of events in Russia and the Casablanca Declaration knew no bounds and he became at the same time irascible, depressed and reclusive. Goering and Goebbels closed ranks behind Hitler and the plotters and would be assassins around him found less opportunities, not more. On January 30 a Reich Central Security Office was established to improve the efficiency of the round up and deportation of Jews from the occupied territories.¹⁴⁴ Next day, January 31, Paulus being a realist, disobeyed Hitler and surrendered with his remaining 91,000 German troops at Stalingrad. They were all that remained of 285,000 troops who had reached the city two or three months earlier. It was just three months since the Pope had consecrated the world to the Immaculate Heart of Mary. Of the troops encircled when the Russian trap was sprung, 160,000 had been killed in action, and 34,000 had been evacuated by air. Out of the prisoners who started the long march, by foot, to Siberia tens of thousands died en route and tens of thousands more died in captivity and only 5,000 were to survive the Russian winters and eventually return to Germany.^{145 146 147}

Pius XII's hopes, built on Mariology, were firmly dashed. As an esteemed church historian his mind should have turned to the fate of the armies of Heraclius at the Battle of the River Yarmuk in 636. [Chapter 7.] However there were still some people determined to talk about 'Good News'. About the time that Pius was preparing to invoke the good name of Mary in his bid for the Russian church, Nathan H. Knorr was taking office as the third president of the Watch Tower Society following the death of J.F. Rutherford who had guided the Jehovah's Witnesses into their new world view. The society had grown during the previous twelve years from 50,000 to 126,000 Witnesses world wide. Its members were determined that they would carry the Good News of the Gospel throughout the world in spite of the crisis in world affairs, and in spite of the fact that they were still ostracized in the Allied countries and that they were among the first to be thrown into Germany's concentration camps because of their conscientious objection to war service. To ensure that they could do so, Knorr promptly set about guiding them into another change of emphasis. A plan had been developed for an international educational campaign involving trained speakers, ministers, schools and a corps of full time trained missionaries. It was a reversal of their earlier policy of total dependence on the laity, but they had recognized that more professionalism was essential to their task and that it would strengthen, not undermine, their established program of lay evangelism. The Watchtower Bible School of Gilead was established immediately and in January 1943 it admitted its first one hundred trainees for full time missionary work.

CONDEMNED ... BY A FOLLY OF ENORMOUS PROPORTIONS

A couple of weeks after the publication of the Casablanca Declaration the world was in a state of flux and the people of Central and Eastern Europe and Asia knew that there was trauma ahead. But the people of the Western World generally had a spring in their step. The declaration was taken as a firm statement by their paramount leaders that the God-fearing West was going to win the war, even if there was still a lot of effort and sacrifice required to beat the barbaric forces of evil into submission. That firm statement boosted their confidence, their self-esteem and their willingness to make the extra sacrifices which would be necessary. They were going to enjoy freedom – whatever that meant. It did not really concern them whether other people might be disadvantaged because of it or that there would be a build up of tensions around the world so that there would be a pattern of continuing conflict. They had no information on which to consider such things. What was good for them was bound to be – by the God-given nature of things – good for the rest of the world. And if it was not: that was no concern of theirs. It was not their fault. They did not know, nor did they have any means of knowing, that information was withheld from them, that it was dribbled out to suit their leaders, and that there had been an alternative. They could not know that the pattern for the balance of the war had been set by their leaders.

It was a re-run of the situation nine or ten months before when the Western Colonial powers had refused to negotiate peace based on their withdrawal from Asia as colonial powers when Japan was in front and had achieved all that was necessary for the establishment of a Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere which would have given Asia as a bloc parity with the world's other blocs.

The alternative which had been withheld from them this time was, in effect, that with peace negotiated between China and Japan – what we might refer to as the 'Wang Ching-wei Plan' – both countries would be taken out of the war and thus end the war in the Far East and the Pacific if the Western colonial powers were prepared to bow out gracefully. The scenario then became exactly the same as in March 1942. Japan would withdraw from the Axis, the Western Allies could concentrate all of their effort and resources against Germany, together with the Soviet Union, and the collapse of the Third Reich was assured. But as we have noted, neither the British nor United States leaders liked the idea of forfeiting their 'possessions' and the economic and political strength which their former positions in Asia provided. Their sheer greed and self-understanding as members of the amorphous Christian gel simply blinded them. They were determined to either recover or strengthen their positions, so the war just had to go on. Circumstances were such that there could be no more opportunities to pause and reconsider the situation: to take a short cut to peace. The Allied leaders had already had several opportunities and they had fumbled – or rejected – each of them: Dunkirk followed by the fall of France, May-June 1940; Japan's first-circle pause, March 1942; then Stalingrad and the Wang Ching-wei plan, January 1943. There would be no more. With no change in relationships or in the positioning of resources, and with no incentive for the German people to call a halt, the people of Europe and Asia had to struggle on to the bitter end. Gog, (or was it Magog?) insisted that the Night Journey had to be played out and the Scourge was happy to oblige and act out his role to the very end. Only then could the trouble in the triangle be unraveled and Maimonides' understanding of the Messianic Age become a reality. It was only a matter of time – and understanding.

The Casablanca Declaration may have brought the Allies some advantages in other ways but it is quite apparent that in terms of the fate of the Jews in Europe, the prolonging of the war in both Europe and the Pacific, and the gravity of destruction and broken human relationships it was a folly of enormous proportions. Some of the situations and issues which developed in the period after Casablanca can now be discussed, not necessarily in strict sequence, but the way in which they interlock, building from crisis to crisis in a manner which could have been avoided if different decisions had been taken in the light of the Wang Ching-wei Japan-China peace plan and Germany's crushing defeat at Stalingrad, will be apparent.

THE FATE OF THE JEWS

Three days of mourning for the gallant Reich dead were proclaimed in Berlin after Stalingrad. Goebbels exploited the theme 'The wheels must turn only for victory'. But there was little mourning in Berlin for the Jews in the Warsaw Ghetto. On February 7 they were able to get another message out: "Alert the whole world. Appeal to the Pope for official intervention and to the Allies to declare German war prisoners as hostages. We suffer terribly. The remaining 200,000 await annihilation. Only you can save us. The responsibility with regard to history will rest on you."¹⁴⁸ On February 15 Goebbels issued a decree requiring complete mobilization for victory. The same day in a speech in Dusseldorf under the title 'Do you want total war?' he took up Hitler's classic 'final solution' theme, saying that two thousand years of Western civilization – the age of Christianity – was in danger from a Russian victory forged by international Jewry. The mob reacted with its usual fervour. Germany would retaliate, he said, 'with the total and radical extermination and elimination of Jewry.'¹⁴⁹ Himmler moved to confirm that threat next day. He ordered the systematic total destruction of the Warsaw Ghetto and all remaining inhabitants.

And on February 19, Hitler issued a proclamation to the troops on the southern front in Russia telling them that the outcome of their battle would determine the fate of the world and that the present and future destiny of Germany lay in their hands. The venom was flowing freely and a few days later, on February 24, responding to the Casablanca Declaration in his annual message to mark the anniversary of the establishment of the Nazi Party, he said that the Jews of London, New York and Moscow had spelled out clearly the fate they planned for the German people. Referring to the bitter struggle which the German army was conducting against the global threat that was devised by the banks of New York and London in conjunction with the Bolshevik Jews in Moscow, he said:

Think what fate would have awaited our people, as Europe as a whole, had we not proclaimed the slogans of the National Socialist revolution that restored the soul of the German people ... Accept my assurance that I myself am guided today by that same fanaticism as then, and it will never leave me as long as I live ... the schemes of our foes and their so-called successes will only reinforce my determination not to shift one step from my path. ... This war will prove beyond any doubt that plutocracy and Bolshevism are the same and that the eternal objective of all Jews is to plunder all nations and to subjugate them as the slaves of their international guild of criminals.¹⁵⁰

The Nazi security forces, the Gestapo and the SS, became even more radicalized and recklessly vicious. In one swoop the Gestapo rounded up the remaining ten thousand Jews living and working in Berlin, most of whom had survived previous roundups because they were in jobs classified as essential. Two thousand of them, mostly men, who were married to German non-Jewish spouses were separated from the single Jews and Jewish couples to be jailed as a temporary measure in a facility on Rosenstrasse in central Berlin. As news of the roundup spread several hundred wives gathered outside the jail demonstrating and chanting: "Give back our husbands!" They were repeatedly threatened and chased away as they continued their demonstration for a week, marching back each time en masse. Eventually, in the only back-down ever on that scale, the Gestapo freed the whole two thousand.¹⁵¹ In the circumstances, that incident undermines the credibility of the pope's repeated claim, supported ad nauseam by most of the Vatican hierarchy, that he could not speak to denounce the oppression and deportation of the Jews nor intervene directly, either internationally or at home, to influence Nazi policy because it would only lead to more deportations and harsh reprisals against the church and its people.

This incident demonstrates, as did each of the earlier campaign against euthanasia (see chapter 24, p. 75); Hitler's known sensitivity to public criticism; and the stealth with which he approached the implementation of the Final Solution after eight years of steadily increased aggression and oppression, that Hitler and the Nazis were responsive to public pressure and public opinion on a coordinated basis. Certainly they manipulated public opinion and sought to suppress public opposition. But in that respect they were no different to either the church throughout its history or each of the powers opposing them. It is therefore reasonable to believe that if the pope had pursued the policy which his predecessor, Pius XI, had tried to initiate before the war erupted, if he had spoken out, and if he had led a program of civil disobedience in the mould of Gandhi in India, although it would not have reversed the entire policy of anti-Semitism it would have had a moderating influence both internationally and in the Third Reich. It could not have reversed the entire policy of anti-Semitism because of the deeply entrenched influence of the church over previous decades and centuries. That is the basic point of the trouble in the triangle and the parody of Mein Kampf. But it would have encouraged and strengthened opposition to the Nazis and the planning of coups against Hitler. It would have undermined the support and recognition which Hitler gained as a result of his anti-Versailles nationalism and his economic policies. And it would have fostered reassessment of the theology which underpins anti-Semitism. That was the key factor. Pius XII could not tolerate any challenge to Roman Catholic theology and self-understanding and that would have been the ultimate consequence of any intervention on behalf of the Jews. We have come to that same point time and time again. The church is like a stealthy leopard and this one cannot camouflage its spots.

In the wake of Casablanca Ribbentrop seems to have believed he could buy time, relieve the political pressure and begin a process of negotiation by a modified approach to the Jewish Question. He adopted an idea from the Legal Department of the Reich Foreign Ministry which had been carried out on a trial basis about six months earlier for the exchange of selected Jews of nationalities other than German for either the repatriation of Nazis held as prisoners by the Allies or other concessions from them. He proposed that 30,000 Jews of British, American, Dutch, Belgian, French, Norwegian and Russian nationality be ‘reserved’ for such exchanges, saying that if the negotiations for such exchanges did not produce results the Jews ‘reserved’ could still be ‘deported’.¹⁵² This provides a basis for believing that Ribbentrop thought it was still possible to reverse the catastrophic drift of the war by encouraging the West Allies to adopt a humanitarian approach to Jewish resettlement.

Whether the Underground Resistance Movements were aware of that decision is not clear, but the third of the radio messages from the Warsaw Ghetto appealed for help in exactly those terms. The gist of the message in early April was an appeal to London, New York, Geneva and Jerusalem: “Storm heaven and earth, alert the world to the annihilation of the Jews, aid the survivors with funds through the underground to maintain the struggle, and rescue them through exchange.”^{153 154}

In mid-April Himmler agreed to Ribbentrop’s proposal except that he reduced the number of Jews to be reserved to 10,000. The first ‘candidates for exchange’ were sent to a ‘sojourn camp’ at Bergen-Belsen in mid-July and a small number of exchanges subsequently took place.¹⁵⁵ Then Himmler, dissatisfied with progress, confirmed his order for the total destruction of the ghetto. For a time the Germans used a different technique to avoid sending their troops into a hail of fire from the ZOB resisters. They required the industrial employers of the remaining Jews to try to persuade them to register for ‘voluntarily resettlement’. Very few did, but ZOB groups responded by burning down some of the factories.¹⁵⁶

At this time Weizmann again approached Churchill in a bid to have the White Paper restrictions on Jewish entry to Palestine relaxed and at a cabinet meeting on April 18, Churchill vigorously attacked the White Paper as “a gross breach of faith.” Next day, April 19, German troops marched into the Warsaw Ghetto to arrest the remaining Jewish resisters and to flush out the estimated 60,000 resident concealed in underground shelters and bunkers, but they were met by a hail of bullets and the exercise ended in the rout of the German unit. By coincidence British and American officials met in conference at Bermuda the same day to draw up new guidelines for dealing with the refugee problem. They may have known about Churchill’s view, but they would not have known of the action in Warsaw where tanks, flame throwers and a battery of field artillery was ordered in to succeed where infantry had failed. In spite of that, intense hand to hand fighting continued in the rubble of the ghetto from Easter Monday for a further five days. The German forces were increased so that about 1,000 poorly equipped but very determined resisters faced 5,000 well equipped troops. The battle was still raging on April 28 when Churchill circulated a note to cabinet challenging the right of the Arab majority to continue denying Jewish immigration into Palestine.¹⁵⁷ Some of the last hundred resisters committed suicide on May 8, then on the 10th about 75 escaped through the sewers, and the last few young men held out until May 16 when one of history's inspiring and truly heroic struggles against uneven odds ended. The ghetto was both a lifeless, blazing wasteland of rubble and a vital, vibrant fact in world history, there was still quite widespread support among non-Jewish Poles for Hitler's policy of 'deportation' and some people had stood and cheered as the artillery pounded the ghetto.^{158 159}

A TURNING POINT

The massive German defeat at Stalingrad was not only the beginning of the end of Hitler's Russian dream, it also signalled, as discussed above, the apparent end of Vatican hopes of a concordat with Hitler-in-victory to Catholicize the Russian Orthodox Church. But in spite of that the Holy See would not give up hope and it would still do nothing to weaken Nazi Germany's effort against Bolshevism which the pope regarded as the greater of the two evils. It would not even criticize the slaughter of the Jews because the pope was caught in another theological bind. If he suddenly did an about face and adopted a strongly humanitarian approach to the Jewish question, openly and publicly supported the Jews, and opposed their deportation and slaughter it would have been another Barthian indictment of the church and its history, both ancient and modern. The church would have been in chaos and its self-understanding and theology would have come under intense challenge. But there was another reason also. Such a stand would have meant a total break with Hitler, the German concordat would have been worthless, and his dream of a take-over of the Russian Church under a concordat agreed with a victorious Hitler – if he was able to recover – could be forgotten. As it was, Hitler was biding his time until the end of the war when he planned to dismantle the church anyway. On the other hand, if the pope held to the historical papal line of Jewish oppression he would have played into Hitler's hands. The church would have been demonstrably fallible and its communities throughout the Western World would have fragmented.

In the circumstances, being either totally opposed to a fundamental reassessment of his self-understanding and messianic theology or simply unable to comprehend the overwhelming need for it, the pope took the only practical course. Within a framework of public silence which left the Catholic Churches in each country free to play politics with their governments, unhindered by guidance from the higher authority to whom they normally turned in such matters of conscience or considerations of morality, he took limited personal action which would not bring him into conflict with Hitler but which could be used to demonstrate that he had taken action to protect the Jews.

On February 19, the day he made his ‘fate of the world’ appeal to the troops on the Eastern Front, the first of a number of student demonstrations against Hitler were held in Munich, and when attempts were made on his life on March 13 and 21 it seemed that the Allied demand for unconditional surrender might do the trick after all. But such things were not to be encouraged. The pope addressed a letter of encouragement to German Catholics in which he reaffirmed his striving for “a true and lasting peace that would safeguard the vital interests of all people.” But the Papal Secretary of State, Maglione, sent a covering note with it to Cardinal Bertram to indicate that whether and when it was published was to be left to the discretion of German bishops. Everything had to be avoided that might give the impression that the Supreme Pontiff wanted to harm Germany.¹⁶⁰ And later in the year Maglione echoed Himmler when he advised the German ambassador that the fate of Europe depended upon “the victorious resistance of Germany at the Russian front.” If the German armies collapsed there the only possible bulwark against Bolshevism would have fallen and European civilization would be lost.¹⁶¹

However, not everyone shared the Vatican’s view on the implications of a Soviet victory on the eastern front. One who did not was the President of the United States, who had developed his own ideas on the means to secure “true and lasting peace.” Soon after Stalingrad, Roosevelt concluded that, the Atlantic Charter notwithstanding, Soviet territorial demands in Poland, Bessarabia, the Baltic states and Finland would have to be conceded. He also concluded that Russian influence would reach farther into Europe. Contrary to the Vatican’s view, however, Roosevelt believed it best to assume that some means could be found to cooperate with the Soviets and that nothing would be lost by trying to work with rather than against them. After all, their help in holding down Germany would be required after the war.

In fact, the Soviet Union provided a key element in his postwar plans for international peace and security. Roosevelt’s so-called “Grand Design” was premised on a ‘concert’ of great powers – in effect, a permanent extension of the wartime alliance. Wilsonian idealism as represented by the League of Nations was in Roosevelt’s opinion unrealistic – as he told journalist Forest Davis in early 1943, the new peace would have to be based on “the factor of power.”¹⁶² The United States, Britain, the Soviet Union and China were to be what he described as the world’s “four policemen” in charge of maintaining order among the less exalted nations in their respective spheres of influence along the lines of the United States’ ‘stewardship’ of the Americas.¹⁶³ Their peacekeeping police work would be performed outside the framework of any proposed international organization, which should itself be composed of an assembly open to all nations and an ‘executive committee’ composed of the great powers.¹⁶⁴

Thus, since victory at Stalingrad meant that the Soviets would probably have the power in Eastern Europe, it was better to acknowledge that fact and work with it than try to force them to toe an American line. That would simultaneously take care of a major source of their security concerns and help demonstrate the West’s benign intentions. That way they could be integrated into the new international peace organization, a working post-war relationship could be maintained, excessive Soviet control of eastern Europe could thereby be avoided, and some degree of respect for the principles of the Atlantic Charter could be upheld.

Of course, there were other elements involved in getting the Soviets to acquiesce in the design. Germany for a start would have to be disarmed and perhaps dismembered, while America's vast economic superiority would be used as an 'inducement' for cooperation – a strategy already being put to effect in generous Lend-Lease terms being afforded to the Soviet Union. Lastly, and not least important, Roosevelt believed that personal diplomacy could win the trust of the Soviet dictator – an approach which had the added advantage of removing Secretary of State Cordell Hull and the State Department from the picture, since they were busy making plans for the pristine Wilsonian Peace which was being promised to the American public and which would have no place at all for things like 'spheres of influence'.¹⁶⁵

However, not all of Roosevelt's Grand Design was based on trust, and just to make sure that everyone would play by his rules he planned to keep the last ace up his sleeve. In a 1942 letter he had outlined the implications of his initial plan for the four policemen. The rest of the world – naturally – "would have to disarm." That, of course, would make the policemen's job much easier, but it wasn't likely to find much support elsewhere. Who would guarantee the policemen could be trusted? That could be taken care of, too: "Two of the world policemen, the USA and Britain, would in addition control the atomic weapon monopoly, and thus be able to force the cooperation of the other superpowers."¹⁶⁶ Just the kind of thought to inspire confidence.

In late 1942, at about the same time the letter was written, steps were taken to see that that thought became a reality. The head of the Manhattan Project, General Groves, was authorized by Roosevelt and Secretary of War Henry Stimson to set up a parallel project known as the Murray Hill Area. The objective of the Murray Hill Area was ambitious but simple: to corner the world market on fissionable materials, and by that means retain for the United States alone capacity to build atomic weapons, which it might then share with its chosen ally, Britain.¹⁶⁷

Roosevelt seems not to have been aware of the contradictions inherent in his policy. Firstly there was the blatant opposition between the ideas of 'force' and 'cooperation' in his atomic and foreign policies which directly undermined his goals, since the need for a security ring around the Soviet Union which could deny access by long range bombers would make control of Eastern Europe paramount once the United States' atomic policy became known. Beyond that, however, there was the problem of reconciling the practicalities of self-determination with Soviet security interests in Eastern Europe. Free elections in the rabidly anti-Soviet countries of Eastern Europe were hardly likely to produce governments which would willingly submit to being locked into a Soviet 'sphere of interest'. Neither were such Governments likely to submit cheerfully to Soviet territorial demands. Thus, either self-determination would have to be forgone, which raised the thorny problem of US public opinion, or the countries of Eastern Europe would have to be convinced to play the game. And that meant reconciling firstly Russian territorial demands with those of the exiled government of Poland.

BERMUDA, PALESTINE AND THE WARSAW GHETTO

The Polish Government-in-exile had been set up in London from the merger of competing groups within weeks of Hitler's invasion in September 1939 and included people drawn from each of the major prewar parties. Driven by the 'two enemies doctrine' which held that there should be no compromise with either the Nazis of Germany or the Bolsheviks of Russia for the sake of national survival, its charter was to achieve the independence of Poland based on the Riga Line boundaries of 1920.¹⁶⁸ In 1941, when Hitler invaded Russia and the Soviet Government and the Polish Government in exile found themselves thrown together to fight a common enemy, the issue of future boundaries therefore had to be addressed. Britain had hosted a long running conference between the two governments but the boundaries issue was not resolved.

In fact, the British had found themselves stuck uncomfortably between a rock and a hard place. The Poles naturally looked to Britain for support because, after all, the records showed that officially the high-minded British Government had declared war on Germany to protect the integrity of Poland's boundaries. Britain could therefore not recognize the partition which had been drawn up in secret by the power against which it declared war before the war had been declared. Neither could it recognize the Russian occupation and annexation of Polish territory on the basis of that secret partition. On the other hand, in Churchill's words, Britain could not force its "new and sorely threatened ally to abandon, even on paper, regions on her frontiers which she had regarded for generations as vital to her security."¹⁶⁹

The outcome was that Britain had pressed General Sikorski and his Government-in-exile to postpone the issue of territorial boundaries "until easier times." The Polish and Russian governments established diplomatic relations, noted that the Soviet-German treaties of 1939 had "lost their validity" and agreed to establish a Polish army in Russia which would be subordinate to the Soviet Supreme Command. Eden then confirmed in the House of Commons that Britain "did not propose to recognize any territorial changes which took place without the free consent and goodwill of the parties concerned," including those in Poland in 1939. However he added that the exchange of notes with Poland and Russia did not involve Britain in "any guarantee of frontiers."¹⁷⁰ But the "easier times" which Churchill hoped would enable a resolution receded into the distance when in early 1943 the Poles' requested the International Red Cross to investigate German charges that the Russians in 1940 had massacred 30,000 Polish officers at Katyn Woods in eastern Poland. In response, the Russians broke off diplomatic relations.¹⁷¹

Into that volatile mix Roosevelt now had to add the ingredients of his own agenda, with all the spice of American domestic politics thrown in, including a large and vocal contingent of Polish-American voters. However, even if he could get the Polish Government-in-exile to see the merit of a compromise with their ideological and religious enemies, the Soviets would have to be convinced to play the game too, and not only in Poland, but the rest of Eastern Europe as well. Already disappointed by the continuing failure of the West to establish a second front in Europe, that was never going to be easy. And with the United States hiding the atomic bomb behind its back, it was unlikely to happen at all.

In January 1943 a special police force of 25,000 members, known as the Milice, had been set up to locate and arrest any Frenchmen suspected of resistance activities and to round up foreign born Jews. It worked in close collaboration with the Gestapo.¹⁷² But with publicity about Hitler's extermination of the Jews more widespread in Britain than the United States, public pressure was building for some action to be taken. The Archbishops of Canterbury, York and Wales, speaking for the entire Anglican Episcopate, called on the government to immediately save the Jews and provide sanctuary for all who could get out of Nazi Europe. A similar appeal was issued jointly by Cardinal Hinsley, Britain's foremost Catholic prelate, Dr J.H. Hertz, the nation's chief rabbi, and John Whale, moderator of the Free Church Federal Council. An all-party delegation from both Houses of Parliament also met with Cabinet leaders to urge prompt action.¹⁷³

Then in March, with the war on the ground now running strongly in the Allies favor and sensing the shifting tide of war, Bulgaria indicated that it may allow Jews to leave for Palestine instead of making the journey east. When Washington raised the matter with London, however, Eden blocked it. He said that if Britain agreed to it then the Jews of the world would expect a similar offer in Poland and Germany. Hitler might well take up such an offer but even if there were enough ships to handle the numbers there was a risk that he would "sneak his agents into the groups." Eden's spurious reasoning was matched across the Atlantic. The previous month Roosevelt's chief military liaison officer, Admiral William Leahy, had vetoed a plan for safe passage for 10,000 Jews from occupied territories to North Africa via Spain ostensibly on the grounds that shipping could not be provided – despite the fact that numerous Allied war cargo vessels were making the return trip to the United States with empty holds.¹⁷⁴

Nevertheless, with intense pressure to solve the Jewish refugee problem continuing, Britain and the US agreed, as already noted, to jointly sponsor an intergovernmental conference on refugees in Bermuda, in April 1943. That conference has been described as just as much "an exercise in futility" as the 1938 Evian Conference. The exercise was essentially another public relations whitewash. About a dozen locations were discussed as possible refugee sanctuaries, including British Guyana, Sesua in the Dominican Republic and Mindanao, an island in the Philippines with a substantial Muslim population, but Palestine was excluded from consideration. As a result, Zionist groups were prevented from taking part.¹⁷⁵ Nevertheless, while they skirted around the major problem of resettlement of displaced Jews and the rescue of Jews from occupied Europe, the participating governments set up the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration (UNRRA) which continues to play a very important role in refugee relief operations in many countries.

However, at the time UNRRA's future role was little consolation to the actors in the black drama being played out in occupied Europe, and still the Allies refused to take any substantial action. Even in December, after the liquidation of the ghettos in Warsaw and a number of other places, when the US State Department finally authorized the transfer of some rescue funds to both Rumania and Vichy France on condition that the British would supply the necessary immigration certificates, Eden again scuttled the rescue plan because of “difficulties in disposing of a considerable number of Jews.”¹⁷⁶

A NEW ‘VITAL FACTOR’ – DEFENCE OF SAUDI ARABIA

At the beginning of the war H.St. John Philby, had proposed that in return for the whole of Palestine being allocated for Jewish settlement the Jewish community would provide twenty million pounds Sterling to enable the resettlement of all Arab Palestinians on other land within the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. The proposal was discussed with both the king and Churchill in 1940 and they were both reported to have been cautiously interested. [Chapter 24] Weizmann and Churchill discussed it again in the context of Jewish help during the Iraqi and Syrian crises and Lord Moyne was asked to discuss it with King Ibn Saud again in December 1942.

When the situation at that time is taken into account it becomes apparent that the timing of the renewed discussions was neither a coincidence nor a spontaneous humanitarian response to the plight of either the Jews of Europe or the Arabs of Palestine. Britain and the United States were still in vigorous competition for the oil resources of the Middle East – and Saudi Arabia in particular – and Britain was desperate to strengthen its hold on the route to Asia and the Pacific via the Suez. On June 21, 1942, six months before the Moyne-Ibn Saud discussions, Rommel and his Panzer Corps rocked Britain and its allies by capturing Tobruk with 33,000 POWs. [Tobruk, in Italian-controlled Libya, had been Britain’s highest priority target in the North African campaign of January 1941 because its capture would provide an alternative to Alexandria from which to ensure naval control of the Eastern Mediterranean, undermine Italy’s ability to hold Abyssinia, and release most of the forces garrisoning Egypt for placement elsewhere.¹⁷⁷] But the fall of Tobruk was potentially even more critical to Britain’s operations east of Suez than had been its capture a year and a half earlier. Hitler’s plan was that German forces from North Africa would link in Syria and Iraq with forces moving through the Caucasus. Six months earlier, on November 28, 1941, the Fuhrer had given the Mufti a personal but confidential undertaking that as soon as German armies reached the southern exit from Caucasia he would announce the liberation of the Arab world and “Germany’s objective would then be solely the destruction of the Jewish element residing in the Arab sphere under the protection of British power.”¹⁷⁸ In forging that link Germany’s armies would cut and hijack Britain’s oil supplies in Iraq and Persia as well as its most direct line of supply and communications with Asia and Australasia,¹⁷⁹ and it would be “the beginning of the end of the British world empire.”¹⁸⁰

Churchill was in Washington in conference with Roosevelt when the surrender occurred. The President immediately ordered the diversion of a squadron of light bombers, forty Hurricane fighter-bombers and ten other bombers already earmarked for China and Russia, to Egypt, together with three hundred tanks and one hundred howitzers, and authorised the re-deployment of the 2 US Armoured Division as well.^{181 182} But, after five weeks of debate about the overall strategy to be adopted and whether the European or Pacific theatres should take priority, the Americans also agreed to open a second front in North Africa as the Allies' top priority, with landings in the French-controlled Morocco and Algeria, to encircle the Italian and German forces in Tunisia and to prevent the reinforcement of the army which was already advancing towards Alexandria and Cairo. The debate, and the conflicts of interest which it exposed, so stirred some sections of the US Army hierarchy that Churchill and Roosevelt were both aware that it could result in the United States withdrawing from the European theatre and concentrating on the war with Japan. When Roosevelt's negotiators were unable to reach agreement with Churchill and the British Chiefs of Staff after three days of conference in London the President exercised his authority as Commander in Chief and directed that a plan be agreed for joint land operations against the Axis powers. Then on July 25, when the nature of a landing in North Africa, Operation Torch, had been agreed he issued instructions that planning should provide for the landing not later than October 30.¹⁸³

In the meantime the British navy planned the evacuation of its Eastern Mediterranean fleet to the Red Sea, south of the Suez Canal, to be out of range of German attack if, as widely expected, Alexandria fell, and on June 25 while Churchill was still in Washington, Rommel's forces reached El Alamein, a mere one hundred kilometres from Alexandria. The situation was so serious that three senior members of the Commons gave notice of a censure motion: "That this House ... has no confidence in the central direction of the war." Next day the month-old report of the mass deportation and slaughter of Jews in Warsaw [see above, this chapter, p. 9] was rebroadcast by the BBC and British authorities in Palestine encouraged the Jewish community to work on schemes to defend the southern approaches to Haifa. The Jews were in no doubt that if the Nazis overran Palestine they would be subject to the same treatment as their coreligionists in Europe.¹⁸⁴ The Holocaust would have been imposed in the Holy Land just as the Fuhrer had promised. While the Commons debated the censure motion on July 1 and 2 the Western Allies were somewhat distracted but Rommel continued his push east, to the Ruweisat Bridge and the former Secretary of State for War, Hore-Belisha, called for the formation of a new government. Referring to the dramatic fall of Singapore he said "In a hundred days we lost our Empire in the Far East" and asked "What will happen in the next one hundred days" if Egypt is lost as well?¹⁸⁵ In spite of widespread disquiet about how Churchill ran both the government and the war, the censure motion was lost by 475 votes to 25 and this strengthened his authority considerably.

On August 4, Churchill was advised that, in the view of the Imperial General Staff, if the Germans succeeded in their drive into the Caucasus and were able to capture the Russian oil fields at Baku and develop a serious threat to the Persian Gulf, it might be necessary to consider abandoning Egypt and North Africa altogether and shifting the British forces from Egypt to the Persian Gulf. If the oil fields of Abadan and Bahrein were lost, Britain's military capability would be cut by twenty percent and this could be more critical than the loss of the Suez Canal.

But then resistance on the Russian front strengthened ... and the Ruweisat Bridge proved to be as far as Rommel got. He attempted to break the British lines at ElAlamein on August 30 and was repulsed. Then, between October 23 and 27 the tide turned when British forces under Montgomery achieved a breakout and took 28,000 POWs in the Battle of ElAlamein. The German retreat began and by November 13 the Allied forces had recaptured Tobruk. A week earlier Operation Torch had begun with American landings at Casablanca, Oran and Algiers. By November 23 American forces were within fifty kilometres of Tunis and the Axis evacuation of North Africa was only a matter of time.

Then on December 17, after information on Nazi atrocities had gradually been filtered out to the world for some time, the British, United States and Russian governments jointly released a formal statement on those atrocities and Hitler's intention to exterminate the Jews of Europe and the occupied territories. General de Gaulle's French National Committee was linked with the three major allies in condemning "in the strongest possible terms this bestial policy of cold-blooded extermination."¹⁸⁷ The statement was couched in terms of a humanitarian appeal for support for the oppressed Jewish community and a justification for total war without negotiation prior to an unconditional surrender, but its most important aspect was an appeal for the Jewish community to put aside its conflict with Britain and the Arabs in Palestine, and to get behind the British and Allied war effort if it wanted to protect the bulk of its coreligionists in Europe. The British and American authorities were working under a tacit agreement that nothing would be done about the future of Palestine until hostilities had ended, but Britain was under extreme pressure and it was walking a tight rope in Palestine and trying to offset attacks from two directions. On one hand the Stern Gang and other extremist Zionist groups had stepped up their terrorist attacks on the British, while on the other hand the Mufti, although apparently disillusioned by his contacts with the Nazis, was maintaining a steady flow of anti-British propaganda to strengthen Arab support for the Palestinians.

In such circumstances Moyne sat down for conversations with Ibn Saud. While no agreement was reached on matters of sovereignty, assistance, resources or Jewish settlement, possibly because there was no formal endorsement from the Allies, and while it is not clear what Moyne reported to Churchill, it is apparent that relations between Britain and Saudi Arabia were quite cordial. Then, with the situation in North Africa greatly improved, and with the threat to the Middle East via the Caucasus receding because of Russian and Allied successes, Churchill and Roosevelt met again, at Casablanca from January 14–24 to refine their strategy for 'the homeward run' of the war. They re-affirmed their policy of enforcing unconditional surrender and that the extinction of Hitler was to take precedence over the defeat of Japan. They agreed that the clearing of the Mediterranean and the invasion of Sicily, direct bombing of Germany and bombing of targets in Southern Europe from bases in North Africa should come before a cross-channel invasion. Under pressure from Churchill, who insisted that no investment would pay a better dividend than aid to Russia,. the Americans also agreed to continue supplies to Russia, provided that the shipping losses on the northern route were not too great.¹⁸⁸ Churchill wanted to ensure that Hitler's route to the Middle East via the Caucasus was blocked and that Russia was subsequently given no reason to dispute Britain's interests in Iran and Iraq. When the Russians relieved Stalingrad on January 31, just a week after the Casablanca Conference ended, with massive losses for the Germans, Churchill's concern about the route through the Caucasus was virtually resolved. So was the Allies' potential fuel crisis because the German defeat at Stalingrad meant that the Baku oil fields in the southern Caucasus would remain in Russia's hands and not pass to Germany. Similarly, with the Middle East and its oil fields secure, and with fear of Britain losing control of the Suez Canal and its communications with Asia and Australasia receding rapidly, fear of the Holocaust being imposed in Palestine was also receding rapidly.

Standard Oil of California and the Texas Oil Company then reached for the panic button. On February 8, 1943, with the British army closing in on Tunisia alongside the Americans, the two companies advised the US Government that the Saudi Arabian oil pool was one of the biggest in the world. They said that because of "present arrangements" British influence was increasing and concessions held by the American companies could be cancelled and given to the British. The term "present arrangements" certainly included the agreement under which Lend Lease loans to Saudi Arabia were channelled through Britain, and Britain's efforts to broker an agreement between the Zionists and Ibn Saud, but it probably also reflected the growing and unsettling influence of Zionist groups in the US, their support for the Biltmore Program and Britain's generally improving position as discussed at the Casablanca Conference. On February 18, a mere ten days later, Roosevelt responded to those approaches and formally declared that "the defence of Saudi Arabia is vital to the defence of the United States" and directed that Lend Lease aid henceforth be made available directly to Saudi Arabia.¹⁸⁹ At one stroke, taking full advantage of war time circumstances and the involvement of the Zionist community, he had converted the United States policy of economic imperialism in the region from covert to overt and ensured that US self interest would be entangled with, and would dominate, the politics of the region for a very long period.

It was, in fact, a gross overstatement to say that the defence of Saudi Arabia was vital to the defence of the United States. Such a statement made in relation to Britain and its dependence on the Middle East was, as we have seen repeatedly, quite accurate because of the consequences of the policies of corporate greed and national imperialism which it had pursued and the relationships which it had established, manipulated and damaged over an extended period. But Britain could not make, and did not want to make, such a statement because of the consequences of drawing attention to it. In due course the statement of 'vital interest' would come to apply to the United States for exactly the same reasons that it applied to Britain. However in 1943 the United States sat like a colossus over the world's oil supplies. Its supply policies had been a factor in both the conduct of World War I and the development of international relationships during the period between the two wars. Its declaration about Saudi Arabia was simply a domestic legislative and political step required to enable the government to take action to secure control of resources in another country (in both the American national interest and in the commercial interest of the American corporations involved) and to retain its grip on the world's oil supplies as the new pattern of international relationships unfolded. It was no more and no less than a blatant foreign resources grab. It is an intriguing aspect of the trouble in the triangle that there were plenty of warning bells ringing but the United States administration, while it appears to have recognized the basic issues involved, chose to turn a deaf ear to them just as Britain had done when it contemplated its duplicitous arrangements in the Middle East during World War I. Regardless of the philosophy enshrined in its Declaration of Independence, the United States seemed hell-bent on proving that its economic imperialism would become more pervasive than the colonial imperialism of any of the European powers.

At this time, with Hitler's overall position being rapidly undermined, he became even more determined to succeed in the European portion of his Jewish program. Deportations and mass executions increased accordingly and so did Zionist determination to secure a Jewish National Home in Palestine and their pressure on both the British and US governments. The vicious circle became tighter and tighter. Each party's determination fueled the other's. So, recognizing that the US was about to become the predominant player in his region, and concerned at the vigour of Zionist agitation in the United States, Ibn Saud sent a message to Roosevelt in April, followed by a letter at the beginning of May, asking that he be given advance information of "any steps of an affirmative character contemplated by the American Government with respect to Palestine." Roosevelt did not reply immediately. While he sat on it the remaining 238,000 German and Italian troops in Tunisia (the bulk of the Axis forces in North Africa) surrendered on May 9. By May 12 a total of about 252,000 German and Italian troops were taken prisoner, and the basis for strategy planning and regional economic politicking lurched dramatically. Churchill and Roosevelt therefore met again in Washington from May 12 to 26. On the closing day of their meeting Roosevelt replied to Ibn Saud, and Churchill left to visit North Africa for the next week. The two leaders had agreed on basic arrangements for the invasion of Sicily first, then Italy, followed by a cross-channel invasion which was set for not later than May 1, 1944. In his reply to Ibn Saud, Roosevelt said it would be "highly desirable" if the Arabs and the Jews reached a friendly understanding on Palestine through their own efforts during the war. In any event, he said, it was the American Government's view that "no decision altering the basic situation of Palestine should be reached without fully consulting with both Jews and Arabs."¹⁹⁰ That was a view in which he would have been confident of the pope's support. In fact in a letter to Ambassador Myron Taylor a few weeks later the Apostolic Delegate to Washington, Archbishop A.G. Cicognani, wrote:

If a Hebrew home is desired it would not be too difficult to find a more fitting territory than Palestine. With an increase in the Jewish population there, grave, new international problems would arise. Catholics the world over would be aroused. The Holy See would be saddened and justly so, by such a move.¹⁹¹

MYSTICI CORPORIS CHRISTI

Not everyone was happy with the new strategic considerations. The anticipated invasion of Italy caused the pope quite a bit of anxiety, and on May 18 he appealed to Roosevelt not to bomb Rome. There had previously been much discussion on the subject with the British, through Osborne, and this had led to acrimonious debate about whether the pope and the curia should leave the city to ensure their safety, or leave the lights of St. Peters on – to guide British bombers to military and industrial targets and away from the Vatican.¹⁹² However after some hesitation the president agreed to avoid it “as far as was humanly possible.”

By that time many millions of people had been made homeless by total war around them which was not of their making, while others were being degraded and traumatized by capture, imprisonment and torture or internment, and others were simply being slaughtered by being consigned to the gas chambers. The world was therefore crying out for the help of refugee services and resettlement aid. The Refugee Committee of the Provisional World Council of Churches, UNRRA and other church bodies, including those of the Roman Catholic Church, were doing much fine work, as was the Red Cross, in spite of being caught up in collaboration with the Nazis in some respects, but Pius XII had his mind on other things. The power and authority of the church. It was time for another round of doctrinal pronouncements.

On June 29 he issued the encyclical Mystici Corporis Christi, defining the church as the mystical body of Christ and reinforcing the self-understanding which had contributed so dramatically to the trouble in the triangle and the parody of Mein Kampf. Supposedly written to inspire confidence in the institution of the Catholic Church, acceptance of its doctrine and dogma, and recognition of the authority of the clergy, it reads as if he was deliberately widening the gulf between Christians and their partners in the triangle of messianic faiths by adding concepts which were even more objectionable to them than some of those already spawned by the church’s fertile imagination. Perhaps he was trying to distance the faithful still further from both the Jews, whom Hitler was intent on eliminating – because of the conduct of the amorphous Christian gel – and the Muslims, who had been forced into an uncomfortable alliance with Hitler by the conduct of the same amorphous Christian gel. He certainly succeeded in widening the gulf with a document which was totally consistent with the thrust of his earlier encyclicals which we have examined.

Pius XII insisted that the old law was dead, with the clear implication that if the law was dead then those who followed it were of no account.

And first of all, by the death of Our Redeemer, the New Testament took the place of the Old Law which had been abolished; then the Law of Christ, together with its mysteries, laws, institutions and sacred rites, was ratified for the whole world in the blood of Jesus Christ. For, while Our Divine Saviour was preaching in a restricted area – He was not sent but to the sheep that were lost of the house of Israel – the Law and the Gospel were together in force; but on the gibbet of His death Jesus made void the Law with its decrees, fastened the handwriting of the Old Testament to the Cross, establishing the New Testament in His blood, shed for the whole human race.¹⁹³

The gymnastics required to accommodate that passage alongside the words attributed to Jesus of Nazareth in Matthew 5:17–19 are remarkable.

*Do not imagine that I have come to abolish the Law or the Prophets. I have come not to abolish but to complete them. I tell you solemnly, till heaven and earth disappear, not one dot, not one little stroke, shall disappear from the Law until its purpose is achieved. Therefore, the man who infringes even one of the least of these commandments and teaches others to do the same will be considered the least in the kingdom of heaven; but the man who keeps them and teaches them will be considered great in the kingdom of heaven.*¹⁹⁴

The arrogance of the claims for the power and authority of the church for which there is no Biblical justification and the anti-Semitic undertones which run through the section ‘The Church and the Cross’ are quite disturbing.

*But if Our Saviour, by His death, became, in the full and complete sense of the word, the Head of the Church, it was likewise through His blood that the Church was endowed with that fullest communication of the Holy Spirit, through which from the time when the Son of Man was lifted up and glorified on the gibbet by His suffering, she is divinely illumined. For then, as Augustine notes, with the rending of the veil of the temple, it happened that the dew of the Paraclete’s gifts, which heretofore had descended only on the fleece – that is, on the people of Israel – fell copiously and abundantly (while the fleece remained dry and deserted) on the whole earth – that is, on the Catholic Church – which is confined by no boundaries of race or territory. Just as at the first moment of the Incarnation the Son of the Eternal Father adorned with the fullness of the Holy Spirit the human nature which was substantially united to Him, that it might be a fitting instrument of the Divinity in the sanguinary task of the Redemption, so at the hour of His precious death He wished that His Church should be enriched with the abundant gifts of the Paraclete, in order that, in dispensing the divine fruits of the Redemption, it might be for the Incarnate Word a powerful instrument that would certainly never fail. For the juridical mission of the Church and the power to teach, govern, and administer the sacraments derive their supernatural efficacy and force for the building up of the Body of Christ from the fact that Jesus Christ, hanging on the Cross, opened up to His Church the fountain of divine graces, which protect it from ever teaching men false doctrine, and enable it to rule them for their soul’s salvation through supernaturally enlightened pastors and to bestow on them abundant heavenly graces.*¹⁹⁵

Self-indoctrination or delusion reached a new peak in the section ‘Peter, the Visible Head’, for which he drew on the equally pathetic bull ‘Unam Sanctam’ written in 1302 while the Inquisition raged and while Boniface VIII fought pitched battles and slanging matches with the kings of France and England over the authority to make laws, wage wars and levy taxes. In one of his more flamboyant moments Hitler had claimed to be semi-divine, a superman set midway between God and man. On another occasion he said he understood himself to be another Christ, called by destiny, and that he would be called away when his mission was finished,¹⁹⁶ but now it was as if Pius XII was trying to out-rank him. Basing his claim on the words of Boniface VIII, he claimed to be as one with Christ because “Christ and His Vicar constitute one only Head.” As it was, and is, the basis of the church’s theology and selfunderstanding that Christ is an integral being in the Triune God, both Boniface VIII and Pius XII claimed ultimate authority and left no room for a higher role in the divine plan. Boniface had closed his bull with the statement:

*Whoever therefore resists this power thus ordained of God, resists the ordinance of God. ... Furthermore we declare, state, define and pronounce that it is altogether necessary to salvation for every human creature to be subject to the Roman pontiff.*¹⁹⁷

That statement had been fundamental to both the progressive worsening of the trouble in the triangle and the push for reformation. It is therefore pathetic that Pius XII could confirm that Rome was clinging to it four hundred years after the Reformation, and that he could use it for yet another attack on both the Reformers and the Jews at a time when the Protestants of the Ecumenical Movement were trying, at last, to assist the Jews whose desperate need for help and their self-help solutions were consequences of such attacks over a very long period. His words were:

*Our Divine Redeemer also governs His Mystical Body in a visible way and ordinarily through His Vicar on earth. ... That Christ and His Vicar constitute one only Head is the solemn teaching of Our predecessor of immortal memory, Boniface VIII, in the Apostolic Letter, "Unam Sanctum"; and his successors have never ceased to repeat the same. They, therefore, walk the path of dangerous error who believe that they can accept Christ as the Head of the Church, while they reject genuine loyalty to His Vicar on earth. They have taken away the visible head, broken the visible bonds of unity, and they leave the Mystical Body of the Redeemer in such obscurity and so maimed, that those who are seeking the haven of eternal salvation cannot see it and cannot find it.*¹⁹⁸

But as disturbing as those sections are, they must be read in conjunction with the following section, 'Sinners in the Church', which is little more than a justification for the Pope's silence on the slaughter of the Jews and the church's continued collaboration with Hitler, and even an apologia for the Holocaust itself.

The fact that the Body of the Church bears the august name of Christ must not lead anyone to suppose that, also during this time of its earthly pilgrimage, its membership is restricted to those who are eminent in sanctity, or that it is composed only of those whom God has predestined to eternal beatitude. For it is in keeping with the infinite mercy of our Saviour that He does not here refuse a place in His mystical Body to those whom He formerly admitted to His table. Schism, heresy, or apostasy are such of their very nature that they sever a man from the Body of the Church; but not every sin, even the most grievous, is of such a kind. Nor does all life depart from those who, though by sin they have lost charity and divine grace and are consequently no longer capable of a supernatural reward, nevertheless retain Christian faith and hope, and, illumined by heavenly light, are moved by the inner promptings and stirrings of the Holy Spirit to conceive a salutary fear and divinely urged to prayer and repentance of their sin.

Let all men, therefore, abhor sin, which defiles the mystical members of the Redeemer; but should anyone have unhappily fallen, and if he has not by his obstinacy rendered himself unworthy of the fellowship of the faithful, then let him be welcomed most lovingly, and let a practical charity see in him a frail member of Jesus Christ. For it is better, as St. Augustine says, "to be healed within the organism of the Church than to be cut off from its body as an incurable member." "So long as a member still adheres to the body its cure is not beyond all hope; but if it has been cut off it cannot be cured or made whole."^{199 200} [Emphasis added in each case.]

The 60–page encyclical included another call for Protestants, the ‘unworthy separated’ who, although shut off from salvation by denying the Catholic faith, nevertheless named Christ as Saviour, to hasten to “the one Head in the society of glorious love” and to return to their Father’s House. It also included a condemnation of conversion and baptism under coercion saying that, endowed as they are with free will, men may misuse their freedom “under the impulse of mental doubts and base desires.”²⁰¹ Marranos-style baptisms for the sake of saving a few Jews from the gas chambers was definitely not encouraged. Relating that point to the pope’s “weighty pronouncement ... (of) ... profound grief that death is sometimes inflicted upon the deformed, the mentally defective, and those suffering from hereditary disease, on the plea that they are an intolerable burden upon society” and his “total silence in the document on the vast atrocity of the Shoah in progress,” Cornwell says “his attempts to identify the people of God with papal allegiance – was inimical to a sense of responsibility for, and common identity with, the Jews of Europe.” And further: “... his version of the doctrine of the Mystical Body deepened his convictions about the papal ideology of power and confirmed his prejudice that non-Catholics were alien to the people of God.”²⁰²

With the invasion of Italy apparently imminent the Pope was more desperate than ever to protect the city overall, but the Vatican and St. Peters in particular. He believed that his continuing presence in the city was one way to avoid bombing, and it could be that one of his motives behind the preparation of Mystici Corporis Christi was to deepen the feeling of awe with which the history and character of the Vatican engulfed Rome and thereby raise another psychological barrier for the Allies to hurdle if they planned to bomb it. But now he even suggested that Mussolini ought leave Rome so that his presence would not make it a prime target. He didn’t. He stayed.

... BACK TO THE ‘VITAL SECURITY’ QUESTION

Undeterred by the complexity of events around them, the two oil companies, Standard Oil of California and the Texas Oil Company, were determined to achieve their coup in the oil fields and the mechanism by which they did so was simple. On June 8, with Britain and the US in dispute over who should build and finance oil pipelines in the Middle East, and on what conditions, the US Joint Chiefs of Staff, working on data from the oil industry, advised Roosevelt that the country’s petroleum reserves were becoming ‘dangerously depleted’ and that steps should be taken to guarantee supplies outside of the US. The American government was flexing its muscles and the action came thick and fast. On the 10th the Petroleum Administrator for War, H.L. Ickes, advised that the shortage would be felt by the end of 1944 and that it was imperative that the government take immediate action to acquire a proprietary and managerial interest in foreign petroleum reserves. He proposed that a Petroleum Reserves Corporation (PRC) be established and that in the first instance it acquire an interest in the concessions held by an American company in Saudi Arabia. On the 12th the Interdepartmental War Committee agreed to the proposal and the State Department added the weight of its diplomatic reasoning. By June 30 the PRC had been formally constituted and instructed to proceed, in accordance with departmental recommendations, to obtain the entire Saudi Arabian concession by the total purchase of the Californian-Arabia Standard Oil Company. The joint owners of that company, Standard Oil of California and the Texas Oil Company were to be compensated either in cash or with a share of the oil produced. But neither of the companies had been privy to that part of the discussion and they were not at all eager to forfeit to the government the nest-egg which they had just gained with the government's help. Formal talks opened on July 14 and continued with much strain and politicking until the administration broke off negotiations at the end of October and abandoned its plan to gain control of all of the Saudi Arabian concessions.

In the meantime the Anglo-Shell Oil Company had taken full advantage of the Tripartite Pact to open negotiations for concessions in south east Persia, and Venezuela had taken full advantage of the stated 'production shortfall' in the United States to increase royalties to sixteen and two thirds percent and to impose income tax on oil companies as well. Fearful that the US could lose the upper hand in the oil stakes, Hull advised Socony-Vacuum on November 15, 1942, that the US government favoured the development of all possible outside sources of petroleum. He said that as the US had no agreement with Britain that it would not seek concessions in Persia, the company was free to negotiate with the Persian government. The competition for control of oil resources throughout the Middle East which had started fifty years earlier, which had always been bitter, and which had been a major factor behind Britain's Balfour Declaration, was hotting up even more.

While the US administration was doing its PRC committee work in July, Roosevelt sent a Middle East expert, Colonel Harold Hoskins, to Saudi Arabia to enquire whether Ibn Saud would enter into direct discussions on the future of Palestine with either Weizmann or a representative of the Jewish Agency. Hoskins had already advised the president that relations between the Jewish and Arab communities could collapse in open conflict so he was not surprised that the king declined. He could not speak for Palestine, the king said, let alone deliver it to the Jews, even if he were willing to consider such a proposal.²⁰³ His categorical rejection of the request was prompted by what he regarded as Weizmann's attempt to bribe him with an offer of twenty million pounds Sterling – incorrectly said to be guaranteed by Roosevelt – during the first year of the war. In the light of that experience Roosevelt urged that a trusteeship be established for the Holy Land with a Jew, a Christian and a Muslim as the responsible trustees.²⁰⁴

Then two quite independent initiatives which were to have an enormous influence in accelerating the relentless push towards the establishment of a Jewish National Home in Palestine were taken coincidentally with Hoskin's visit to Saudi Arabia in July. At Churchill's insistence the British government set up a special cabinet committee to re-examine the future of Palestine, and in the United States the specially elected American Jewish Conference met in a crisis atmosphere to determine a means of rescuing the balance of Europe's Jewish population.

When the United States had finally become embroiled in Europe's war between Christians fighting over the fate of Jews the Zionist lobby had set aside its earlier reluctance to campaign publicly in support of the war against Hitler and assumed a much higher public and political profile. Then after the Biltmore Conference it rapidly became more vocal and more militant in its demands that the United States support the plan for a Jewish State in Palestine, and by the time of Hoskin's meeting with Ibn Saud its leader, Rabbi Silver, was determined to force a resolution to that effect through the American Jewish Conference. He succeeded, but in such divisive circumstances that the conference could not be sustained as a permanent umbrella organization.²⁰⁵

Silver and his supporters, no doubt influenced by the messages they were receiving from the Underground in Europe, then determined to storm Capitol Hill and ensure that both houses of Congress passed resolutions that would commit the US irrevocably to making Palestine a "free and democratic Jewish Commonwealth." The process of getting such resolutions sponsored and through committee and congressional hearings to the final votes was bound to be long and in the meantime the Jewish Agency in Palestine and its associates, the Haganah and the Irgun, extended their programs of direct action against British and Arab interests. Calls for Britain to quit Palestine and for the United States to assume the temporary mandate were commonplace, as was sabotage by the Irgun and the Stern Gang. A struggle developed between Weizmann, who wanted to wait until the end of the war and rely on Churchill's support for a smooth transition to a Jewish State, and those who wanted to force an American initiative immediately.²⁰⁶

TIME FOR CHANGE IN ITALY

The mass bombing of Rome which began with a raid by five hundred US bombers on July 19 sealed Mussolini's fate. The king and the army wanted him out. On July 25 the Duce was dismissed by the king with the collaboration of both the army and the Fascist Grand Council, specially convened for the first time since 1939, on the grounds of incompetence and the failure of his policies. Mussolini was replaced by Marshall Badoglio who, much to Hitler's annoyance, immediately sought an armistice with the Allies. But an armistice was not signed for another six weeks for two reasons.

One reason for the delay was the confusion caused by Roosevelt's 'top of the head' announcement at the Casablanca Conference that no deals would be done with any Axis power and that their surrender must be unconditional.^{207 208} The other reason was continuing disagreement between the United States and Britain about the need for an invasion of Italy. Initially the US did not want a cross-Mediterranean invasion at all. It had changed its position and wanted to divert more resources to the war against Japan, and it was content to bottle up Italy until it was time to throw all of the resources available at Germany via the shortest route – a cross-channel invasion. It had reluctantly agreed to an invasion of Italy and then, when victory in North Africa came more quickly than expected, it was not ready to push on across the Mediterranean. On the other hand Britain, not being accustomed to material resources on the scale then available to the US, preferred to fragment Hitler's defences by opening a Mediterranean front before the planned cross-channel invasion into the teeth of Germany's forces. Both issues took some time to work through.²⁰⁹ It was time for another conference, and that period of uncertainty gave Hitler the initiative and German forces consolidated their position in Italy

The Vatican was pleased by the invasion delay, too. It had its friends to protect. The College of San degli Illirici had been the home for Croatian priests receiving Vatican-sponsored theological education and a home-away-from-home for Ustashe guests of the Vatican. About this time a Croatian seminary professor, Fr. Krunoslav Dragonovic, arrived at the college on the pretext of working for the Red Cross. But according to US intelligence sources Dragonovic was "alter ego" to the ruthless Ustashe dictator Pavelic who had visited Rome with the blood of Croatia's Jews and Orthodox Christians on his hands to sign a treaty with Mussolini and to enjoy a 'devotional audience' with Pius XII soon after he had been installed by Hitler. (See above, chapter 24, p. 47 ff.) Those US intelligence sources also say that his real role was to coordinate Italian-Croatian cooperation, to set up an escape route for former Ustashe to Latin America, and to launder some $US80 million in treasure looted by the Ustashe and stored with its archives in the Vatican. Working from the same office he later helped US Counter-Intelligence organize the escape of anti-Communist informants and the former head of the Gestapo in Lyons, Klaus Barbie.²¹⁰

THE QUEBEC CONFERENCE

Such was the situation on August 4, 1943, when Churchill left London with a party of more than 250 persons, among whom there were ministers, key defence personnel, political advisers, personal staff and a host of orderlies, for another round of talks with Roosevelt and their opposite numbers, this time in Quebec, Canada. Quebec was chosen as the conference venue very carefully. It was on neutral ground – neither in the United States or Britain – which was important in presenting an image of equality in the Allied partnership, especially as the Soviet leader could not be present. It was in a British Commonwealth country so that the Commonwealth gained some recognition, even though the decision had been taken quite deliberately to exclude them and other allies from the conference, and it was predominantly Catholic so, in spite of the Allies' very strained relations with the Vatican, some diplomatic and psychological benefits were possible. But Quebec was also French speaking so that recognition was given to French involvement in the war, even though Britain and the United States were locked in disagreement over the status of the Free French and relations with them.

The British Government wanted to recognize the Free French and the Committee of National Liberation in Algiers as the sole legitimate political and military authority in French affairs. Given that status, the Committee of Liberation would automatically assume the role of the recognized government of France, in place of the Vichy French regime, immediately Allied forces occupied French territory. Continuity would thus be given, at least in appearance, to French colonial authority and administration. Such recognition would have strengthened Britain's claims to the same status and authority in its colonies at the end of the war, irrespective of whether there had been uninterrupted British administration or not.

On the other hand the United States made much of the division between de Gaulle and Giraud in the French Committee of National Liberation and was concerned about de Gaulle's "flirtations with Communist elements." It wanted to deal with whichever authority it saw fit in any particular situation, both during and after the war. In addition, the automatic recognition of a continuing French role was not consistent with the Atlantic Charter any more than was the automatic recognition of a continuing British role. The US therefore wanted only a formula based on cooperation with the committee and not recognition of it. However on August 24, at the final plenary meeting of the Quebec Conference and after what Churchill described as "stubborn talking" on his part, the United States agreed to endorse a form of political recognition of the committee, but in its own terms and not in a joint declaration with Britain.²¹¹

SECRET A-BOMB AGREEMENT

Among the other decisions taken by Roosevelt and Churchill in private discussions during the Quebec Conference was one which remained secret for some time but which was to have enormous consequences for the future of humanity. They agreed to return to joint development of an atomic bomb after a break of almost a year during which their countries had each gone their own way. They agreed that neither would withhold any information on the project from the other, but neither would communicate any information to a third party without the consent of the other. They also agreed that neither would use an atomic weapon against the other, and that neither would use one against another party without each other's consent. It was arranged that all development work would be carried out in the United States and Churchill expressly disclaimed any interest in postwar industrial and commercial advantages of atomic research and development "beyond what may be considered by the President of the United States to be fair and just in harmony with the economic welfare of the world."²¹²

The third party information clauses were aimed specifically at ensuring that there would be no further contact between British and Soviet scientists working in the field of nuclear physics. Late in 1942, after they had been partners together in the war against Germany for a year and a half, Britain and the Soviet Union had agreed to exchange new weapons and any which might be discovered in the future.²¹³ But American fear of breaches of military security was such that when Roosevelt learned of the Anglo-Russian agreement he endorsed a policy of limiting the interchange of information with Britain on atomic matters, and it was only the knowledge that such a policy undermined cooperation in other respects and retarded nuclear research and the development of the bomb that led to renewed cooperation. Within a few weeks of the decision at Quebec a team of 19 British scientists was ready to join their colleagues in the US ^{214 215 216} The nature and timing of the Roosevelt-Churchill agreement on atomic research is very revealing, and the fact that the agreement was made at all had enormous implications.

First. It is apparent that Churchill was prepared to forego the rights to patents and royalties from several years of nuclear research in spite of the potential uses which even then were apparent to scientists and in spite of the enormous international prestige which would flow to the country or countries which held the nuclear reins at war's end. His decision led to very acrimonious debate in Britain but it demonstrates that, for all his deeply ingrained imperialism, his only real interest in the development of nuclear technology was the production of a bomb which would ensure the defeat of Hitler. Linked with the Anglo-Russian weapons agreement, to which the Americans took such exception, it indicates that in spite of the historical antagonism between them and their opposed political and economic systems, the leaders of those two countries were prepared to cooperate without restriction in matters touching the very heart of national identity and security. Regrettably that would soon change under the weight of circumstances.

Second. America's insistence on the first fruits of industrial and commercial developments in the post war period and its insistence on absolute secrecy, even from its closest allies, confirmed that it saw nuclear development in terms of the motives and benefits which were paraded in front of Roosevelt to gain his support for research in 1939: to gain military, political and economic domination of the world, with the means of maintaining that position.

Third. America's insistence on the dismantling of the Anglo-Russian weapons agreement confirmed that despite Roosevelt's apparent desire for the continuation of cooperation after the war there would be little relaxation of the mistrust and antagonism between the US-led Democratic Capitalist countries and the Soviet-led Socialist International, even if they achieved victory over their common enemies, Nazism and Fascism, through temporary cooperation and a joint military effort. And further, as a consequence of that mistrust, it ensured that military, scientific and diplomatic spying would be developed to near perfection by the major powers as a means of either retaining superiority or attaining comparable capacity in nuclear science. Spying ceased to be seen as simply an aid to the implementation of policy and became, in turn, the justification for further political and military action and the cause for even deeper mistrust. The cats chased their tails in ever tightening circles. ^{217 218 219 220}

America's leaders were naive indeed if they thought that the rest of the world would sit back and without a whimper, let alone a struggle, permit a situation in which the US, either on its own or in collaboration with Britain, could act as the final arbiter of the political and economic affairs of the world because of a semi-exclusive nuclear capacity. It might placate the world for a while by saying that it was ‘acting as the international peace keeping policeman’ but the reality of the situation would soon become apparent.

In other words, American insistence on the dismantling of the Anglo-Russian weapons agreement confirmed that at rock bottom little had really changed in the relationship between the United States and the first Communist nation; that the determination to keep the Soviet Union in the technical, political, military and economic shadows had only been transformed into a determination to keep it on a leash; and that deep seated greed, the fear that it might not achieve a position of pre-eminence, and inherent mistrust of Communism were still basic to the US attitude. By riding rough-shod over the Anglo-Russian weapons agreement the United States had shown its determination to sit astride the world’s political and economic dung heap when the war was over. That decision set the ground rules for future international competition and was one of the most important factors in the evolution of the cold war and perhaps the most important single factor in the evolution of the arms race.

If, instead of imposing that policy, the United States had agreed to a policy of either common weapons development or the exchange of technical information there would have been greater cohesion in the anti-Nazi effort and much less likelihood of the stand-off which occurred, with US forces under orders to secure the German weapons research establishments before the Russians could do so and to take the key German physicists in custody to England.^{221 222} Certainly the course of the final stages of the Second World War and the post war period would have been greatly different. Those policies and actions of both the ‘New Israel’ and the Vatican which were aimed at undermining and isolating Communist or Socialist governments reflected both their separate self-understandings and their influence within the amorphous Christian gel and compounded the trouble in the triangle very greatly.

In fact the superiority in nuclear technology which the United States sought and did achieve was maintained, in a practical sense, for a much shorter period than American politicians had hoped. Having had the benefit of the research skills and knowledge of almost the entire community of German émigré nuclear physicists, and a joint development effort with Britain, the United States was able to explode its first nuclear device on July 16, 1945.²²³ Soviet Russia exploded its corresponding device just over four years later, in the last week of August 1949.²²⁴ It has been estimated that all the information passed to Russia by scientists working on British or American projects shortened the Russian bomb development program by only eighteen months. The four-year technology gap then narrowed rapidly as both countries pushed on to develop the Hydrogen or ‘super’ bomb. The US successfully tested an H-bomb in the Pacific on November 1, 1952, a mere nine months before the Russians on August 12, 1953.

Technical parity then being the order of the day, the United States lost the position of absolute dominance which it sought. In the political circumstances of the time, the world had to become accustomed to peace-by-balance-of-terror as the race was stepped up for superiority in numbers and power of nuclear weapons deployed within opposing alliances. In the meantime, in 1947, Russia had become the first country to build and operate a nuclear reactor which could be adapted for peaceful purposes such as the commercial production of electricity.²²⁵ However the urgency of its race to catch up with the United States contributed to the Soviet Union's relatively greater neglect of safety considerations, pollution and radiation control, its cost cutting and technical short cuts. This in turn contributed to the spate of nuclear accidents between the 1950s and the 1990s, and the nuclear contamination crises which affected countries right across northern Europe, the consequences of which are not yet all apparent. However, while it can be argued that the immediate responsibility for these crises rests with the Soviet authorities who took the decisions involved, it is also clear that the responsibility must be shared by the powers which started the contest by trying to maintain their own position of privilege at the expense of others and by suppressing the aspirations of others. Ultimately the nuclear crisis is a fundamental consequence of the trouble in the triangle and the self-understanding of the amorphous Christian gel, and responsibility must be shared accordingly. But we have jumped ahead a bit.

When Roosevelt and Churchill penned their secret agreement during the Quebec Conference the nuclear arms race was still a thing of the future. But before the end of the conference on August 24 events of more immediate consequence occurred in other parts of the world. (Churchill did not arrive back in Britain until September 20 after a round of engagements in Washington and elsewhere.) On August 1 the Japanese granted independence to the State of Burma, but the civil government under Dr Ba Maw as head of state soon found that it enjoyed little more authority than the Lebanese and Syrians had under the Free French and had little influence on the nature of the Japanese occupation or exploitation.²²⁶ In Indonesia the Japanese forces of occupation included a contingent of Japanese Muslims whose work included assisting the formation of the Consultative Council of Indonesian Muslims, the Masjumi. The new body largely administered the country's religious affairs and also set up a paramilitary Hizbullah, the Army of Allah. The 'New Order' in East Asia was being established in name but, in the circumstances of the war, the practice was not keeping pace with the theory any more than it was in the European theatre.

In the Soviet Union, Stalin continued the relaxation of controls on the church which had been triggered by Hitler's invasion and further encouraged by the need to appease Western opinion in the light of the development and recognition of the Atlantic Charter. On September 4 the Orthodox Church was authorized to re-establish the Patriarchate and Sergius was subsequently elected Patriarch. The training of clergy resumed, and councils were established to oversee the affairs of the Orthodox Church and other religious cults. In contrast, the Uniate Church which was in communion with Rome was liquidated.²²⁷ ²²⁸ There was to be no mechanism through which the Vatican could directly interfere in Soviet affairs and no encouragement for it to bid for concordats, with or without Hitler. For the Allies as well as the Pope, however, the Italian armistice was a much more important issue.

THE ITALIAN ARMISTICE AND THE JEWS OF ROME

The Italian Armistice was not only about to make Hitler spread his own forces over the total fighting fronts and to turn the tide distinctly in the Allies' favor: it was also about to set up a couple of considerable challenges for the Church in Rome. After protracted negotiations the Allies finally signed the armistice on September 3, the day the invasion of mainland Italy began, but with the condition that it would not be made public until five days later, September 8. Hitler fumed about the treachery of both Badoglio and the pope and ordered that Rome be occupied immediately.^{229 230} Next day, September 9, he called the commander of the SS and German police in Italy, Karl Friedrich Otto Wolff, to the 'Wolf's Lair' and ordered him to occupy the Vatican and "transfer" the pope to Liechtenstein. Wolff realized the enormous backlash there would have been from Catholics on both sides of the battle lines and found excuses to defer the operation. Rome was occupied by German forces two days later and next day, September 12, Mussolini was rescued, to be set up later by Hitler as leader of a puppet republic of Sato in occupied northern Italy.

The SS commander in Rome, Major Herbert Kappler, was soon given a special job to do: organize a roundup of Jews to correct Mussolini's failure while in office. Kappler received his orders about September 21, but, like Wolff, and supported by the commander of the Italian theatre, Field Marshal Kesselring, he procrastinated. He devised a scheme to show that he was exploiting the Jews in the hope that he could avoid his orders. He ordered the Jewish leaders to produce fifty kilograms of gold within 36 hours. The collection began at 11 a.m. on September 27. When the initial response was poor and it looked as if the target might not be reached an emissary was despatched to seek help from the Curia. At 4 p.m. advice was received through a priest of the Sacred Heart Convent that the pope had authorized a loan sufficient to buy what ever gold was still needed. It was to be a loan, not a gift, he said, adding: "It is obvious, we want it back." However the trickle turned into a torrent of gifts of rings, medals and jewellery from Jews and concerned Christians so that the entire ransom amount was raised by the deadline. No contribution was necessary or was made by the Vatican either as a loan or a gift. There had been no papal intervention. But reports soon circulated that Pius XII had made a generous gesture and that sacred vessels had been hastily melted down to meet the rescue ransom.²³¹ The gold was sent to Berlin but the gesture was spurned. Kappler was ordered to proceed with the roundup but he advised Eichmann that there were not enough SS members in Rome to carry out the task. That was not the response Eichmann wanted. He ordered Theodor Dannecker, experienced in such matters, to make sure there were.

Actually Pius XII must have found that incident an irritating distraction. With the church, its theology and its self-understanding again under threat in its home territory it was time for papal intervention and he was putting the finishing touches to another encyclical which was released on September 30, Divino Afflante Spiritu. It was an attempt to arrest or reverse the criticism of the church and its Biblical interpretation. Perhaps it was also an attempt to offset the re-establishment of the Orthodox Patriarchate in Moscow by the Soviet government. That represented a direct challenge to the authority of Rome among the churches to the east, and it could well prejudice Pius XII's ambitions to gain a Russian concordat. Long, rambling, full of contradictions and couched in terms which would have confused the clergy let alone the laity, Divino Afflante Spiritu was described as promoting Biblical studies. However what it really did was add another straight jacket to the wardrobes of those who would teach or interpret theology.

The Pope totally ignored the processes through which the church's current doctrine and dogma had been developed and began by restating the claim of absolute and exclusive divine authority for both Holy Scripture and Catholic doctrine because they "contain revelation without error [and] having been written under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, they have God for their author, and as such were handed down to the Church herself." [Emphasis added.] He then turned his guns on "some Catholic writers" who, in spite of the entire catalogue of Catholic doctrine being free from any error whatsoever, "ventured to restrict the truth of Sacred Scripture solely to matters of faith and morals, and to regard other matters, whether in the domain of physical science or history, as [if they were] in no wise connected with faith." But unlike some of his predecessors he did not prohibit the study of such subjects. He simply said that if "the Catholic commentator" wished to grapple again with these "difficult problems, hitherto unsolved," he may do so either to "refute the objections of the adversaries, [or in an attempt to] find a satisfactory solution which will be in full accord with the doctrine of the Church, in particular with the traditional teaching regarding the inerrancy of Sacred Scripture."²³² Challenges may occur, but nothing had changed. A Catholic commentator may refute objections or prop up doctrine, but a re-assessment of the church's theology and self-understanding simply was not permitted. And more challenges were just around the corner.

Two weeks later, on October 13, Marshal Badoglio announced that Italy was back in the war: as a co-belligerent on the side of the Allies. Dannecker was prompted to gather his team very quickly. At 5.30 a.m. on Saturday, October 16 he arrived at the old Rome Ghetto with 365 personnel made up of some SS police and some Waffen SS armed with submachine guns. Over the next few hours his trucks drove in and out, some driving past St. Peters for the troops to have a good look, with about 1,500 persons. But they had been seen arriving by a young aristocrat known to Pius XII, Principessa Enza Pignatelli-Aragona. She tracked down the pope in his private chapel at morning prayers. Somewhat agitated by the interruption he phoned Maglione who contacted the German ambassador, Weizsacker. Twenty four hours of frantic phone calls, conferences and cable writing began.

The pope would not intervene personally. His attitude was negative. His authority was only invoked by Vatican officials with terms such as Maglione's statement: "The Holy See would not wish to be put in a situation where it was necessary to utter a word of disapproval." It was actually left to Weizsacker and his legation secretary Gerhard Gumpert to draft letters to the commanding general in Rome, Rainer Stahel, and cables to Berlin in a bid to have the deportation order reversed. Their letters tell the pathetic story. Referring to "an authoritative Vatican dignitary" expressing concern about the "good relations which have existed between the Vatican and the high command of the German Armed Forces," one letter said: "I earnestly request that you order the immediate suspension of these arrests ... Otherwise I fear that the Pope will take a position in public as being against this action, one which would undoubtedly be used by anti-German propagandists as a weapon against the Germans.”²³³ Weizsacker followed with a personal letter saying, in part: “The Curia is especially upset considering that the action took place, in a manner of speaking, under the Pope’s own windows. The reaction could be dampened somewhat if the Jews were to be employed in labour service here in Italy. Hostile circles in Rome are using this event as a means of pressuring the Vatican to drop its reserve.”²³⁴

Those letters failed. So did the ‘hostile circles.’ Some of the prisoners pleaded that they were not Jewish, others that they had non-Jewish spouses: 252 were released. There was no intervention or pleading by a cardinal on behalf of the pope, and no offer of ransom, but such myths developed, including ‘reports’, which the Vatican did not deny, that Bishop Hudal had written a letter in terms used by the German diplomats.²³⁵ Dannecker lost no time. The prisoners were loaded onto a train on the morning of Monday, October 18, for their journey through Italy and Austria to Auschwitz. Witnesses relayed reports to the Vatican as the train travelled north. On arrival, 1,060 were gassed, 149 men and 47 women were detained for slave labour and, of those, 15 survived the war. A further 1,084 Jews were rounded up in Rome by Italian Fascists following Dannecker’s swoop on the 16th. Their fate was the same.²³⁶ The combined haul had been about 2,600 Jews out of the 7,000 in Rome and the exercise was a triumph for the Nazis. They were delighted that, with limited manpower, they had carried out a very successful house search and forced roundup – even in consultation with Vatican officials and without a public protest from the Pope.

Early in December Hitler summoned Wolff again, demanding to know why no action had been taken to occupy the Vatican and deport the pope. Wolff explained that a plan had been prepared but he then proceeded to persuade the Fuhrer not to put it into action. He said that as a consequence of being careful not to treat the Italians harshly “we have the discreet support of the clergy.” He said that “without the support of the church, which has kept the masses quiet” he could not have done his job. The tranquillity of the populace, he said, had aided the southern front and precluded the need to withdraw troops from the fighting. He then urged Hitler, directly, to “give up the Vatican project” because “in my opinion an occupation of the Vatican and the deportation of the Pope would prompt an extreme negative reaction in Italy, and also on the part of German Catholics within the Fatherland and at the front, as well as among all Catholics in the rest of the world and in neutral states – reactions that outweigh any temporary advantage that will be gained by the political neutralization of the Vatican or the gain of Vatican booty.” Hitler acquiesced. The kidnap plan was dropped.²³⁷

Wolff’s advice had been very sound. British Ambassador Osborne reported in a memo to London dated November 1, barely two weeks after the deportations, that Pius XII had told him during a one-hour conversation that he had “no complaints” about the Germans occupying Rome and that they had “behaved correctly” when it came to respecting the neutrality of the Vatican. According to Osborne’s report he told the pope that the Germans “were systematically stripping [Rome] of all its supplies, transport and labor, were arresting Italian officers ... and youth and were applying their usual merciless methods of persecution of the Jews.” He also said it was the opinion of a number of people that the pope had “underestimated his own moral authority and the high respect [in which] it was held” by German Catholics. “I urged him to bear it in mind in case in the course of coming events an occasion arise for taking a strong stand,” Osborne said.²³⁸

Actually the Catholic population of Italy was very confused. They had seen the failure of the church-backed government of Mussolini, the arrest of the person on whom the Pope had poured such lavish praise when the concordat was signed, the armistice, the indiscriminate bombing by the Allies, and then Mussolini’s rescue by his ally the Fuhrer. Confidence in the church slumped, and criticism of its teaching jumped sharply. Catholic Action, encouraged by the Bishop of Parma and Dr Luigi Gedda of Milan, broke its shackles and declared that there was nothing in its past to repudiate. There was an immediate rise in support for both left wing Catholic splinter groups and the Communist Party, and the scattered Christian Democrat cells which had been suppressed by the Clerico-Fascists since the 1930’s began to regroup around a nucleus led by De Gasperi. Within a short time it was on its way to filling the vacuum left by the fall of the Clerico-Fascists.²³⁹

The confusion was most intense in Northern Italy where the combined anti-Fascist parties set up a strong Committee of National Liberation (CLNAI) as a provisional government, the pro-German Italian Social Republic pressed for the return of Mussolini, and support for the Communist Party was greatest. The Communists gained greatly from Russia’s policy of providing active community-level support for workers groups opposed to Hitler, in contrast to the Western Allies’ policy of simply bombing hell out of occupied areas. They also gained from the relaxation of Russia’s hard line anti-church policies and the fact that the Orthodox Church was seen to be on the rise again. For a time the pattern of confusion actually strengthened the power of the church hierarchy, and especially that of Cardinal-Archbishop Schuster of Milan. He treated with each of the Nazis, the Fascists, the anti-Fascists and the worker partisans, and sought to prevent a popular uprising in favour of the CLNAI, fearing that it would lead to Communist rule in the Po Valley. He also worked to prevent the rise of the Italian Social Republic through its links with a dissident schismatic Catholic movement.²⁴⁰

Ambassador Weizsacker was able to report to Berlin that although the Pope was under pressure from all sides and would face criticism from Protestant and Anglo-Saxon countries “he has not let himself be drawn into any demonstrative censure of the deportation of Jews from Rome [and] he has done everything he could in this delicate matter not to strain relations with the German Government and German circles in Rome.”²⁴¹ It was quite legitimate for the watching world to believe that the Pope had either accepted or given tacit approval to the extermination of the Jewish community. At least he was being consistent with what he had said in each of his encyclicals, including the most recent, Mystici Corporis Christi and Divino Afflante Spiritu. And he remained so, saying nothing when an Italian law was passed on December 1 providing for the internment of all Jews in concentration camps and the confiscation of their property.²⁴²

Subsequently, in an effort to counter the intense criticism of its failure to intervene to prevent the partial extermination of the Jews, the Vatican generated enormous publicity around the Pope's action in "saving the Jews of Rome" through harbouring people in the Vatican and in church centres across the Italian capital. However the publicity generated was neither consistent with papal pronouncements and actions either before or during the war, nor was it justified by the numbers involved when circumstances made necessity and common humanity appear a virtue. The Pope's inaction looks very undistinguished, at best, compared with the outright rejection by Finland of Nazi demands to deport its Jewish nationals; Denmark's protective action in shipping them to Sweden instead of to 'the east'; and Japan's positive action in providing refuge for 5,000 European Jews in occupied Manchuria²⁴³ as well as its refusal to act against the 17,000 Jews in Shanghai – in spite of the fact that it was in formal alliance with Germany, it recognized the economic basics of Hitler's plan for a New Order in Europe, and it was under pressure to cooperate in an East Asian 'final solution'.

Among the Vatican's propaganda to offset the growing dismay at the pope's inaction was a report in L'Osservatore Romano for October 25–26, only a few days before Osborne's conversation with Pius XII in which he had said he had no complaints about the conduct of the German occupation forces. After saying that "the August Pontiff" had done all in his power to alleviate suffering from "this cruel conflagration" it said "... the universal and paternal charity of the Pontiff has become, it could be said, ever more active; it knows neither boundaries nor nationality, neither religion nor race."²⁴⁴ However Pius XII seemed hell bent on doing all he could to disavow even that praise. Three months later, in January 1944, when it appeared that there may be a time gap between the departure of the retreating Germans and the arrival of the occupying Allied forces he insisted that the Allied forces should move in as the Germans left to prevent the irreligious or anti-religious Communist partisans from occupying Rome and claiming government by coup. Then on January 26, Maglione approached Osborne "to say that the Pope hoped that no Allied coloured troops would be among the small number that might be garrisoned at Rome after the occupation."²⁴⁵

HITLER CONSIDERS A SEPARATE PEACE

In the days following the announcement of the Italian armistice Hitler gave careful thought to negotiating a separate peace with Russia to enable him to concentrate on the Western Allies. During the weeks between Mussolini's arrest and the armistice Ribbentrop sent two emissaries to make contact with Soviet diplomats in Sweden and on September 10 Hitler discussed a possible Russian armistice line, but he decided to defer an approach until Germany regained the initiative in the submarine, missile and ground warfare theatres which would place him in a stronger negotiating position.²⁴⁶

On that basis the opportunity would elude him altogether. However his successful rescue of Mussolini on September 12, the Duce's attempt to regain control of the Italian scene and the better progress of the German campaign in Italy must have given him some short-lived encouragement. He rebuffed a diplomatic approach from Britain's trade chief in Stockholm in mid-October which, as David Irving points out, can hardly have been anything other than a feeler for an armistice in spite of the joint Anglo-American declaration that the war would end only with Germany's unconditional surrender.²⁴⁷ Perhaps there were British Ministers – even Churchill himself – who were more concerned about Britain's critical situation in the Middle East and Asia than the government was prepared to admit, even though the Allies were in a strong position overall. Or perhaps Churchill wanted to be fully briefed on Hitler's current thinking before he left for Cairo and Teheran for further discussions with Allied leaders a few weeks later.

Certainly Hitler was still planning or day-dreaming about eventual victory and the shape of the world under his New Order. About this time he revealed the core of his vision to the Nazi Party leadership at a meeting in Berlin. The aim of Germany's struggle, he said, must be to create a unified Europe and only the Germans could really organize it. "All that rubbish of small states still existing in Europe must be liquidated as fast as possible," he said.²⁴⁸ A further stage of his vision, or fantasy, was confined to personal hand written notes, thus:

England for the good of the world must remain unchanged in its present form. Consequently, after final victory, we must effect a reconciliation. Only the King must go – in his place the Duke of Windsor. With him we will make a permanent treaty of friendship instead of a peace treaty.

Scandinavia and the Iberian Peninsula would be joined under the New Order to make the United Europe envisaged by Charles the Great, Prince Eugene and Napoleon a reality.

The most important point of final victory will be the exclusion of the United States from world politics for all time and the destruction of their Jewish community.

For this purpose Dr. Goebbels will have dictatorial authority as Governor to accomplish the total re-education of the racially mixed and inferior population. Goering will also help in this respect, above all by mobilizing all those with German blood, at least fifty per cent of the inhabitants, so they can be educated militarily and regenerated nationalistically.²⁴⁹

BRITISH PLANS FOR THE MIDDLE EAST

As much as Churchill wanted to concentrate on eliminating Hitler, there were many other aspects of the total war which had to be settled at the same time. Conflicts of colonial interest came thick and fast. Britain had to do all it could to keep a tight grip on its colonies and, hot on the heels of the Quebec Conference, where backing had been given to General de Gaulle's Committee of National Liberation, the French connection caused it considerable difficulty. The Free French under De Gaulle's clear political leadership naturally wanted to follow much the same colonial path as Britain and to cling to Syria and Lebanon, but their pseudo-colonial subjects wanted them out. For once, for their own particular reasons of self interest, Britain and the United States were in agreement.

Having been given republican constitutions and formal but very nominal independence by the Free French late in 1941, (after the Vichy French had been relieved of their control), both countries wanted elected governments with real power. With the mandates in dispute, no confidence that the French would actually grant full independence at the end of the war if the Allies won, and strong under-currents of pro-Nazi feeling, anti-French hostility increased steadily while they waited. In March 1943 they were only given appointed provisional governments, and when elections were held in July they resulted in highly nationalistic governments in both countries. On October 7 the Lebanese government proposed to end the French role in the constitution and in November the Free French authorities provoked disturbances and bloodshed in Beirut by ordering the arrest of the president and ministers.

Concerned that the French anti-Arab action might trigger an uprising in Palestine and even engulf the whole Middle East, the British cabinet sought United States cooperation in pressing the French to release and reinstate the Lebanese politicians. To protect its imperial interests Britain was even prepared to take military control of Lebanon and Syria, to withdraw recognition of the French National Committee, and to stop the process of arming the French troops in North Africa. Churchill was scared that the Arab world would ask: "What kind of a France is this which, while itself subjugated by the enemy, seeks to subjugate others?" But Churchill had one rule for Britain and another one for France and anyone else. He could jail Indian leaders and ban Congress, then totally ignore the pleas of China to release them, and then he could rail against France for similar action because it was contrary to the Atlantic Charter.²⁵⁰

Churchill's Cabinet Committee on Palestine reached a consensus by October, 1943, but the government knew that its proposals were generous to the Jews and would not be acceptable to the Arabs, so its formal report was withheld for presentation to cabinet on December 20.²⁵¹ The earlier release of its proposals would have ensured a war-within-a-war in Palestine, the absolute alienation of the Arab world, and the very great strengthening of Hitler's hand. The government knew, therefore, that it would have led to schisms within the Alliance and inestimable complications in the war which, it is only reasonable to assume, would have dragged on and on with even deeper bitterness and greater trauma. Publication of the report was therefore to be deferred until after the war had ended.

However the relationship between Weizmann and Churchill, who was as staunchly committed to Zionism as he had been at the time that his association with 'The Focus' began, was such that at a luncheon in October 1943 at which Clement Atlee was present, Churchill revealed to Weizmann the outline of the new plan.²⁵² Apart from wanting to help his friend and the Jewish community, he also wanted to reduce the debilitating conflict between Jews and Arabs in Palestine so that he could concentrate on the focal point of the war: eliminating Hitler.

The plan was based on the partition of Palestine to provide for a Jewish state. The plan proposed that the British Government promote an association of Levant nations, consisting of a Jewish State, a Jerusalem territory (under a British High Commissioner), some three-fifths of Lebanon, and a "Greater Syria" to include Syria itself, Transjordan, southern Lebanon, and the Arab-inhabited areas of Palestine. That plan demonstrates very clearly that the mindset of the British government had not changed one iota. It was still imbued with the self-understanding of the amorphous Christian gel that it was the right of the great white Christian powers to carve up territories, to trade people and their resources as they liked, and to remake the map of the world to suit themselves. Churchill told Weizmann that when Hitler had been crushed the Jews would have to be established in the position where they belonged. He had an inheritance left to him by Balfour and he was not going to change. Prompted by Churchill, Atlee indicated that he, too, was committed to the plan.²⁵³ From that moment on, even though many Zionist leaders did not believe that any Western power could be trusted to keep its word, the Arabs were at a distinct disadvantage in any discussions on the future of Palestine because of the Jewish leadership's prior knowledge of the British Government's position.

MOSCOW, CAIRO, TEHERAN AND TOKYO

THE WAR CRIMES DECLARATION

From October 19 to November 3, the Big Three Foreign Ministers met in Moscow as a preliminary to a major heads of government meeting. The Foreign Ministers agreed to a joint statement on war crimes, drafted by Churchill, which was issued in the name of the Big Three. It announced that at the time of any armistice, any military or other persons who were responsible for atrocities, mass executions and massacres which had come to the attention of the Allies would be returned to the countries in which those atrocities had been carried out "to be judged and punished according to the laws of those liberated countries and the free governments which will be erected therein." The psychology behind the drafting of the statement was very interesting. It was exactly the same as that behind the drafting of the Joint Allied Declaration on December 17, 1942. The countries in which Nazi slaughters and deportations had occurred were named, but the victims were referred to as 'hostages', 'peasants' or 'officers'. The term 'Jews' was not used at all.²⁵⁴ The people to whom the message was directed were to understand it in human terms without their well ingrained ethnic biases getting in the way. In spite of – or perhaps because of – the Biltmore Conference and the subsequent progressive disclosure of the plight of the Jews, the continuing cover-up of the Jewish Question was still intense. Churchill clearly chose his words as carefully as always in an effort to prevent a spontaneous reaction to the Jewish Question getting in the way, and to avoid readers rebelling against the decision and stepping up the atrocities. But the declaration was aimed at the Axis powers, and those who committed atrocities against humanity would be brought to justice at the end of the war. However the fact that there was still no particular acknowledgment of the importance of 'the Jewish Question'²⁵⁵ did not alleviate the problem. It aggravated it, because efforts to secure alternative areas for either a Jewish Homeland or for large scale Jewish communal settlement were still left strictly in the hands of interested Jewish organizations. Such efforts continued parallel with efforts by the Zionist Organizations to secure Palestine and in spite of the steps taken in some Zionist quarters to undermine them. In fact that declaration was made only a week or two after Australia's prime minister, John Curtin, advised the Jewish land settlement negotiator, Dr Isaac Steinberg, that: "The Commonwealth Government sympathizes with the serious plight of your people in Europe ... however ... the whole question of immigration into Australia, particularly having regard to the conditions that will exist at the conclusion of hostilities is one that requires to be fully explored from all aspects."²⁵⁶ (See above, p. 22.)

However, beyond its immediate propaganda value a declaration on punishment for war crimes was useless without an investigating agency which could collect the evidence. But that was another matter entirely. Indeed, whatever Churchill's intentions in drafting it, the decision to produce the Moscow Declaration was largely the result of political pressure from European governments-in-exile concerned about Nazi treatment of their own nationals, and certainly not out of any concern for Jewish victims on the part of the Allied governments. As author Tom Bower has shown in his book Blind Eye to Murder, memories of the humiliating debacle of botched W.W.I war trials against Germans; lack of credence given to claims of atrocities (particularly concerning Jews); fears of reprisals against Allied POW's; difficulties under existing international law; and fears that the Allies were also breaching the rules of war or that proclamations concerning war crimes would hinder the prospect of surrender negotiations, all at one time or another provided convenient reasons for bureaucratic and political stonewalling to prevent an Allied declaration on war crimes. Now, when a clear declaration of intent to hunt down and prosecute war criminals had been made, the same reasons would be used in an attempt to keep them purely in the realm of good propaganda by bureaucratic buck-passing and the withholding of necessary resources.

It was always an aim of the Allies to deal with the Nazi and fascist leadership, but they were to have been taken care of by political means. Churchill had even taken the trouble to produce a paper for Cabinet dealing with those "major criminals whose notorious offences know no geographical bounds" Churchill's solution for "Hitler and the Mussolini gangs, the Japanese warlords and Quislings" was to list, by agreement, between fifty and one hundred of them and declare them "world outlaws." When any of them were arrested by an Allied soldier, they could be shot within six hours of identification by a major general or above without need for reference to a higher authority. In Churchill's opinion, this would avoid subjecting the British people to a drawn out process of trials and mass executions.²⁵⁷ Cabinet, however, demurred. Churchill's idea not only raised the problematic issue of Hess, whom the Soviets had wanted tried immediately, but it might have been bad for the Allies' image because they were, after all, supposed to be fighting for justice. Only Roosevelt liked the idea. Stalin, obviously with more experience in such matters, insisted on trials.²⁵⁸

The fact that Churchill could raise the issue of war crimes in the context in which he did – and that his colleagues could discuss it in the shallow manner that they did – illustrates another aspect of the parody of Mein Kampf. The Allied leaders, perhaps with the exception of Stalin, could still not read themselves into the plot or understand it. Some of the people involved expressed concern at the possibility of a backlash against Allied leaders, but the matter was dealt with rather superficially and Churchill's attitude makes it clear that he was only concerned with using war crimes legislation as a triumphalist 'victor's weapon' or a means of retribution. He could not see that one person's war crime is another person's reaction against oppression, or a means of imposing one's will on others, or a means of gaining or retaining a position of privilege at the expense of others. He had given no thought to the question of definition, and he had a conveniently short memory for some of the decisions which he and his Allied colleagues had made, and for the effects and consequences of those decisions. We will return to the matter in due course.

POST-WAR COOPERATION

A THREE-POWER PLAN ...

However the issue of war crimes was the least of the concerns facing the Foreign Ministers. Developments which had flowed from the Italian armistice had thrust into the forefront of Allied concerns some basic issues of inter-Allied cooperation. When dealings with the Italians had begun, both Britain and the United States had recognized that the Soviet Union would have to be consulted. As a result the Soviets were informed that they would be kept fully abreast of events in Italy, and were invited by the United States to make suggestions and inquiries.²⁵⁹ However, it soon became clear that they wanted a more substantial role. Suspicious of British and American motives in treating separately with the fascist Badoglio, and no doubt highly sensitive to the political opportunities afforded by military occupation, on August 22 Stalin had instead cabled Roosevelt and Churchill with a proposal for a Three-power military-political commission with direct executive powers to deal with the surrender and occupation of all Axis countries dissociating themselves from Germany. Neither Churchill nor Roosevelt liked the idea. Apart from the political implications of Soviet input, they wanted to avoid any unnecessary complications in what was an already tangled military situation in Italy. Despite their alternative suggestions Stalin was not to be put off and the commission was eventually established in Algiers. However, on the insistence of the Western Allies it was restricted to a purely passive role as a receiver of information.²⁶⁰

Whether or not Stalin ever really intended to allow reciprocal military-political rights when the Red Army's turn came to occupy Germany's allies in Eastern Europe, Britain and the United States were well aware that in freezing the Soviets out of Italy they were handing them a convenient precedent for restricting Western influence in Rumania, Bulgaria and Hungary. So when the Foreign Ministers sat down in Moscow there were plenty of issues on the table waiting to be resolved quite apart from the issue of war crimes.

The decisions reached at the conference had far reaching implications at many levels. In relation to Italy, the Soviets ratified the terms of the Italian armistice under which they accepted Anglo-American proposals for an Allied Control Commission which would be the political arm of the military government in Italy and its effective ruling body. Also accepted, however, were Eden's further proposals that the Three Power military-political commission proposed by the Soviets be transformed into two separate bodies. One would be a tripartite Advisory Council for Italy, and the other a new European Advisory Commission to be established in London to handle questions concerning further surrender terms and to make "recommendations to the three governments upon European questions" connected with the termination of hostilities.²⁶¹

However, since the Advisory Council for Italy was purely that – advisory – and the formal relationship between the Soviets and the Allied Control Commission for Italy was left vague, the Soviets, in ratifying the armistice, had accepted that their influence in Italy was to be negligible at best. For the Soviets, that amounted to both an invitation and a justification to treat the Western powers the same way in Eastern Europe. That result was further reinforced by Eden's refusal to agree to Russian demands that the EAC be given direct executive powers over occupation policy in other liberated countries. As yet, however, neither Britain nor the United States was unduly concerned. Neither expected their troops to be in a position to affect the outcome anyway, and in American eyes at least, armistice negotiations and occupation policy were essentially military matters that could be kept separate from political concerns.²⁶² What was more important was that, having declared Italy a Soviet no-go zone, neither intended to forgo their own political aims in Eastern Europe.

Top of the remaining British agenda was therefore a proposed declaration which would commit the Allies to restoring freedom and self-determination to the enslaved peoples of Europe on the basis of joint rather than separate spheres of responsibility. However, that seemingly even-handed approach, already belied by the Italian situation, was further contradicted by a proposed commitment in the declaration to encourage confederations of states in Eastern and Central Europe. Despite the declaration's assertion that such groupings should not be directed at 'other states' their primary function was obviously to prevent Soviet political domination of the region. An East European Confederation would act as a bulwark against possible Soviet expansion and penetration into Western Europe, as well protect British interests in Greece and the Mediterranean. In effect it would be a revised form of the pre-war 'cordon sanitaire'. Reinforcing those proposals was another which would prohibit the Allies from making any treaties or pacts with smaller states without first consulting each other. That had been prompted by recent treaty negotiations between the Soviets and the head of the exiled Government of Czechoslovakia, Eduard Benes. Any such treaty not only threatened British confederation plans, it was also feared as a possible foundation stone for an exclusive Soviet 'sphere of influence' by easing the way for Soviet domination of Poland. The British thus wanted any treaty between the two to include the London based anti-Soviet Polish Government-in-exile, with whom the Soviets had broken off relations.²⁶³

... OR A FOUR-POWER PLAN?

The Americans, on the other hand, did not wish to discuss detailed commitments in Eastern Europe, or anywhere else for that matter. They were more concerned with the big picture, believing that gaining a commitment to overall post-war cooperation with the Soviets was necessary before other matters could be considered. Heading Secretary of State Hull's agenda was a proposed "Four-power Declaration" on peace, security and disarmament, which called for the continuance of co-operation for peace and security after the war, the creation of an international organization, and a commitment to bring about general disarmament. In addition, with the prospect of using its vast economic resources as an inducement for such cooperation, proposals for assistance in post-war reconstruction were also tabled. For their part, the Soviets were primarily concerned with military matters. Foremost among them was to gain a firm commitment to the timing of a second front.²⁶⁴

The Soviets received assurances that a cross-channel invasion would occur in the spring of 1944 – though only after their further demands that Sweden and Turkey be pressed into the war had soured the mood somewhat. However, given that Churchill was concerned at the bogged down campaign in Italy and had wanted the cross channel invasion again postponed, that effectively meant that American rather than British ideas on military planning had now come to the forefront of the Anglo-American alliance. That result pointed to profound changes in the nature of the overall Alliance which were also reflected in the political aspects of the conference.

Faced with American opposition or indifference, the remaining British proposals failed to get off the ground. When Molotov quickly made it clear that the Czech treaty was virtually a foregone conclusion, Eden was forced to drop his objections, while lack of American support also helped scuttle two other British initiatives. The first was an attempt to pressure the Russians into resuming relations with the London Poles. The second was a modified proposal on treaties with other smaller powers – though that was also damaged when amendments proposed by the Soviets ensured that it could also be easily turned against Britain if it attempted similar agreements with its own allies, such as Greece. In addition, the one British proposal for which the Americans might have been expected to have some sympathy – the declaration committing the Allies to joint spheres of responsibility for liberated Europe – also failed to attract their support. Of course, the Soviets had no interest in it whatsoever. They were under no illusions about its real intentions. Nor were Hull and the State Department, to whom the inclusion of the confederations clause smacked of a 'balance of power' approach to international politics which their own approach was designed to eliminate altogether.²⁶⁵

In sum, those results of the Moscow conference indicated that British diplomatic efforts had now been forced into a subordinate role, with the primary diplomatic axis between the three Allies now lying between Washington and Moscow. Nevertheless, the British still had hopes for the European Advisory Commission which they wanted to use as a forum for jointly establishing control of both friendly and unfriendly nations, and which might thus enable some bargaining with the Soviets where the two nations' respective interests were at stake, particularly in eastern Europe and the Balkans. However, any such hopes were soon shot to pieces when the Americans moved quickly after the conference to restrict its role. They objected to the fact that it was to be based in London and feared that it would be used to make political agreements before the war's end. As Secretary of War Henry Stimson put it to Roosevelt, the EAC "would assume additional powers which the British were so evidently anxious to give it, and that as the war went on it would tend, rightly or wrongly, to centre the attention of the world upon London and the seat and direction of the war."²⁶⁶ In other words, it would interfere with US plans for the post-war order, alienate the American public, and threaten the position of the United States as post-war supremo.

In pursuit of the United States' plans Secretary of State Cordell Hull received agreement for the centrepiece of his post-war vision. His Four-Power Declaration was signed, though only after both Britain and the Soviet Union had registered strong objections to the inclusion of the fourth power, China, and the Soviets had managed to remove anything in it that may have restricted their freedom of action in Eastern Europe.²⁶⁷ It read in part:

*[the four governments] recognize the necessity of establishing at the earliest practicable date a general international organization, based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all peace-loving states, and open to membership by all such states, large and small, for the maintenance of international peace and security.*²⁶⁸

However, a Soviet proposal to set up a Three-Power Commission to discuss the creation of the new organization was rejected. Concerned at the possible reaction of US isolationists, Hull wanted first to prepare the ground thoroughly before any such formal machinery was created.²⁶⁹

In his speech to Congress upon his return he gave an inspiring performance. "As the provisions of the Four Nation Declaration are carried into effect" he grandly declared, "there will no longer be need for spheres of influence, for alliances, for balances of power, or any other of the special arrangements through which, in the unhappy past, nations strove to safeguard their security or to promote their interests."²⁷⁰ If any of those listening had known of Maimonides, it may well have looked as though he was right.

A few, however, suspected the truth. Apart from the glaring inconsistency in the fact that that the US was intent on keeping its own sphere of influence in Latin America and grabbing another in the Pacific – though few in the US would have acknowledged either – the reality was that Hull had little power. It was Roosevelt who called the shots, and he had little time for Hull's plans formulated, in Roosevelt's words, "in the stratosphere."²⁷¹ Already he had told Cardinal Spellman on September 3 that Eastern Europe would simply have to get used to Russian dominance, and that Soviet influence would reach further into Europe.²⁷² The problem was, however, was that no-one had told the American public. They were being led to expect pristine self-determination for Eastern Europe, and they were not going to appreciate being disabused of that notion at all. So as the President prepared for a round of diplomatic meetings with his counterparts in late 1943 in pursuit of his 'Grand Design', he definitely had plenty on his mind to think about. He was not the only one.

WANG'S SINO-JAPANESE TREATY

Japan was determined not to be left out in the cold and on October 30, 1943, while the Big Three Foreign Ministers were having their consultations in Moscow, Wang's China signed a treaty of alliance with Japan in which the two countries agreed to cooperate as equal and independent neighbours in the establishment of Greater East Asia. Japan undertook to withdraw its forces from China when general peace should be restored and the state of war should cease to exist. In a further bid to attract Chiang Kai-shek's attention it renounced its treaty right to station troops in China, and remodeled some of its major authorities in China to present a more Chinese appearance.²⁷³

On the propaganda front Japan argued that there was nothing left to fight over because the misunderstandings between Japan and China which had been fomented by the US and Britain had been resolved by Japan's new policies. And, taking advantage of divided public opinion in the US, Japan urged Chiang Kai-shek to abandon his links with the US and his tenuous united front with the Communists and to join with Japan and Wang Ching-wei against the Communists.^{274]}

In view of Wang's China-Japan Treaty Roosevelt was intent on promoting Chiang Kai-shek's China as the alternative to Japan and as the great Fourth Power occupying one of the permanent seats on the future United Nations executive committee. ²⁷⁵ He was intent on ensuring that Chiang and the Kuomintang controlled China after the war, irrespective of the corruption and chaos, hoarding, black-marketing and trading with the enemy which the American commander in China, General Stilwell, saw as its hallmarks.²⁷⁶ He was also intent on strengthening political and economic links between the US and China at the expense of Britain and the other European powers.

Chiang Kai-shek, taking full advantage of such powerful backing, pressed for the diversion of Allied forces from the European theatre to the Asian theatre to reopen a supply route to China through Burma. At the same time Churchill had to cope with the failure of the Anglo-Russian effort to persuade Turkey to break its neutrality and to permit Allied operations from its territory. Muslim Turkey's agreement would have greatly strengthened Britain's position in the Middle East, taking some of the sting out of the Arab opposition to its Middle East policies, and it would have ensured Allied access to Russia from the Mediterranean while forcing Germany to divert more of its effort to the Balkans.²⁷⁷

ROOSEVELT'S CHINESE CHECKMATE

When the British and American delegations, totalling well over 500 persons, assembled in Cairo on November 21, 1943 for the next major conference Churchill received a rude shock. Unknown to him, Roosevelt had invited Generalissimo Chiang Kai-shek and, much to Churchill's annoyance, Chinese affairs dominated the early stages of the conference. Churchill recorded his displeasure later, writing:

The talks of the British and American staffs were sadly distracted by the Chinese story which was lengthy, complicated and minor. Moreover ... the President, who took an exaggerated view of the Indian-Chinese sphere, was soon closeted in long conferences with the Generalissimo. All hope of persuading Chiang and his wife to go and see the Pyramids and enjoy themselves till we returned from Teheran fell to the ground, with the result that Chinese business occupied first instead of last place at Cairo.²⁷⁸

Roosevelt's concern was understandable, however, because the Japanese were continuing to push their policy of reconciliation with China and their diplomatic efforts to prise Chiang Kai-shek away from the United States. Since the diplomatic manoeuvring in January aimed at ending the war with China, Japan had persuaded Vichy France to give up its rights in the French concession and had continued the transfer of powers and territory to the Nanking Government. Further indications of the direction of their diplomatic offensive came on October 14 when they declared the Philippines to be an Independent Republic. From the point of view of international recognition it did not matter that the new Philippines government was dominated by Japanese in executive positions. It had a Philippine Executive Committee, or cabinet, and a state council which included most of the former politicians. It had entered into an alliance with Japan which declared that each country would respect the other's independence and territory – and it had eliminated the authority of the United States. The US had dominated the country since 1898 but it had actually passed the Philippine Independence Act in 1934 and independence had been due to take effect in March 1944.

From Cairo, Roosevelt and Churchill went to Teheran for discussions with Stalin at the beginning of November – without Chiang Kai-shek. The relationship between the three competing governments in China and their allies and enemies was just too complex. Although Chiang Kai-shek had a good relationship with Stalin and had actually received more material aid from Russia for the war with Japan than Mao Tse-tung, he was bitterly opposed to Mao Tse-tung's Communists and was at war with Japan while Russia was not.²⁷⁹ But Churchill had to face another round of intrigue as Roosevelt sought to exclude him and the British delegation from some key talks with Stalin and the Russians, and his antagonism towards the British Empire came more and more into the open. Roosevelt very bluntly told Churchill that he (Roosevelt) was better able to handle Stalin than any officials of either the British Foreign Office or his own State Department. He also told the US Ambassador to Moscow that Stalin wanted nothing except security for his own people, that if he gave the Soviet Premier everything he asked for and sought nothing in return that "he won't try to annex anything and will work for a world of democracy and peace." He then proceeded to tell Stalin, in private, that his ideas on the conduct of the war and the structure for peace did not entirely coincide with Churchill's. Stalin grasped Roosevelt's wish to appear independent of Churchill's influence, which he proceeded to stimulate and exploit.²⁸⁰

The symptoms of this parting of the ways had been apparent for some time. In fact, as we have seen, the alliance partners within the amorphous Christian gel were only drawn together and held together by self interest and the United States had used its position of strength to impose conditions on its support for Britain as each major phase of the war unfolded, right from the beginning. Of special note were the conditions attached to Lend-Lease aid, support for Britain's Far East policy, and the United Nations statement. Then there was a distinct tightening of the reins and an even more definite move towards pursuit of America's aims rather than joint aims after Churchill's intransigence over British control of India. It was as if Roosevelt was then saying to Churchill: "You've done your dash. We are going to control Asia, not you!" There was the mechanism which the US used to provoke Japan into the fateful expansion of its area of Far East operations knowing very well that it was the only country which could stop it; Roosevelt's independent negotiations with Ibn Saud; his invitation to Chiang Kai-shek to the big power meeting without consulting Churchill; and now his deliberate exclusion of Churchill from critical talks with Stalin. This pattern should not have been a surprise because, after all, both Churchill and Roosevelt were under no illusions that the British government had been trying to coerce the United States into the war to prop up its own position of imperial privilege which the United States objected to.

Among a host of matters dealt with by the Big Three jointly, the fate of Germany after its unconditional surrender was discussed at some length. But another major issue, the shape of a post war international organization, was discussed in private between Stalin and Roosevelt, who chose not to represent Churchill's views in full. This became a matter of some irritation to Churchill. Concerning Germany: Stalin wished to see it split up; Roosevelt proposed a series of five independent states and two United Nations trust territories with a system of international control such that they could never re-combine to form a threatening power; and Churchill expressed reservations about the consequences of such a plan. But no firm position was reached.²⁸¹ Concerning the new world body: Roosevelt proposed that the Soviet Union, the United States, Great Britain and China should become, jointly, the world's 'four policemen'. Stalin did not support him, saying that the smaller countries of Europe would not welcome the concept and that China may not be an appropriate choice. He could have said it ran counter to the much vaunted Atlantic Charter. However he said he preferred a two-committee system: one for Europe, comprised of Britain, the Soviet Union, the United States and possible one additional European country; and one for the Far East.²⁸² Churchill's outline plan, which he had discussed quite widely in May 1943, was based on three regional bodies, one for each of Europe, the Americas, and the Pacific. Rotating representatives of each region, always including Roosevelt's 'big three' or 'big four', would together form a Supreme World Council which would deal with matters of concern to more than one region. The regions could form sub-regions or confederations as appropriate.²⁸³

Such differences in approach among the leaders was only to be expected. What is significant about this exchange lies more in the fact that the views of the three shared so much in common. In spite of his insistence that colonialism had to end, that empires had to be dismantled, and that countries such as India had to be represented in their own right and not through an imperial power, Roosevelt was no more concerned to have representation from smaller or emerging countries in the executive body than either Churchill or Stalin. He was just as comfortable with the ideas that ‘big is beautiful’ and ‘might is right’. Indeed, that was exactly the basis on which Roosevelt’s Grand Design was supposed to work, and securing the other crucial element of that design, cooperation with the Soviets, provided the major aim of the remainder of Roosevelt’s private discussions with Stalin.

In return for an assurance of the Soviet Union’s 1941 borders, including incorporation of the Baltic States, plus an unspecified western shift of Polish frontiers and the end of British-backed East European plans for a pan-Danubian confederation, which was also the favoured plan of the Vatican, Stalin indicated to Roosevelt that the setting up of new Communist regimes in Europe was in effect no longer on the agenda.²⁸⁴ To the Americans present, banking on the prospect of post-war cooperation between East and West, it seemed that “a new day had dawned” in international relations.²⁸⁵ However, simply carving up a bit of other people’s territory in exchange for a promise to suspend the exportation of revolution was not going to secure international peace and cooperation. There was still the question of Germany, the answer to which would have a great deal of bearing on Soviet security interests in eastern Europe. There was also the Italian precedent, which meant that the Soviets were not likely to tolerate any Western interference in their plans for Eastern Europe when their turn soon came to play the part of occupier. And there was the atomic bomb.

Unfortunately, the rest of the conference did nothing to improve the picture. Stripped to their basics, the remaining decisions of the Big Three’s conference were an agreement that the cross-channel invasion, Overlord, would be launched concurrently with a big push by Russia on the eastern front; that Turkey would be pressed to enter the war but Britain would not open a new front in the Balkans because Russia could handle that region from its own resources; and that Russia would enter the war against Japan soon after Germany was defeated. Those decisions certainly took some domestic political pressure off Roosevelt and enabled him to concentrate on the defeat of Hitler before turning the full force of the United States against Japan.²⁸⁶ However, linked to the demand for unconditional surrender they had a number of effects which few people anticipated. They ensured that the Soviet Union would be the dominant European power after the war, uninhibited by alien military forces in Eastern Europe which could have provided a counterweight to their presence. They ensured that the church – essentially the Vatican acting in collusion with the Western Alliance – would provide the basis of political opposition within the sphere of Soviet influence. And they also ensured that the Soviet Union would share in the spoils of the Pacific War; that because of the need to divert resources to Overlord, relief for Nationalist China would be delayed; and that, as a result, post war relationships in that region would be aggravated. In due course each of these issues would bring more pressure to bear to stimulate re-assessment of one aspect or another of the trouble in the triangle.

AN ALTERNATIVE SET OF PRINCIPLES

In the meantime, while the ‘Big Three’ and Chiang Kai-shek were conferring in Cairo and Teheran, Japan was hosting its own conference on post-war Asia. The most distinguished of the indigenous leaders whom Japan had appointed in the ‘liberated’ countries of Asia and the Pacific were invited to the Greater East Asia Conference in Tokyo. The conference drew up a Declaration of Principles, which was published as Asia’s answer to the ‘meaningless’ Atlantic Charter, which stated that stability and common prosperity for the people of Greater East Asia should be ensured through mutual cooperation. Countries in the region should respect one another’s sovereignty and independence and practice mutual assistance and amity. They should respect one another’s traditions, develop their creative facilities and accelerate economic development through close cooperation on the basis of reciprocity. And the countries of Greater East Asia should cultivate friendly relations with all the countries of the world and work for the abolition of racial discrimination, the promotion of cultural intercourse and the opening of resources throughout the world.²⁸⁷

The statement on Japan which was issued jointly by the United States, Britain and China following the Teheran Conference – and which had been cleared by Stalin – was their response to both the East Asian Declaration of Principles and Wang’s treaty with Japan of October 30, 1943. The three Allies declared that Japan would be stripped of all the islands in the Pacific seized or occupied since the beginning of the first World War; all territories “stolen from the Chinese” such as Manchuria, Formosa and the Pescadores, would be restored to the Republic of China; and Japan would be “expelled” from all other territories taken by violence and greed. They also declared that “mindful of the enslavement of the people of Korea” they were determined that in due course Korea would become free and independent.²⁸⁸ But they gave no indication of who would govern the former colonies and other “territories taken by violence and greed” after the Japanese had been expelled. Neither did they mention that the Big Three had already had preliminary discussions about Russia’s territorial claims in the east, or that this may involve the partition of Korea. They were very touchy issues, and would eventually lead to quite a few more wars as indigenous communities sought to prevent a return to European colonial rule or unification of their divided countries, each of which would be represented by the Western Powers as either rebel guerrilla actions against legitimate governments or as Communist inspired takeovers. The New Order for Greater East Asia was to be suppressed at all costs, irrespective of declarations of high sounding principles of equality and cooperation.

The Allied declarations on Japan and Korea therefore sat uneasily alongside yet another declaration issued by the Big Three on December 1, 1943, at the end of the Teheran Conference. It read:

We recognize fully the supreme responsibility resting upon us and all the United Nations to make a peace which will command the goodwill of the overwhelming masses of the peoples of the world and banish the scourge and terror of war for many generations. [171]

A CHANGE OF COURSE IN GERMANY ...

Few people could have doubted the course of the war when, acting on Hitler’s instructions, Himmler made a statement on the final solution on January 26, 1944, going beyond the restricted audience of the SS for the first time. A wave of applause swept the auditorium when he assured an audience of 260 high ranking army and navy officers that Hitler had given him a mission of extermination and the Jewish question had been solved.²⁸⁹ But in another place, on the same day, there was deathly silence when Hitler gave his naval and military chiefs a review of Nazi philosophy and then told them that all was not well. He said:

*“If it is the will of the Almighty that this should end in catastrophe for the German people, then you, my generals and admirals, must gather around me with upraised swords to fight to the last drop of blood for the honor of Germany.”*²⁹⁰

Hitler already knew that there were officers gathered around him with swords upraised: upraised for a different purpose. The Free Germany movement and the anti-Hitler movement had already come to his notice and security around him had been tightened. It is reasonable to assume that the knowledge of intrigues to seek an armistice and plots to assassinate him was a major factor behind his drive to enforce his final solution. He had said earlier in his political career that he feared that something might prevent him from fulfilling his primary mission: the elimination of the Jews which the church had failed to achieve. In addition his conviction that the rest of the world didn't care what happened to the Jews and his resolve to exterminate them had been strengthened by the failure of the Bermuda Refugee Conference.²⁹¹ He now demanded absolute loyalty and submission, telling his service chiefs: “I say, gentleman, that is the way it actually must be!” But the plotting continued and Allied pressure on all fronts of both theatres of war increased.

With German defences holding better than expected, Allied bombing of Rome increased. In response, in an effort to bring pressure to bear on the Allies through the Pope, the Fascists bombed the Vatican. It worked. The Pope appealed again to the Allies to stop the bombing and to give Rome special consideration as they had Athens and Cairo. But he also refused an invitation from Hitler to move to Berlin or to accept asylum elsewhere. Instead he called for special Marian prayers for Rome. Roosevelt described the continued occupation of Rome by the Germans as an affront to all religion – but the Allies continued to bomb monasteries and other church facilities, both in Rome and elsewhere, in which there may have been targets. These included the Abbey of Monte Cassino, which took one of the heaviest bombardments of any building in the war. Almost 1,000 tonnes of bombs and 195,000 rounds of artillery were aimed at the abbey before the infantry attacked. Allied deaths included more than 1,000 Indians, 863 New Zealanders and 96 other troops (hit by off-target Allied bombs) and the German garrison still held out.²⁹² They also included Castel Gondolfo where there were no Germans, but in which 500 refugees died.

The Pope had little reason to feel hardly done by. There was still to be no special consideration for the Jewish community either. In December, 1943, Eden had again scuttled the US State Department's refugee rescue plan because of “difficulties of disposing of a considerable number of Jews.” (See above, p. 36) Now, in January 1944, when Roosevelt authorized the establishment of a war refugee board to negotiate asylum for Nazi-persecuted minorities in Europe, the response was little different. The board's only success was to persuade the British Government to permit a few thousand Soviet Jewish refugee children who had been interned in wretched conditions in Turkey to enter Palestine.²⁹³ The government's motive in granting that permission was clearly political rather than humanitarian. Russia was a partner in the war and Britain was using every means it possibly could to induce Turkey to enter the war also and to provide vital air force bases. Those refugee children were very convenient pawns which might score a few good behaviour points for Britain from each of Russia, Turkey and the Zionist lobby.

... ELECTION COMMITMENTS IN THE US

Although large scale rescue was still not achievable, steadily improving prospects for a quick Allied victory had helped to raise Zionist expectations of success in the campaign for a Jewish National Homeland in Palestine. But the leaders of the movement were well aware that American support was the key to success and they became more determined to gain that support by direct political action. To that end both major political parties, Democrats and Republicans, were persuaded to include pro-Zionist statements in their platforms for the 1944 election campaigns and it was arranged that a bipartisan resolution of support would be introduced in both houses of Congress early in 1944. It read:

The United States shall use its good offices and take appropriate measures to the end that the doors of Palestine shall be opened for free entry of Jews into that country and that there shall be full opportunity for colonization so that the Jewish people may ultimately reconstitute Palestine as a free and democratic Jewish commonwealth.

Public hearings by the House Committee on Foreign Relations began early in February under the chairmanship of Sol Bloom, a recognized Zionist spokesperson in the House of Representatives. At the same time the American Zionist Emergency Committee made sure that Congressmen received a deluge of letters and telegrams from members of the public in support of the resolution.²⁹⁴

Congressional consideration of such a resolution clearly ran counter to the Anglo-American understanding that nothing would be done to determine the future of Palestine until after the war, and relations between the British Foreign Office and the State Department, which was clearly embarrassed, were strained. Tensions in the British cabinet were also aggravated by the fact that Churchill had broken cabinet confidence by telling Weizmann of the government's plans. In the United States, however, the delicacy of the situation was compounded by a different factor. Early in January 1944 the PRC had released the preliminary report of a high level investigation into the oil potential of Saudi Arabia and adjacent countries. The report showed that the reserves of the area were enormous and that because of the low cost of production, if free market forces were left to determine the pattern of exploitation, the centre of gravity of world oil production would move from the Gulf of Mexico-Caribbean region to the Persian Gulf and the Middle East. Then on February 6, just as the public hearings on the Palestine resolution began, the PRC announced proposals for the US Government to finance, construct, own and maintain an oil pipeline from the oil fields of Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, on the Persian Gulf to the Mediterranean. The line was to be operated in conjunction with, and rented by, the Gulf Exploration Company and the Arabian American Oil Company (Aramco), the joint Texas/Standard Oil of California subsidiary which had been renamed from Casoc only a week earlier.²⁹⁵

The issues involved in the plan were complex. Very complex. Although the proposal was made in the name of the PRC it was the brainchild of Standard Oil of California, Gulf and the Texas Oil Company, the three oil companies which were set to benefit from it in a host of ways. They would gain cheaper production and transport, with between $US100 million and $US200 million in capital provided by US taxpayers instead of the companies. The US government would have been even more firmly committed to intervention, either on their behalf or otherwise, in the affairs of the countries involved and especially in the delicate negotiations for rights of way and terminal facilities. The companies would have stolen a march on the British government and British oil companies in the race for future concessions and, at least as important to them, they would walk away from their American competitors with unlimited supplies of cheap oil close to the major markets of Europe and Asia. From the US government's point of view the plan secured access to oil for the war, and for future wars, in much the way that its abortive attempt to buy control of Casoc (Aramco) would have done. It would conserve oil supplies in, or adjacent to, continental USA. It would ensure a dominant position for the United States in all foreseeable international energy discussions. It would tighten relations between the US government and each of the governments of the region and it would also ensure that the US was a key player in sorting out the territorial claims and the politics of the region after the war. And all of these things would be achieved at the expense of Britain.

But the rest of the American oil industry didn't see the plan the same way. They were not keen to see three companies gain such advantages at their expense and they had some strong arguments to back up their case. Reserves in the United States were such that the nation did not need those in the Middle East. Its bid was contrary to the Atlantic Charter, it would bring the country into conflict with Britain, and it would become enmeshed in the affairs of the politically turbulent Middle East. The pipeline would be indefensible in time of war and the need for US military commitments would increase the danger to US security and threaten world peace. On one hand it was a fascist proposal, while on the other hand it was communist. And that was the point which really exposed the industry's motives. The companies, including the three which stood to gain from the plan, did not want the US government to be privy to highly confidential industry marketing arrangements or to be in a position to influence or participate in future investment. If the US government became involved in such things in the name of the national interest it would legitimize intervention, control of production and distribution, and ownership of resources by any government in any country. The industry had fought that one before. It didn't want to do so again, and on March 22, 1944, the Petroleum War Industry Council, which consisted of 55 companies, adopted a resolution demanding that the government stay out of the oil industry and pursue an open door policy for private enterprise. Only the three companies involved in the plan voted against the resolution.²⁹⁶

Although it was under intense pressure the government held its course. It had to tread a minefield in the pipeline route negotiations at the same time that it worked through two years of strained negotiations with Britain to gain agreement for a larger share of Middle East oil for the US and while the two countries fought the war in Europe and Asia together. Eventually, in February 1945, six months after the US administration had agreed to drop the project, the companies let it be known that they would finance the pipeline themselves. It finally disgorged oil at Sidon in November 1949.

But as the pipeline row erupted around them in February 1944 both Hull and the Secretary for War, Stimson, feared that it would become caught up in the Palestine debate in Congress. They were right. Protests were received from the governments of Egypt, Iraq and Lebanon as well as from King Ibn Saud and the Imam Yahya of Yemen. Roosevelt hastened to assure them that it was still American government policy that there would be no change to the status of Palestine without full consultation with both Arabs and Jews. Stimson told the Senate Foreign Relations chairman that the passing of the Zionist resolution could have dangerous repercussions in an area of vital military interest to the US, and he wrote to the House committee chairman that unrestricted Jewish immigration into Palestine “would be prejudicial to the successful prosecution of the war.”²⁹⁷ General Marshall testified, in secret, to similar effect.²⁹⁸

The resolution was shelved and Roosevelt gave approval for the release of the previously agreed Anglo-American statement on non-recognition of any change brought about in Palestine by force. But when word of its impending release reached Zionist leaders Roosevelt was again under pressure to change course. At a meeting with Rabbis Wise and Silver on March 9 he authorized them to announce that the US government had never given its approval for the British White Paper. When a decision was reached in the future, he said, justice would be done to those who sought a Jewish national home, an idea for which the American government and people had always had the deepest sympathy.²⁹⁹

Reaction in the Arab world was swift, with riots breaking out in Damascus, Homs and Jerusalem. The State Department sought to hose down the trouble with notes to its heads of missions in the Middle East stating that the US position was as Roosevelt had privately advised Ibn Saud and that there would be no change without consultation with Arabs and Jews.³⁰⁰ But the die had been cast. Roosevelt had emulated Britain with its World War I Balfour Declaration. He had made conflicting promises to Arabs and Jews, and his fundamental motive had been the same: to secure a strategy for the control of oil resources.

The Zionist response to Roosevelt’s statement was to apply still more pressure to Britain. There had been a lull in terrorism for about two years while the war was at a critical stage in North Africa and the Middle East but by the end of 1943 the military units linked to the Jewish Agency in Palestine (unlike Hull, Stimson and Marshall) were confident that any disruption they caused would not prejudice the defeat of Germany.

In November 1943 twenty leaders of the Stern Gang had escaped from prison and rejoined the only group which had continued its terrorist program right through the war. Then in December the small, extremist Irgun, or Etzel, came under the command of Menachim Begin who set about recruiting and rebuilding that unit.³⁰¹ Begin, a Polish-born lawyer, had been arrested in Soviet Lithuania in 1941 for Zionist activities and imprisoned in a Siberian labor camp. But having displayed exceptional courage among anti-Semitic convicts he was released after a year to join the allied Polish Army. When the Poles were stationed in Palestine in 1943 he was among those who deserted to join the Jewish para-military units.³⁰² The Irgun's return to terrorism was spectacular. It blew up a number of government offices and police stations, captured a sizable haul of arms and temporarily occupied the government radio station in Ramallah. Weizmann was so concerned that he wrote to the London Times expressing grief, horror and indignation at the Jewish terrorism.³⁰³ But the peak of the Stern Gang's atrocities was still some months away. In the meantime there were two developments which had the potential to change the course of the war, the fate of the remaining Jewish population in Europe, and medium or long term international relations. One involved Japan, China, the United States and the war in the Pacific. It was undermined or, at best, ignored. The other involved a new twist to the administration of Hitler's atrocities in Europe, specifically, in Hungary. Both situations provided opportunities for the Allies to think carefully about their attitudes to the final solution and their demands for unconditional surrender by both Japan and Germany. First, Japan.

JAPAN TRIES ANOTHER TACK

As we have already noted, Japan had recognized the lunacy of continuing a war of mass destruction at an early stage. When it had achieved the occupation of those areas of the Pacific and East Asia which were basic to its plan for a New Order in Asia the Emperor had instructed the government to seek an end to the war and, in line with its alliances, the government had proposed to Germany a joint approach to the Western Alliance. That approach had been rebuffed, twice. [See above, this chapter, pp. 16 & 17.] By the beginning of 1944 the government recognized quite clearly that it had long since lost the initiative, that it was facing defeat and – as it still held the same view that a destructive war for the sake of war was pointless – it had decided that a unilateral approach to the Western Alliance through a third party for a negotiated peace was the way to proceed. Late in 1943 it had already agreed to an exchange via the 'neutral' territory of Portuguese Goa of a small group of 'disloyal' Japanese Americans interned in the US for 15,000 American citizens interned in Shanghai but in spite of appeals by the World Jewish Congress for the inclusion of some of the Shanghai refugees in that exchange Cordell Hull, Secretary of State, refused. However at that time Treasury Secretary Henry Morgenthau relaxed controls on the transfer of funds to persons in enemy occupied territory and in March 1944 the flow of relief funds from New York to the Shanghai Ghetto began again after a long break with the transfer of $US25,000 in Swiss Franks.³⁰⁴ Thus, although it recognized the failure of its Fugu Plan the Japanese government was well aware of the centrality of the Jewish Question to the conduct of the war and it saw a window of opportunity for an approach to the United States through its small but significant Jewish community.

About that time Colonel Tsugio Sekiguchi, an adviser to the Prime Minister Tojo, called on Dr. Karl Kindermann, told him that Japan was ready for ‘compromise’ (an armistice), that the government had tried different ways to contact Washington “but they have refused to speak to us” and sought Kindermann’s cooperation, asking that he meet with Admiral Nakamura at Dairen. On his arrival in Dairen a few days later Nakamura outlined to Kindermann a revised Fugu Plan and asked that he relay it to Jewish leaders in New York and through them to the President as the starting point for peace negotiations. Nakamura admitted that the Jews at Shanghai were suffering more as the war progressed but noted that the Nazis had applied intense pressure for them to be ‘dealt with’, which Japan had resisted. Japan admired the Jewish intelligence, he said, and hoped for their cooperation in building a better society after the war. As a starting point the twenty thousand Jews in Shanghai would be moved from their present terrible conditions to a Jewish State in Manchukuo where they would be guaranteed everything necessary for a good life. The clear implication was that settlement would be totally unrestricted and that all of Europe’s refugees would be welcome. Japan asked that in return the Jewish community in the United States, ‘recognizing the sincerity of the Japanese approach’ should use its influence to persuade President Roosevelt to enter peace negotiations.

Kindermann wrote again to Stephen Wise who Tokayer describes in The Fugu Plan [New York: Paddington Press, 1979] as “still president of the American Jewish Congress and adviser to FDR” and encouraged his interest in the plan. However Wise totally opposed it, as he had in 1940. Replying to Kindermann he wrote: “My heart is bleeding when I see what the Japanese have done in other territories. ... The Jewish Congress in America will not enter any negotiations with Japan without the consent of the State Department.”³⁰⁵

However the Japanese government did not give up. Shortly afterwards a group of officers visited the small Jewish community at Tientsin, near Peking, led by Zelig Belokamen, to enquire about their circumstances and whether they were happy with the treatment they received from the Japanese authorities. They said they were. Then, some time later, about mid 1944, they were advised that high ranking officers wished to meet them again during a formal visit. On that occasion Belokamen and his colleagues were told by Colonel Tomiaki Hidaka that “this senseless war” in which Jews, Americans and Japanese were all being killed had been going on too long. They were asked to broadcast to their colleagues in the United States to tell them that Jews were not mistreated under Japanese rule and to ask them to use their “great influence” on the President so that “perhaps an arrangement can be made to bring this war to an end.” Belokamen responded that he would broadcast if the Japanese government was sure that was the best course. But he warned that such a broadcast may take the US by surprise, give the impression that Japan was in a weak position, and result in the strength and fury of the American attacks being increased. The officers conferred, left and no more was heard of that request. But several other attempts were made to establish a working contact with the US government through the Jewish community, but all to no avail.³⁰⁶

In reviewing the development and the rejection of the Fugu Plan Tokayer says that in spite of their research Japanese officials were never able to comprehend certain crucial features of the Jewish situation. That is certainly the case. But it is equally certain that the Christians of Europe and America have never grasped them either. If they had done so, the trouble in the triangle would not have developed in the way that it has. And given the historically short period since Europe and America forced themselves onto Japan and its quite different religious mindset it is hardly surprising that the Japanese misread the situation. Tokayer goes on to say that the most important feature of the Jewish situation which the Japanese failed to grasp was that:

... the American Jewish community considered its ties to its political family, America, at least as strong as its ties to its religious family in Europe. Not understanding this, the executors of the Fugu Plan did not understand, for example, that when they made their proposal to Rabbi Stephen Wise in the winter of 1939, they were confronting not only the principal leader of American Jewry but a Jew whose loyalty to and love for the United States was almost Biblical in its intensity. Had they recognized this and approached him accordingly, the outcome of the Wise meeting, and of the Fugu Plan itself, might have been very different.³⁰⁷

So might the final devastating year of the Holocaust. Quite clearly, if the war in the Pacific had ended with a negotiated peace early in 1944 the war in Europe would not have run its course, either because of the mass of resources which would have been released to direct against Germany or because support for Hitler would have dissolved around him. Given the desperate situation of the Jews in Europe at the beginning of 1944 and what was then well established about Hitler's genocide program, and given also the very complex circumstances since the beginning of the century and the way in which both religious and political leadership of the Jewish community had shifted from continentally Europe and were divided between Britain and the United States, Tokayer's description of its 'ties' in the early 1940s is interesting. However the factor which he does not mention is the Zionist Movement's determination to secure Palestine, its growing dependence on the United States to achieve that, and the way in which that objective would have been undermined if it had accepted the offer of a homeland in Manchukuo either on the first offer or the second. Love of America, its religious freedom, its lack of anti-Semitism compared with Europe, and its economic opportunities were all linked and were all important, but its capacity to deliver Palestine as a Jewish State is what really counted.

THE HUNGARIAN EXPERIENCE

Hungary's role in the war had been something of an enigma. It had been coerced into supporting Hitler's conquest of Yugoslavia and Greece in March 1941 by the offer of Yugoslavia's Backa province, and together with Germany it had declared war on Russia in June that year to enjoy its share of the expected spoils.³⁰⁸ The government then cooperated in Hitler's plan for the liquidation of the Jews to a limited extent, agreeing to the deportation of 150,000 captive Transylvanian Jews but refusing to deport the 550,000 who were Hungarian-born.³⁰⁹ The initial deportation in August 1941 involved about 23,600 persons. When they arrived at their destination the German civil authorities said they could not handle them and asked the Hungarian government to take them back. It refused. They were then marched to a series of bomb craters outside Kamenets Podolsk and mown down by machine gun fire in batches over three days.

Four months later Hungary became totally engulfed in the war when Britain declared war on each of Hitler's partners in the invasion of Russia and it was forced into total collaboration with Germany. Then, in September 1942 Ribbentrop instructed all German embassies to negotiate the deportation of Jews from across Europe including the independent collaborating countries.³¹⁰ Much to Hitler's annoyance the Hungarian government still refused to deport its 'native-born' Jews, but his opportunity to enforce it came in March 1944. The imminent Russian occupation of Hungary made it necessary for Germany to act first.

Eichmann and his henchmen met on March 10 to plan the systematic deportation of nearly three quarters of a million Jews from Hungary. Hitler summoned the Regent, Admiral Horthy, on March 18 to order him to appoint a new Nazi government, to accept German control of Hungary's resources and industry, and to agree to the Eichmann plan. German troops occupied the country two days later.³¹¹ But deportations didn't begin immediately. The papal nuncio, Angelo Rotta, personally made frequent representations to cabinet ministers on behalf of the Jewish community from about March 23 and he seems to have been successful in achieving some reconsideration of the order.³¹² At the same time the US War Refugee Board pleaded with Pius XII, through his Apostolic Delegate in Washington, to intercede. There is no indication that he did. Eichmann's patience was being severely tested. He took personal charge of the 'final solution' in Hungary and in April a representative of the Hungarian Jewish Rescue Committee, Joel Brandt, was summoned to a meeting with him. Brandt was told that all of Hungary's Jews would be permitted to leave the country provided the Allies supplied Germany with 10,000 trucks, 1,000 tons of coffee and 1,000 tons of soap. Eichmann said the first 100,000 Jews could leave for Spain or anywhere else except Palestine immediately the first ten percent of the goods had been delivered. He had, he said, promised his friend the Mufti that they would not go to Palestine. Brandt and his colleagues on the Jewish Rescue Committee played for time while they considered what to do and whether Eichmann's offer was serious.

Early in May, 1944, they learned that he was when two Slovak Jews escaped from Auschwitz and reported that the death camps were being prepared to process Hungary's Jews. Their report reached the papal nuncio in Istanbul, Monsignor Angelo Roncalli (later Pope John XXIII) and he relayed it to the Vatican and thence to Washington.³¹³ Deportation soon began at the rate of 12,000 persons per day. Then on May 13 Eichmann sent Brandt by German courier plane to Turkey to convey the offer of "blood for goods" to British and Jewish representatives.³¹⁴ When the Jewish Agency officials in Istanbul said they had no authority to negotiate he left by train for Palestine, only to be taken into custody at Aleppo by the British and, after interrogation, to be sent to Cairo. Discussions with Jewish, American and British officials on whether the offer was genuine and its implications for the war effort dragged on. Lord Moyne is said to have asked what he would do with a million Jews, and Churchill is said to have been interested but “disbelieving” and concerned that the material Eichmann demanded was “too precious to be turned over to the Nazis.”

The British authorities then publicly denounced the offer as a “brazen attempt to blackmail His Majesty’s Government” and then denied permission for two emissaries of the Jewish Agency to fly to Portugal to pursue the matter with German agents, but Rotta continued his appeals with a strongly worded note to the Hungarian government on May 15. Weizmann then demanded that both the railway from Hungary to Poland and Auschwitz itself be bombed, but his demand was refused.^{315 316 317 318} On May 26 Harold Tittmann, then resident in the Vatican, begged Pius XII to remind the Hungarian authorities of the moral implications of “mass murder of helpless men, women and children.”³¹⁹ At last, on June 25, Pius XII cabled President Horthy asking him to “use all possible influence in order to stop the suffering and torments which countless people are undergoing simply because of their nationality or their race.” Who was he talking about? No mention of ‘murder’ or ‘gassing’ or ‘genocide’, only “suffering and torments”, and no mention of ‘Jew’ or ‘religion’, only “nationality (they were actually Hungarian) or race.” It was a re-run of his pathetic Christmas message. However next day, June 26, Roosevelt sent a message to the Hungarian government, via Switzerland, demanding that it stop deportations of Jews immediately or suffer the consequences. Horthy told the Crown Council the same day that the “cruelties of the deportations” were to be stopped immediately and four days later he cabled Pius XII to confirm that he was doing all in his power “to make prevail the demands of the Christian humanitarian principles.” However Eichmann had his way and deportations continued until July 9 when the final tally was 434,000 Hungarian Jews shipped to Auschwitz and murdered, and Hungary was well on its way to being free of Jews anyway.^{320 321 322 323 324} The only bright spot in the whole sordid story is that Roncalli either ignored or reversed the Vatican ruling that there were to be no Maranos-style baptisms and issued thousands of baptismal certificates to Jews who were known to be slated for deportation.³²⁵

Horthy’s regime was overthrown by the Nazis on October 15 and he was arrested two days later. On November 2, as Soviet troops approached the capital, Eichmann ordered that the remaining 200,000 Jews be moved to a concentration camp at Strasshof, near Vienna. By December 7 Soviet troops were within 25 miles of the capital, Budapest, but, because of Hitler’s determination that it should be held, the Russians did not gain effective control of the city until February 15, 1945.

Whatever they thought of the genuineness of Eichmann’s “blood for goods” offer, the fact that the British authorities turned it into a propaganda opportunity instead of the means of opening discussions on a possible armistice suggests that they were more interested in prosecuting the war to its brutal and dehumanizing unconditional surrender ending on all fronts than in saving lives – irrespective of religion or nationality. The incident had all the hallmarks of an attempt to open peace negotiations and it must be presumed that Eichmann was either acting on Himmler's authority or in collaboration with another person of ministerial rank. It is therefore no wonder that Zionist pressure on both Britain and the United States for the designation of Palestine as a National Home for Jews increased still further. But in view of the coincidence of the two events, (Germany's offer of the negotiated release of three quarters of a million Jews, and Japan's offer of a Jewish State in Manchukuo for which draft plans for a settlement of that number of people already existed), the motives and judgement of the people involved in both decisions are called into serious question.

SIGNS OF A CHANGE OF HEART

While Eichmann was pressing the Allies to find out just how much they loved their Jewish neighbours, Pius XII was pressing the world to adopt a bit more Mariology. On May 4, 1944, he ordered that the Feast of the Immaculate Heart of Mary be observed throughout the church to obtain Mary's intercession for "peace among nations, freedom for the church, the conversion of sinners, the love of purity and the practice of virtue."³²⁶ That feast might just as well have been announced as a bid to drive the theological wedge between Rome and the Protestant churches of Europe just a little bit deeper and to remind the Jews and the Muslims that they were on the wrong side of the salvation fence.

However he showed a welcome change of heart and a streak of understanding of the people of the non-European world whom he sought to bring within the Roman Catholic fold when he addressed the directors of Pontifical Missions. He said:

*the specific character, the traditions, the customs of each nation must be preserved intact, so long as they are not in contradiction with the divine law. The missionary is an apostle of Jesus Christ. His task is not to propagate European civilization in mission lands, like a tree which is transposed to foreign soil. Rather it is his function so to train and guide other peoples, some of whom glory in their ancient and refined civilization, as to prepare and dispose them for the willing and hearty acceptance of the principles of Christian life and behaviour. These principles, moreover, are compatible with any wholesome and healthy civilization whatever and can imbue it with a keener zest for the protection of human dignity and the attainment of happiness.*³²⁷

That address showed a dramatic shift in understanding and attitude since the International Missionary Display and Summi Pontificatus. The church had been very slow to learn and to change but at least the Pope was responding to the pressure of circumstances. In fact he had responded very quickly to the influence of the Japanese sweep through Asia and the Pacific, even if he had not yet understood and responded to the fundamental message in the parody of Mein Kampf. But perhaps he had.

June 1944 saw the major invasion of occupied Europe, Operation Overlord, launched across the channel from Britain to France as well as American troops occupying Rome; the first use of Hitler's secret weapon, the V1 pilotless rocket bomb, against London; the commencement of major bombing of the Japanese mainland by America and its bid to recover the Philippines; the opening of Russia's Operation Bagration which Stalin had promised to coincide with Overlord; and the first Allied successes in the bid to re-open the Burma route to China; the escape of a total of four Jewish prisoners from Auschwitz with full details of its operation; and the rejection of Weizmann's demand for the bombing of Auschwitz.

However it also saw the Pope ask Cardinal Spellman of New York to broadcast to Europe through the American Office of War Information. And what Europe heard was a radical departure from the traditional Vatican line. "Abraham is our Patriarch," he said, and anti-Semitism is just not compatible with that fact. No man can love God and hate his brother. Clearly the public was expected to accept and to act on the new line. And why shouldn't they? It was very simple and very Biblical. But how could hundreds of millions of Christians who had been indoctrinated, or brain-washed, with a contradictory understanding for the whole of their lives be expected to discard that understanding at the drop of a hat? It raised that dreaded question: if the church is correct now, does that make it wrong until now? And if it has been wrong on such an important issue until now, does that mean that its self-understanding and its fundamental theology have been wrong all the time too?

Of course those questions were to go unanswered, but that then raised another one. Why did the Pope not make such a broadcast himself? The lid on the Pandora's box had to be slammed shut! The way to do that was to make Hitler the scapegoat. That was quite easy in the circumstances but it still meant another great change of direction for the Vatican and with Hitler still firmly in control of affairs across much of Europe, although Rome was now beyond his perimeter, the retribution which he had threatened for some time, and which the church had feared, might become a reality. The change of course had to be stage-managed very carefully indeed, otherwise the authority of the church could crumble and Soviet Communism would be the big winner. And it was important that the United States should have a higher profile in such matters, which suited both the church and the US administration. It was quite consistent with its self-understanding as the 'New Israel' and successor to Europe's decadent Christian powers.

But that raised another issue. The United States was now firmly committed in all but statute to the establishment of a State of Israel in Palestine. The use of the expression 'the New Israel' to describe the United States was no longer appropriate. Very quietly its political leaders and some theologians began to talk of America's Judeo-Christian heritage, and that suited the Zionist lobby, too. It does not seem to have occurred to them that to apply the description to a community was inappropriate and that such an expression was actually more appropriate in describing the religion of Islam. Perhaps they had not read enough history.

BRETTON WOODS: A NEW STYLE OF IMPERIALISM

In July 1944, after more than two years of tough behind the scenes negotiations between the United States and Britain, delegates from 44 nations met at the UN Monetary and Financial Conference at Bretton Woods, New Hampshire, to consider proposals for two institutions which would lay the basis for a new post war international economic system: the International Monetary Fund, and the International Bank of Reconstruction and Development, or the World Bank. The first was intended to prevent a repeat of the currency chaos of the inter-war years by providing a pool of gold and currencies from which members could borrow to meet their balance of payments problems, and the second was to provide loans to assist postwar reconstruction and development as well as underwrite private loans for the same purpose.³²⁸

The Bretton Woods institutions formed a vital part of American plans for post war reconstruction. As the State Department saw it, the creation of collective security apparatus was useless without reforming the world economy. As a 1944 State department memo on US post-war commercial policies put it:

*The development of sound international economic relations is closely related to the problem of security. The establishment of a system of international trade which would make it possible for each country to have greater access to world markets and resources would reduce incentives to military aggression and provide a firm basis for political cooperation. Conversely, if such a system is not established, the international frictions which would result in the economic field would be certain to undermine any international security organization which might be created. Past experience makes it clear that close and enduring cooperation in the political field must rest on a sound foundation of cooperation in economic matters.*³²⁹

The basic principles which American planners thought should underlie a reformed international economic order were simple. Primary among them was the two centuries old liberal concept of the Open Door, or non-discrimination in foreign trade, investment and navigation, which in the nineteenth century had been championed by the British. Second was a commitment to the principle of multilateralism, or cooperation among nations to encourage free trade, and third was a commitment to the most favoured nation principle, whereby signatories to economic agreements extend to each other any commercial favours granted to other states.

To most American planners and politicians it had become self-evident that the discriminatory trading blocs erected by Britain in the Commonwealth, Japan in the Far East, and Germany in Eastern Europe had created the world economic crisis of the Great Depression, led to Hitler's rise to power, subsequently exacerbated international tensions, and had set the great powers on the road to war.³³⁰ In apportioning the blame they could very conveniently overlook the fact that US discrimination against Japanese goods was a prime factor in Tokyo's decision to carve out its Greater East Asia Co-Prosperity Sphere³³¹, and that the US had contributed to the breakdown on the pre-war world economy with its high-tariff Fordney-McCumber act of 1929 and its refusal to commit itself to the success of the 1933 London Economic Conference.³³² But that was beside the point. The point they were making was that competitive discrimination led to economic warfare, poverty, and dictators, and that led to military warfare. The Open Door, on the other hand, led to economic prosperity, and prosperity led to peace.³³³ The Open Door, therefore, had to be encouraged.

Behind the apparent idealism, however, lay the assumption of equality between traders and the issues of self-interest that underwrote the consensus. There was also the conveniently overlooked fact that without equality 'free trade' is simply an opportunity for those with the means to exploit those without. When State Department planners referred to the need for economic security, they meant first and foremost the economic security of the United States. The experience of the Depression had shown that Roosevelt's New Deal, with its emphasis on national economic recovery insulated from the problems of the world economy, had been insufficient to the task. And as the war had progressed and the US economy had developed at an astounding rate, it had become clear that come peace-time there would be an entirely new problem: a crisis of overproduction. In April 1944 the War Production Board had calculated that by the end of the war with Germany, when the United States still expected to be at war with Japan, $27 billion worth of annual industrial capital would be released. By late 1944, $20 billion in new industrial plant had been constructed during war-time, three-quarters of it financed by the government. By June 1945 capital assets in manufacturing had increased by 65%; 2700 liberty ships to carry goods abroad had alone been contracted for.³³⁴ At the same time an abrupt end to war-financed production would leave millions of workers unemployed: the War Production Board in April 1944 calculating five and a half to six million, while Roosevelt in a letter to Hull in October that year cited a figure of 4.5 million.³³⁵ Clearly, the open door needed to be wide ajar if the slack was to be taken up. Assistant Secretary of State Dean Acheson conservatively estimated how far in late 1944: $10 billion in trade would be needed to add 3 million jobs in industry and a further 1 million in agriculture.³³⁶ The Department of Commerce in comparison suggested $14 billion, since $14.3 billion had been exported in 1944.³³⁷

But the need for an open door didn't rest with exports. If the US was to maintain its overall industrial output – and the security of its military output – it required critical quantities of certain raw materials that it possessed in short supply or not at all, and the situation had worsened due to the war. As Assistant Secretary of State William Clayton stated in 1946:

Due to the serious depletion of our natural resources during the war, we must now import many metals and minerals...Indeed, today we are net importers of practically all important metals and minerals except two – coal and oil. Who knows how long we can go without importing oil?^{338 339}

However, the glaring realities of United States self-interest did little to undermine the idealistic argument. On the contrary, since at the end of the war the US would be the world's most powerful economy, it was argued that a healthy and growing US economy was the key to world trade, and world trade was the key to international prosperity and peace. If US trade collapsed, the shaky world economy would topple, leaving communist revolution, dictatorship and war in command.³⁴⁰ In effect, what was good for the US was good for the world and vice versa. The extent to which that reasoning would appeal to the rest of the world was a different matter entirely.

However, the solution to that problem dovetailed neatly with another. During the war it had become evident that by war's end the US would have accumulated large reserves of investment funds in the form of War Bonds, savings accounts and the like. Since it was impossible to add to the already over expanded domestic industrial capacity, these investments would have to be abroad. And since war devastated Europe would be in no position to buy from the US anyway, and the US needed foreign export markets, the logical use for the excess capital was in financing foreign imports of US goods. To attain the Commerce Department's $14 billion export target it was variously estimated that between $5 billion and $8 billion in annual US loans and grants would be required.³⁴¹ And in case anyone got into their head the idea that Washington's new international economic order was not for them, such loans and grants provided the perfect carrot and stick: dangle the money as an incentive to play by the new rules, and if that wasn't enough to elicit the appropriate response, hit them with the threat of trying to reconstruct without it.

Though the proposals tabled at Bretton Woods were jointly sponsored by Britain and the United States, the United States' financial might had already guaranteed it the whip hand in their design and operation.³⁴² Both institutions were to be bankrolled by contributions from the member countries according to a quota determined by their relative economic strength, with voting rights proportional to the size of each member's subscription. The size of the US subscriptions thus gave it a veto over World Bank loans, and close to one third of votes in the IMF. That was not quite enough for a veto over the IMF's transactions, but sufficient to prevent the adoption of any measures that might be considered prejudicial to US interests.³⁴³

The British were not entirely happy with the outcome. They feared IMF interference in their planned post-war domestic welfare-state programs,³⁴⁴ but in addition it was clear that Washington's new economic order would spell the end of Britain's special trading arrangements with the Commonwealth. In particular, mandatory free convertibility of member currencies would spell the end of both the Sterling Zone and its Dollar Pool which the British had hoped would help to overcome their inevitable post-war balance of payments problems with the United States. In order to alleviate their anxieties the Americans agreed to insert a scarce currency clause in the IMF agreement which, for the first few years after ratification, would allow a country with chronic payments difficulties either to restrict its payments to a surplus country or devalue its currency. The British, however, asked for more or, perhaps more appropriately, less. Already over a barrel, they didn't wait to be hit over the head, and ratification of the accord was made conditional on a post-war bilateral loan from the United States.³⁴⁵ If they thought that was the end of the matter, however, they had another think coming.

Securing Britain's cooperation in the new system was not the only aim of US planners. Equally important was gaining the participation of the Soviets, though for reasons of a different stripe. Commercially and financially Soviet participation was virtually irrelevant, since their percentage of world trade was minimal and the rouble was not an international currency.³⁴⁶ Politically, however, it constituted a key aspect of American plans for postwar cooperation and reconstruction. In large part American leaders hoped to cement the post-war relationship by increasing the economic ties between the two countries, and Soviet participation in the Open Door would provide a means to remedy its considerable reconstruction problems and complement American needs for export markets.³⁴⁷ However, equally important for the State Department was the need to help secure its aims in Eastern Europe. Eastern Europe was going to be important in post-war reconstruction as an agrarian region complementary to industrialized Western Europe. The Soviet Union thus had to be incorporated into the new multilateral trading system to prevent it from establishing an exclusive economic hold, while simultaneously encouraging East European prosperity so as to bolster its independence from the Soviet Union³⁴⁸

To encourage Soviet participation in the new institutions, specific provisions for state trading and socialist economies were built into the system.³⁴⁹ Nevertheless, the Soviets clearly had little reason to be enthusiastic about Bretton Woods, since the whole shebang was geared towards the needs of capitalist economies, and much of its detail was simply irrelevant to the USSR.³⁵⁰ In addition, weighing against the concessions to state trading was the fact that the Articles of Agreement explicitly stated that the institutions were designed to encourage private investment, while their supposedly non-political nature was undermined by American insistence that the two institutions be permanently located in Washington under the watchful eye of the United States Government.³⁵¹

Bemused by the technicalities argued back and forth by the British and the Americans at New Hampshire, the Soviets by the end of the conference nevertheless signed on the dotted line, voting with the majority to have the articles submitted for ratification by participating nations after the eager Americans had agreed to increase their subscription to the IMF, and hence voting power, by 50 per cent.³⁵² However, cooperation with the US on the economic front was also desirable, since they wanted US industrial goods for reconstruction. But to get those they needed a loan – a big loan – and the US knew it. Already unofficial talks on the subject had been held between the US Ambassador and Soviet trade officials for the best part of a year, so when Treasury Secretary Morgenthau dangled the prospect of such a loan as an incentive to sign up at Bretton Woods, it just added one more reason for the Soviets to do so.³⁵³

THE COMPETITION HOTS UP

In July, 1944, at the time that delegates gathered at Bretton Woods, there was a series of developments which reflected the enormous trauma of the war as it ground into its final stages. A group of senior German army officers, frustrated by Hitler's headlong rush to defeat and his refusal to seek terms for an armistice to limit the devastation, carried out an abortive assassination attempt against the Fuhrer. Their failure cost the lives of Germany's most illustrious soldier, Field Marshall Rommel, two other field marshals and five generals, and ensured that the war would grind on until the Allies-of-convenience had occupied all of Europe and carved it up to the people's dissatisfaction.

Changes were made to family law in Russia which reflected the dramatic impact of the war through deaths, lost manpower and family breakdown. In a speech on June 22 to mark the third anniversary of the German invasion, Stalin had noted that at that stage 5,300,000 men from the Red Army were either dead, missing or prisoners of war. That has been described as a 'manifest understatement' because German officials later admitted that 3,700,000 Russian prisoners died in their hands, mainly of starvation, and Russian military deaths have more recently been estimated at between 11 million and 13.6 million. To those figures must be added 7.7 million civilian dead and an estimated 5 million military casualties, making a total of between 20 and 25 million casualties.^{354 355 356} Divorce was made even more difficult and costly, and incentives were provided to raise the national birth rate through increased taxes for unmarried people and couples without children, and increased subsidies for families with more than three children. Contrary to Vatican propaganda, these changes confirmed the importance which the Communist authorities placed on the family as the basic social unit of society.

Also in July, 1944, the struggle for post war control of Poland, the country which had been a 'negotiable' buffer between the moving powers of western Europe and eastern Europe for so many centuries, entered a dramatic new phase. On July 22 Russian troops crossed the River Bug, which formed the boundary between the German and Russian regions of Poland under the pact of August 1939, and the Soviet Government immediately announced that the Polish Government in exile in London was illegal. Soviet Russia recognized the Communist National Council of the Homeland (KRN) in Moscow as the sole legal source of authority in Poland, with the Polish Committee of National Liberation which was being set up in Chelm as a provisional government. The KRN, it said, had assumed authority for the Communist People's Army which had been a significant part of the underground movement.³⁵⁷

However, the London Poles had plans of their own. Following the stalemated London talks with the Soviets in 1941 they had decided to mount an uprising against the German armies of occupation at the appropriate time to recover Polish independence and to pre-empt any move by Russia to annex part or all of Poland in accordance with the 1939 German-Soviet treaties. Anticipating that, the Soviet Government had made its own move. In 1942 it set up the Polish Workers' Party to gain support for an independent Poland in alliance with Russia, with certain eastern regions ceded to Russia and compensated for by annexation of German territory.³⁵⁸ That concept had been discussed informally by Stalin, Churchill and one or two others, including Eden, following a dinner hosted by Roosevelt in Teheran on May 28 1943, with each of those involved said to have responded favourably.³⁵⁹

Thereafter the London Poles and the Polish Workers' Party had jockeyed for position and planned their next moves. Russia acted first with its announcement of the provisional government in Chelm. Splits then occurred between the London Government and the Home Army's commanders and within the Home Army itself over the strategy to be adopted, and the eventual decision was to bring forward the uprising in an effort to gain control of Warsaw, the capital. When it was launched on August 1, 1944, in a rather disorganized manner, with little liaison between Warsaw, London and the Allies and with a shortage of ammunition, the uprising was headed for a rough passage. In spite of that the Poles achieved some early successes. However, urgent appeals for the despatch of a Polish Parachute Brigade from the western front were rejected by the Anglo-American combined Chiefs of Staff³⁶⁰, munitions supplies could not be maintained and the Germans, determined to put down the uprising, counter attacked with great force.

Opposed by troops with greatly superior equipment the Poles faced a slaughter, and despite their bitterness towards Russia they sought Stalin's help. But the Russians could not offer help on a large scale. They were tied down by German forces at Praga and actually had to withdraw the armies approaching Warsaw to secure their positions. Stalin could agree only to air drops of hand weapons. Then communications broke down. Polish spokespersons told the world that the Russians had withdrawn to leave them at the mercy of the Germans, which was not fact. Stalin responded that the Poles had started the 'reckless adventure' of the uprising prematurely and without consulting the Russian command, which was fact. The old ideological arguments began to get in the way of any rescue plan which could have been mounted.³⁶¹ Stalin refused to allow Allied planes to ferry supplies to the Poles in Warsaw via Russian controlled airfields and while Churchill wanted to make an issue of this with Stalin, Roosevelt refused. The Americans were negotiating with the Russians for the use of Siberian air bases for the assault on Japan and he didn't want a little issue like Poland to get in the way.³⁶²

German fire rained down on Warsaw and the slaughter continued. Germany was doing to Warsaw what Britain had done to Hamburg a year earlier. The Polish forces surrendered on October 1. The city was totally evacuated during the next few days, and then in accordance with Hitler's orders it was to be systematically and totally destroyed. It was no longer to appear on a map.³⁶³

In the meantime, on August 8, British and American cabinet delegations signed a general agreement concerning the orderly development of oil reserves, although without specific reference to the Middle East. The long running proposal for a US Government-owned pipeline across Saudi Arabia was allowed to lapse, requiring the companies involved to finance it themselves. With one less complication to worry about the British War Cabinet then finally agreed, on August 23, 1944, to the establishment of a Jewish Brigade Group fighting under its own flag. In July Churchill had written very sharp letters to the Cabinet Secretary and the Secretary of State for War castigating the War Office on its lack of action³⁶⁴

A NEW VATICAN ALLIANCE

On the same day as the War Cabinet's decision on the Jewish brigade, August 23, Churchill met the Pope in Rome. Their reserve, or animosity, over Pius XII's play for power during the war and inaction on the Jewish Question gave way to their mutual dislike of Communism which was, according to Churchill, their principal topic of conversation. This was another alliance of convenience. However it must be assumed that they talked at length about "the Jewish question," the Vatican's change of heart and the British cabinet plan for the partition of Palestine which was still unpublished. However, it was the issue of Communism which had prompted his decision to make a visit to the region for talks with Marshall Tito of Yugoslavia, M. Papandreou of Greece, and the leaders of the political triangle in Italy, as well as the Pope. That visit illustrates the cleft-tongue approach of the Western Capitalist Allies towards Soviet Russia and how the anti-Communist policies which they were pursuing relentlessly in the countries within their direct sphere of interest contributed to the deep and long division of Europe after the war.

Churchill and the Pope had good reason to talk about Communism. When Hitler – the scourge of the Night Journey and a key player in the struggle between Gog and Magog – turned on the Soviet Union and it was drawn into the war, the world was witness to a challenge to the people of the two opposing ideologies, Capitalism and Communism. That challenge was to get together and talk through their differences, and to resolve the basis of their social and political conflict to the benefit of all humanity. Unfortunately, given the circumstances and prevailing attitudes, there was neither the time nor the inclination to do so. As a result the Soviet Union was drawn into an alliance by Britain with almost indecent haste. But the whole world knew that in due course there would be competition for the hearts, minds and votes of people in countries around the world after the war. At that stage much of the continent had not been drawn into the conflict directly, and there was probably a lot of wishful thinking among British politicians and planners that Russian military operations and direct political influence could be restricted to the wedge from Russia to Germany via Poland, Czechoslovakia and the Baltic States. However, several of the countries which had not yet entered hostilities would soon declare themselves in alliance with Germany rather than Russia and Britain. Few could therefore have anticipated the extent to which the Allies would have to rely on Russia to clear German forces out of Eastern Europe, as well as to act as a restraining influence on Japan. But Britain's need to draw more allies into the fray against Hitler was so critical that those people involved in the decision making were ready to make a down payment in 1941 and not to consider the costs and the wider implications until the end of the war was in sight.

That time was fast approaching, and the civil and political power vacuums being left in Eastern Europe as Hitler retreated or was expelled would have to be filled. And because of the decision taken at Teheran that the Western Allies would not go into Turkey, Greece or the Balkans, the number of countries in which Communist groups would have a head start had jumped. In fact it was a near certainty that unless the Western Allies acted quickly to set up acceptable governments-in-exile or to have de facto governments waiting in the wings, the Soviet armies of occupation would ensure that Communist or Communist-friendly regimes were established. After all, the Western Allies had taken action to ensure that non-Communist regimes were established in the countries which they occupied, and they had every intention of continuing to do so. Until then, however, it was just a matter of ‘first in, best dressed’. The spoils of war – the hearts, minds and wealth producing capacity of the people – would go to those powers which appeared to be the victors or which supported them. So the scramble was on to get as big a share as possible, until either some form of understanding was reached which would legitimate who was to get what or, alternatively, conflict broke out between the great powers themselves. So the Western Allies were getting worried, but, for all their willingness to talk about an international peace keeping system which they had called the “United Nations” they were still not prepared to talk about the fundamental issues which made such a peace keeping mechanism necessary. They were too intent on maintaining their current positions of privilege.

For Britain, that immediately meant securing control of the Mediterranean, and first on Churchill’s agenda was a visit with Marshall Tito, the popular Communist leader to whom the Allies had transferred their support because of the ineffectiveness of the alternatives. The British Government wanted to see the restoration of the monarchy in a reunified Yugoslavia rather than the establishment of a republic, and Churchill pressed Tito to talk with the exiled king and not to establish a Communist regime.³⁶⁵ In Greece, which the German forces were expected to evacuate to strengthen their defences elsewhere, there was a strong possibility that the Socialist and Communist minority groups, the National Liberation Front (EAM) and the People’s National Army of Liberation (ELAS), might turn against the government-in-exile of M. Papandreou when the Germans left. The king, also in exile, pressed Britain to support Papandreou and to withdraw its military missions which were assisting the minority groups in their fight against the Germans. Churchill’s solution was to direct that up to 10,000 British troops be flown in as soon as the German evacuation occurred and before the minor parties could seize power with the support of the Soviet Union, in order to prop up the Papandreou Government. Roosevelt supported it.³⁶⁶

The absolute hypocrisy and the absolute determination to prevent a change in the political order were obvious. It was a case of “let your partner do the dirty work, then call him the new enemy and send in your own troops to keep him out of a position of influence.” The similarity between this British-American intervention and their intervention in Russia as World War I drew to close to prop up the Capitalist monarchy (as depraved as it was) in order to suppress the Bolshevik Revolution, was remarkable. But the Soviet Union was supposed to accept it. So Churchill met the Pope. But while they talked, the German army held the Allies pinned down at the Gothic line, just north of Florence, unable to cross the Appenine Mountains into the politically critical region of the Po Valley – an essential first step if they were to reach the Danube Valley and ‘liberate’ (or occupy) Central Europe before the Russians did so.

But the news was all about Romania. King Michael had ordered a cease fire on the Russian front, immediate preparation of an armistice with Russia, the arrest of his army chief of staff and the German Ambassador, and a declaration of war against Germany – in alliance with Russia. In late August, with the approval of Britain and the United States, an armistice was signed giving the Soviets virtually identical rights to those taken by the Western Allies in Italy, that is, virtually complete political control. Given the Italian precedent, however, and the fact that no British or American ground forces had participated in Romania's liberation, there was little else the Western Allies could do. For their part the Americans restricted their immediate concerns to limiting the size of reparations so as to prevent any interference with normal trading relations after the war.³⁶⁷

However, that was hardly going to be the end of the matter. Churchill had been very concerned about the consequences of the Vatican Concordat with Germany, about the Pope's apparent support for Hitler against Russia and about the Vatican's long-running contribution to anti-Semitism. He may have been equally concerned with its abuse of power in determining civil and political policies in many countries. But now was no time to worry about such niceties. The Vatican had to be encouraged to use all the resources at its disposal to assist non-Communist players everywhere, but especially in Eastern Europe. Here was another World War I repeat performance. Capitalism was to be equated to Christianity and the two would work hand in hand to protect each others interests. But one part of the formula had changed. Christianity was again respectable in the Soviet Union and the Russian Orthodox Church was back in business as a force to be reckoned with.

In the circumstances there was therefore much jubilation when the surrender of the German army of occupation in Paris was accepted on August 25 and General DeGaulle returned to the city in triumph the same day. Fearful of a takeover by the communist led-resistance forces, de Gaulle had raced to Paris to prevent the possibility of a communist led liberation of the city. He needn't have worried. Despite the fact that the Communist led resistance was later estimated by Eisenhower to have been worth an extra 15 division during operation 'Overlord' – larger than De Gaulle's own forces – the Communists had already decided to cooperate with de Gaulle in the re-establishment of central state authority.³⁶⁸ One way or another Stalin was clearly prepared to cede influence in Western Europe. But as the Western Allies were about to find out, the fate of Eastern and Central Europe would be another matter entirely.

The liberation of Paris created a feeling that peace was just around the corner. It was therefore timely that while Churchill talked religion and politics in the Mediterranean, the Foreign Ministers of the Allied Powers met at Dumbarton Oaks, Washington, from August 21 to 28, to work on concrete plans for the post war United Nations Organization. Two sessions at Dumbarton Oaks were required. At the first, from August 21 to 28, the Soviet Union was present with the United States and Britain. At the second, from September 29 to October 7, China was present and the Soviet Union did not take part. Despite substantial disagreement, there was consensus that in accordance with Roosevelt's plans there should be a broadly representative body with a consultative and advisory role, the General Assembly, and an executive body, the Security Council. The Assembly would initially include all those who had signed the Atlantic Charter or fought against the Axis powers. And it was eventually agreed that the Security Council would have rotating membership, with the exception of the United States, the Soviet Union, Britain, France and China who would be permanent members. But there was strong disagreement about voting arrangements, so the question of the enforceability of decisions – along with the thorny issue of who could exercise the power of veto and in what circumstances – was left for the Big Three to determine.

A DIFFERENT KIND OF THREAT

At about this time, during the campaign leading to the US presidential election which was due in November, 1944, a serious threat to the re-election prospects of President Roosevelt – and to the Allied war strategy in the Far East was averted – by domestic political intervention against the Republican presidential candidate, Thomas E. Dewey, by the chairman of the US Joint Chiefs of Staff, General George Marshall.

Dewey had learned from inside sources of the “splendid arrangement” between Roosevelt and Churchill for the exchange of intercepted Japanese military and diplomatic traffic prior to the Japanese attack on Pearl Harbour. He could not have had access to all of the material which had been intercepted, but he had sufficient to know that Roosevelt and his inner circle of cabinet secretaries and military advisers were fully aware of the planned attack from those intercepts. The implications of the lack of preparedness of the US forces, the deception which had been practiced and the manipulation of the American public for the course of the war was then self-evident. Dewey planned to use the proof of the intercepted messages against Roosevelt in a series of campaign “stump Speeches” during the presidential election. Whether he planned to radically change the Allied approach to the closing stages of the war and to enter armistice negotiations if he were elected or whether he was simply going to use the fact of the intercepts in his bid to unseat Roosevelt is not discussed by author Robert Stinnett in Day of Deceit. However it can be assumed that the impact of the disclosure would have been explosive. War was raging in the Pacific and lists of American casualties were published in the newspapers daily. The memory of Pearl Harbour was the principal psychological weapon in US recruiting and war support campaigns, coupled with vigorous reporting of the atrocities which were then being committed, and the public reaction to the disclosures would have been strong. It can therefore be assumed that a review of war strategy would have been forced upon the government irrespective of who won the presidential election.

However, at that stage the Japanese still did not realize that their Kaigun Ango codes had been solved by US code-breakers, that all of their traffic was being systematically read by the Allies, and that battle strategy was adapted to that traffic automatically. It was a very powerful factor in the outcome of major battles and in engendering a belief in American superiority, thus easing the way for the US to gain a position of dominance across Asia and the Pacific. If the code-breaking had been exposed during the US presidential election the Japanese would have immediately changed to a different communications code system, the course of future battles would have been thrown into doubt, and American moral superiority and dominance could not have been imposed upon Asia with such arrogance. Having learned of Dewey's campaign plan, Marshall intervened, telling him bluntly that "American lives are at peril." The ethics and the consequences of the original deception, and other likely consequences were probably not discussed. Dewey dropped his plan. Other issues would now be able to determine the election outcome.³⁶⁹

ANOTHER VERSAILLES?

When Churchill and Roosevelt met in Quebec again from September 10 to 17, during the US election campaign, another issue vital to the shape of the post-war peace was discussed: the future of Germany. Two issues had to be resolved: first, arrangements for the period of occupation following an armistice, and second, proposals for the longer term future of Germany. In relation to the first it was decided that Germany would be divided into three occupation zones for purposes of "disarmament, policing and preservation of order" – American, British and Russian. In relation to the second, consent was given to a radical framework put forward by the US Treasury Secretary, Henry Morgenthau.

Under Morgenthau's proposal the industries of the Rhur and Saar would be dismantled, their equipment made available to Russia for the reconstruction of its own industries, and Germany would be required to substitute imports from Britain for its own manufactured goods. Germany would become essentially a primary producer, disarmed, dismembered and depressed. In terms of the philosophy of victory very little seemed to have changed since World War I. As much as anything, the Morgenthau Plan was a formula for revenge, and it soon came under fire when it was leaked to the public. As a result, though Roosevelt and Churchill initialled the plan at that stage, it was later publicly repudiated and put on ice.³⁷⁰

For the remainder of the year, however, Morgenthau's approach vied with competing State Department proposals for Roosevelt's allegiance. The State Department had in fact made the initial running, presenting plans in September 1943 which argued for the encouragement of democratic institutions as the best means of safeguarding future peace. This was to be achieved by methods which would create a minimum of bitterness among Germans, including the rebuilding of the German economy to provide for a tolerable standard of living.³⁷¹ But that had been considered too kind an assessment of the nasty Germans, and Roosevelt had found more sympathy with Morgenthau's argument that programmes for democracy and re-education would not be sufficient to eliminate German aggression.

However, there was more at stake than just the nature of the German national character, and as the debate raged in the corridors of Washington the implications of each plan for future international relations gradually became apparent. While the State Department favoured limited reparations, disarmament and the elimination of German domination of Europe, they also wanted to rebuild a democratic and capitalist Germany to stabilize a weakened Europe. The Morgenthau Plan, they argued, would shift the whole balance of industrial power in Europe, implying that a weakened Germany would enable Russia to dominate the entire continent. In response Morgenthau argued that the real motive of those who opposed a weak Germany was the fear of Russia and communism. He was half right. However what the State Department envisaged was a strong Germany and a strong Russia whose traditional hostilities were muted in a completely restructured world where the security of all was guaranteed. But in the circumstances that was no more realistic than the Morgenthau Plan, and was likely to end up anti-Soviet in practice since a capitalist Germany would be inimical to the Soviets and align itself with the West in any conflict between them. That was precisely what the Soviets feared, and the draconian Morgenthau Plan, for all its failings, at least had the virtue of acknowledging it.³⁷²

Nevertheless, in characteristic style Roosevelt just added Germany to the balls he already had in the air, refusing to make a decision. However, as with Eastern Europe, the day of reckoning on Germany was fast approaching, and in a similar fashion the fact that the State Department wanted to cooperate with the Soviets in the context of the new world peace organization was almost entirely beside the point. The creation of a collective security apparatus was only half of the State Department's post-war plans, and it was the other half which held the vital implications for German reconstruction. A democratic and capitalist Germany was a vital link in their plans to create a new American-led international economic order, and despite the terrible devastation the war had inflicted on America's communist ally, satisfying Russian reconstruction needs would just have to take a back seat.

However, a decision on Germany was still months away. While Roosevelt and Churchill were meeting in Quebec, attention was drawn back to the Middle East and the fallout from the Anglo American Oil Agreement. Iran and its rich oil-fields had for some time been shaping up as a major focus of competition between the Allies. Occupied by British and Soviet troops in 1941, it was also host to substantial forces from the American Persian Gulf Command responsible for delivering crucial Lend-Lease supplies to Russia. Soviet behaviour and intentions in regard to northern Iran, a region of traditional Russian interest which its troops now occupied, had become a matter of some concern to both Britain and the US, as well as to the Iranian's themselves. In December 1943, following requests for assurances from the Iranian government in response to Soviet economic and political interference in Azerbaijan, the United States had succeeded in gaining Stalin's agreement to the Declaration Regarding Iran, which included further guarantees of Iran's sovereignty and territorial integrity according to the Atlantic Charter on top of those already contained in the 1941 Tripartite Treaty. Fortunately for both the US and Britain, principle had once again meshed quite neatly with self-interest, since the US was keen to secure a buffer for its oil interests in Saudi Arabia and the British were keen to secure their own in Iran against the Soviets.

FOR RUSSIA ... A NEW BUFFER

The Soviets, however, were interested in more than oil: they were also motivated by the desire to secure an outer defence zone along their southern frontier and they were determined to consolidate their own position and prevent any foreign power from establishing a foothold in the region. Thus, although the US was willing to accommodate their oil interests, Soviet suspicions about American intentions were inevitably raised by negotiations between Standard Vacuum, Sinclair Oil and the Iranian government. When the Anglo-American agreement was signed on August 8, 1944, it was time to act. In September the Soviets presented to the Iranian government their response: terms for a massively extended oil concession comprising exclusive exploration rights in the north for five years to be granted as part of a political agreement between governments. Fearful of Soviet pressures which would follow any political agreement, the Iranian cabinet postponed the discussion of all oil concessions until after the war.³⁷³

FOR THE ARABS ... SELF HELP

While Iran was suffering under a three way tug of war, the Arab world moved to assert its independence. Immediately after the collapse of the Iraqi rebellion in May 1941 Eden had said the British Government would support any efforts by the Arab countries to strengthen their cultural, economic and political ties. This was a distinct change from the divide-and-rule mentality which had characterized the Western approach to the Middle East, but it just happened to be in Britain's interests to change course at that time. A number of bilateral discussions had already taken place, coincidentally with confused negotiations over oil, pipeline routes, Jewish refugees and relations with Germany, and the Free French occupation of Syria and Lebanon. In July, however, the Premier of Egypt, Nahhas Pasha, had taken the initiative and invited all Arab States to a Conference in Cairo to discuss Palestine and other issues. In preparation for the conference, Saudi Arabia asked the United States for a formal statement on its attitude to Arab union. In a note circulated in response to likely participant countries the State Department said the US was in sympathy with Arab aspirations for independence but while it also viewed the move for unification with sympathy, as long as any action conformed with the principles of the Atlantic Charter, it felt that the first steps towards unity should emphasize the strengthening of economic, social and cultural domains.³⁷⁴ It omitted 'political'.

The conference of Arab countries opened in Alexandria on September 25 with delegations from Lebanon, Egypt, Iraq, Syria and Trans-Jordan and observers from Saudi Arabia, Yemen, Libya, Morocco and Palestine. Two weeks later, on October 7, the five full delegations signed the Alexandria Protocol and undertook to establish the League of Arab States. The Saudi Arabian and Yemeni Governments adhered to the protocol a few months later and other governments have since joined the League progressively. The founding nations considered various forms of organization including complete political union and a federated state, but chose to adopt a loose confederation with the emphasis on co-ordination and cooperation.³⁷⁵

The objects of the League can be summarized thus: strengthening relations between member states, protection of their independence and sovereignty against aggression, co-ordination of political plans to ensure cooperation between member states, the execution of agreements entered into and the supervision in a general way of the affairs and interests of the Arab countries. The Protocol required cooperation between members in economic, cultural, social and other matters, anticipated the postwar establishment of “institutions which bind various powers more closely together” and gave special recognition to the independent policy which Lebanon had adopted two years earlier. But it also contained a special resolution concerning Palestine, giving clear warning that “Palestine constitutes an important part of the Arab World and that the rights of the Arabs in Palestine cannot be touched without prejudice to peace and stability in the Arab World.” It referred to “the pledges binding the British Government and providing for the cessation of Jewish immigration, the preservation of Arab Lands, and the achievement of independence for Palestine [as] permanent Arab rights whose prompt implementation would constitute a step toward the desired goal and toward the stabilization of peace and security.” It declared willingness to work for and to support the legitimate aims and rights of the Palestinians and referred a proposal for an “Arab National Fund” to safeguard the lands of the Arabs of Palestine to a financial and economic committee for a report.

And part of the special resolution read:

The committee also declares that it is second to none in regretting the woes which have been inflicted upon the Jews of Europe by European dictatorial states. But the question of these Jews should not be confused with Zionism, for there can be no greater injustice and aggression than solving the problem of the Jews of Europe by another injustice, i.e., by inflicting injustice on the Arabs of Palestine of various religions and denominations. ³⁷⁶

The warning was very clear. The Great Powers and the Jewish Community should have been in no doubt about the difficulties ahead if they insisted on the establishment of the Jewish National Homeland as planned. And the warning was reinforced twice within the next three days.

On October 9 King Farouk dismissed Nahhas Pasha and his Wafd Party government for being corrupt, too pro-British, and unable to cope with the social pressures on the Egyptian population as a result of the Allied wartime occupation. The move was in line with his earlier contacts with the German authorities and his wish to see the British expelled from the region, but it was clearly also a response to the humiliation which he had suffered at Britain's hands two and a half years earlier. At the beginning of 1942 a German victory in North Africa appeared imminent and although the Egyptian government was cooperating with British forces the British government believed the Egyptians would change sides if German successes continued. That belief was well founded. The British Government therefore gave Farouk an ultimatum to appoint a Wafd Party government with the very pro-British Nahhas Pasha as Premier by a certain date. When he declined, the palace was surrounded and the British Ambassador presented Farouk with a document of abdication but did not press it when Farouk agreed to appoint Nahhas Pasha. The humiliation felt by many army officers was no less than that suffered by their king.³⁷⁷ Thus, following the establishment of the Arab League, he appointed a government which was closer to the Muslim Brotherhood and its twin aims of establishing an Islamic State and bringing freedom to the whole Muslim World. Churchill made no reference to this crisis in his memoirs of the Second World War.

Next day, October 10, the Commander in Chief of Middle East Forces and the British High Commissioner issued a joint formal communiqué. They condemned the crimes and outrages which had been carried out since the beginning of 1944 by “Jewish terrorists acting with the deliberate intention of bringing about, by force, developments favourable to the realization of their political aims.” These events, they said, were proceeding side by side with the bitterest phase of the critical fight between the United Nations and Nazi Germany and the cruelest, most implacable and most ruthless persecution that the long history of Jewry has ever known. Criminals in Palestine, with their active and passive sympathizers, were directly impeding the war effort.³⁷⁸

FOR THE JEWS ... THE PROMISE OF A STATE

But the Zionists were unmoved. They had become so committed to the notion of the right of Jewish return to Israel that its supporters were intent on wringing every skerrick of sympathy and support from Hitler’s final solution. They had a committed Zionist leading the government which held the mandate for Palestine and they had statements of support from the only two political parties in the United States which had any chance of forming a government. If either of them wavered they could play one against the other to very good effect. However in the wake of the Alexandria Protocol anything was possible. They might both withdraw their undertaking by mutual agreement so that Palestine would become a non-issue. After all they had both gone to ground earlier in the year under pressure from Hull and Stimson. They could easily do it again. But the Zionists had a trump card up their sleeve. The country was in the middle of a presidential election campaign. Roosevelt had nominated for a record fourth term of office and although his supporters could claim that continuity of leadership was important in time of war there was strong opposition from those who said four terms was too long for any leader. The result could therefore be close and could be influenced by a single high-profile issue. [One such issue, the interception of Japanese pre-Pearl Harbour military and diplomatic traffic, had already been excluded by Marshall’s intervention.] If they could influence the appointment of a British Prime Minister surely they could influence the direct election of a President when there was no cabinet room lobbying and no decision by a king to be considered – only the public’s emotions.

The Republican candidate, Governor Dewey, had already spoken of a Jewish Commonwealth in Palestine. It did not take long to get a commitment from Roosevelt. On October 15 he wrote to Senator Wagner, the New York Senator who had sponsored the pro- Zionist resolution in the Senate, and personally endorsed the Democrat policy plank on Palestine. New York was a city with many Reform Synagogues as well as more than one thousand Orthodox Synagogues, but the letter was naturally given wide national publicity.^{379 380 381} It had considerable impact.

FOR EUROPE ... DIVISION

During their conference in Quebec in August Roosevelt and Churchill had discussed plans for second three-way meeting with Stalin. Roosevelt claimed he could not attend such a meeting until after the November election. Churchill, however, was not inclined to postpone, and after cabling Roosevelt with the message that the Red Army would not stand and wait that long, he proposed to Stalin that the two of them meet in Moscow as a preliminary to a meeting of the Big Three. Stalin accepted. Both leaders understood well what was at stake: for Russia, acknowledged control of those areas of eastern Europe and the Balkans liberated by the Red Army; for Britain, control of Greece and the Mediterranean. Each required the blessing of the other to assure their dominance and to avoid a standoff which could destroy the prospect of future cooperation between the Great Powers.

With British troops about to enter Greece, time was pressing. Germany's evacuation from Greece was not as prompt as the Allies expected and British forces did not land until October 4. Churchill arrived in Moscow on October 9 for discussions with Stalin. That evening, in the most cynical and blatant piece of power politicking of the war, an understanding was reached on the occupation and future government of the Greece and the Balkans. Churchill proposed a 'percentages' deal. Russia would have 90% say in Rumania and Bulgaria, responsibility would be split between Russia and the Western Allies in Yugoslavia and Hungary, and Britain would have 90% say in Greece.³⁸²

Stalin accepted, and with a slight tinkering with the figures giving the Soviets 75% control of Hungary, the deal was done. On the matter of Greece, despite his interest in securing the outcome, Stalin had little option but to agree. It was a virtual fait accompli. The British troops were already half way to Athens. The Germans began withdrawing from Athens on the 12th. On the 13th the British troops parachuted into the international airfield and on the 14th they occupied Athens in company with the members of the Papandreou government as the Germans completed their withdrawal. Nevertheless, as later events demonstrate, had Stalin chosen to support the local communists in any protracted confrontation with the British-backed government he could probably have caused it to topple. As it was, even without Soviet interference the British struggled to impose order for more than two years before relinquishing responsibility for Greece to the Americans. However, if the Allies expected Stalin to just smile and sit on his hands after giving up his interest in Greece they were mistaken. Poland was still to be considered and it was another matter altogether.

While the British troops in Greece were doing their bit for the Empire, the Polish Prime Minister-in-exile, Mikolajczyk, and a small party of his colleagues flew to Moscow at Stalin's invitation and after some urging by Churchill, to resolve the critical questions of Poland's boundaries and the future composition of its government. Stalin was prepared to accept Mikolajczyk as prime minister of a unified Poland provided the Communist Lublin Government had a majority of the seats in cabinet and the Poles accepted the Curzon line boundary. That would ensure a Poland 'friendly' to the Soviet Union and an adequate physical buffer between

Moscow and Central Europe. But although Mikolajczyk would accept the basis of the Russian compromise some of his colleagues would accept only a modified Curzon line with Poland controlling the Carpathian oil fields and the town of Lwow. The issue was left for further talks.^{383 384}

Nevertheless, Britain and the United States were left in little doubt about what kind of Polish Government Stalin would accept. Nor were they unwilling to back a compromise. Cabling Roosevelt on October 22, Churchill recounted a conversation with the Soviet leader over dinner at the Kremlin: "We put it very bluntly to Stalin that unless [Mikolajczyk] had 50/50 plus himself the western world would not be convinced that the transaction was bona fide and would not believe that an independent Polish government had been set up. Stalin at first replied that he would be content with 50/50 but rapidly corrected himself to a worse figure...Molotov seemed more comprehending. I do not think the composition of the government will prove an insuperable obstacle if all else is settled." Roosevelt responded, "When and if a solution is arrived at, I should like to be consulted as to the advisability of delaying its publication about two weeks. You will understand." Of course Churchill understood. Two weeks would take Roosevelt past the November Presidential election, and thus enable him to avoid a backlash at the ballot box from American Poles who were not at all favourable to the kind of compromise being cooked up without their knowledge.³⁸⁵ However, Mikolajczyk was unable to persuade his colleagues on the boundary issue, so no further agreement was reached. Faced with his failure he resigned as premier, leaving the field open to hard-line opponents of the Soviet Union.

MATTERS OF FAITH

In November the spotlight turned briefly onto religious affairs and the relationship between Church and State following the death of the Anglican Primate of England, Archbishop William Temple of Canterbury, and the need for the appointment of his successor. Much had been made of Hitler's efforts to subdue and control the churches in Germany and their compliance with his policies, and of course the Vatican concordat. But with Temple's death there was a clear indication given that the British Government also expected a compliant national church which would support the decisions of government. Bishop Bell of Chichester had previously been regarded as a strong contender for the post of Primate but when he was outspoken in the House of Lords in condemning the indiscriminate bombing of civilian areas and the destruction of cities such as Hamburg the reaction was strong. Any possibility of his appointment as Archbishop of Canterbury was ruled out.³⁸⁶ The rules had not changed. Bishops of the established church were to bless the king and the politicians and boost the morale of the troops and the public, but they were not to try to influence government policy. Ever since England's Reformation, which had been prompted by personal politics, the monarch has been supreme head of the Church of England with the nominal authority to appoint the Archbishop of Canterbury. In practice a recommendation is made by the Prime Minister after consulting the church hierarchy and considering the views of the House of Lords, in which all bishops may sit as ‘Lords Spiritual’. Thus in reality it is a simple political appointment and the monarch would be most unlikely to reject a ‘recommendation’ made by the Prime Minister. In the Enabling Act of 1919, passed in the aftermath of World War I, the Church Assembly gained the right to prepare legislation on ecclesiastical measures and to present them to Parliament. Such measures may be accepted or rejected, but not amended, and the grip which the politicians sought to keep on the church is illustrated by the fact that when a new Book of Common Prayer was prepared and submitted by the Church Assembly it was rejected by parliament twice, in 1927 and 1928. Subsequent measures, in 1965 and 1974, relaxed these controls and permitted the use of revised forms of worship.

A meeting of the Provisional Committee of the World Council of Churches, in which Temple was heavily involved, had been due to meet in London on November 5 and it went ahead under very difficult circumstances a few days later. Subsequently a special effort was made to step up the inter-church aid program, to plan for reconstruction and reorganization of the church across Europe and to sustain and boost interest in the ecumenical movement and the formation of the WCC within the churches of the United States and Canada. It was not only the Vatican and the Zionist movement which were out to tap the support and resources of the nation which, because of unfolding circumstances, was about to dominate post war affairs in every field.³⁸⁷ And for the time being they all looked forward to something like stability in US policy and affairs because they knew they could deal with the same administration and the same president. Roosevelt had been re-elected on November 7 with a majority of over three and a half million votes.

And in the USA, another of the key organizations in world Jewish affairs, the World Jewish Congress (WJC), met in emergency session in Atlantic City from November 26 to 30.³⁸⁸ Since the implementation of Hitler’s ‘final solution’ had begun the WJC had maintained steady pressure on the US Government to facilitate programs to rescue victims of Nazi policies in Europe. In 1943 Morgenthau had used his influence as Treasury Secretary to obtain State Department approval of a Congress plan to transfer private funds of US citizens to Europe for the rescue of French and Rumanian Jews. Then in January 1944 he accused the State Department of not only failing to use the machinery of government available to it for rescue work but of using other machinery to prevent the rescue of those the Congress sought to help. It was at his suggestion that Roosevelt then set up the War Refugee Board.

But the WJC was also concerned with the related issues of the rights of survivors and the heirs of victims – reparations – which had been on its agenda since 1941 when it was raised by its president, Dr Nahum Goldmann. Immediately following the WJC’s emergency meeting Dr Siegfried Moses, who later became Comptroller-General of Israel, established a Council for the Protection of the Rights and Interests of German Jews. The issue was so complex that it took years to resolve and directly involved the government of the State of Israel, the Jewish Agency, the Joint Distribution Board, the Jewish Claims Conference and the World Jewish Congress before four agreements, each forming part of the Luxembourg Treaty with West Germany, were signed in September 1952. But the issue also triggered crises within the Jewish community and in relations between the Jewish and Arab communities which erupted as negotiations with West Germany proceeded.³⁸⁹

It was not only the situation in Europe which had given the Zionist movement cause to hit the panic button in November 1944. The assassination of the British Minister to the Middle East, Lord Moyne, a personal friend of Churchill, in Cairo on November 6 had set back the cause of Zionism more than any other single factor. In general terms, it was very difficult for the British authorities to identify, locate and obtain evidence against any Jewish terrorists operating in or from Palestine, so very few had been brought to trial. But Churchill's support was so important – much more so than all the extortion murders, indiscriminate shooting of British police and sabotage attacks which had reached a new peak in the latter half of 1944 – that the two youthful members of the Lechi who committed the murder were denounced to the British, tried, convicted and hanged in only a matter of ten weeks. On November 17, eleven days after the assassination, in one of his very rare public references to his personal commitment to Zionism, Churchill told the Commons: "If our dreams for Zionism are to end in the smoke of an assassin's pistol and the labours for its future produce a new set of gangsters worthy of Nazi Germany, many, like myself, will have to reconsider the position we have maintained so consistently and so long in the past. "

Talks between the British Government and the Zionist Executive were suspended and Jewish Agency appeals for increased migration into Palestine were rebuffed. Weizmann, who had dined with Churchill only two days before the assassination, promised that Palestine Jewry would take stern action to root out the evil in its midst, and Ben-Gurion called for the Haganah to deny such gangsters shelter and assistance.^{390 391}

Such bitterness and such terror were symptomatic of the antagonism between the Zionist movement and the British authorities. Far from being the end of violence that incident was a mere curtain raiser for the main event which was to come. Even so, the British Labour Party seems to have been less affected by it than Churchill and the Zionist movement turned increasingly to it for support.

In December, 1944, the Labour Party's annual conference, gearing up for the 1945 elections, adopted The Attlee Plan for Arab re-settlement from Palestine to other Arab lands to enable Jews to become a majority in that country. Attlee and Churchill had been together with Weizmann on several occasions, notably when Churchill briefed Weizmann on the unpublished British plan for the partition of Palestine. In the wake of the Moyne assassination and the cooling in relations between Churchill and the World Zionist Movement, Attlee was clearly bidding for the Jewish vote. He was also eager to tap into the enormous support which Churchill had gained from his Forum connection. He told the conference that Arabs should be encouraged to move out of Palestine so that Jews could move in, that they should be "handsomely compensated" for it, and that as the Arabs had many wide territories they should not seek to exclude the Jews from the little territory of Palestine. The resolution adopted even noted that Britain "should examine the possibility" of extending the boundaries of Palestine in agreement with Egypt, Syria and Transjordan.³⁹² The Labour Party's new position was in such contrast to the Alexandria Protocol that increased conflict in Palestine was inevitable.

NO BOMB. NO CAUSE FOR CONCERN

While the WJC was meeting in Atlantic City, a special unit of the American intelligence services, Alsos, accompanied US forces when the city of Strasbourg was occupied and learned that Germany's scientists were not as advanced in nuclear technology as the Allies had feared. Their work was still at a theoretical assessment level and it would have been several years before Germany could have produced an atomic bomb. They had not even separated any pure uranium-235 and it was "inconceivable" that Germany could have had an atomic bomb at the point of completion anywhere.^{393 394}

Clearly the Germans were nearing defeat. It was only a matter of time. The likelihood that the joint US-British 'Tube Alloys' project would provide a bomb while it could still be used to eliminate Hitler and shorten the war was remote. The possibility of it being used for the purpose for which it was conceived was therefore remote indeed. Some of the scientists working on the project were already having second thoughts about whether it should continue.³⁹⁵ But the project had developed a momentum of its own and the politicians believed there was a lot at stake. What if the intelligence reports were wrong? They wanted a demonstration. And in any case there were the post war relationships to consider and the future of the Grand Alliance did not look good. Development work continued at a frenetic pace.

In Iran, where the Soviet Union was pressing the Iranian government for a political agreement on expanded oil concessions, cabinet's decision in September to postpone all discussions on oil until after the war had only intensified Soviet pressure. Following the Moscow conference between Churchill and Stalin the Moscow press had begun a sustained attack on the Iranian government, Soviet authorities in Iran held up grain shipments and interfered in elections, and the Tudeh, a Moscow backed workers party made up largely of leftists who had been jailed by Reza Shah and granted amnesty by his son, had exploited disaffection with the Iranian regime through organized demonstrations and attacks on the government, openly aided by the Red Army. By November they had succeed in ousting the Iranian Prime Minister. In response, the Iranian Parliament, the Majlis, chose a new PM, Morteza Bayat, and in December it passed a law forbidding oil negotiations between cabinets and foreigners and making oil concessions dependent on parliament.³⁹⁶

In Italy, where the Allies were still unable to break through to the Po Valley, great political instability led to the resignation of the government of Bonomi at the end of November. The Communists had agreed to accept the monarchy temporarily, and there was strong pressure for the establishment of a coalition government with Christian Democrats, Socialists and Communists.³⁹⁷ But the British Government chose to intervene and announced that it would not recognize any government in which Count Carlo Sforza was either prime minister or foreign secretary. An anti-Fascist diplomat and statesman, Sforza had been forced into exile during the Fascist era when he refused to serve under Benito Mussolini and resigned his appointment as ambassador to France. He lived abroad as lecturer and political commentator, in Belgium until 1939 and in the United States after 1940, until he returned to Italy in 1943 following the Allied occupation. The British government apparently believed that his appointment to the government indicated US intentions to ‘pilot’ Italy from the back seat and thus have direct input into European politics. This British intervention brought howls from the new US Secretary of State, Edward Stettinius, on December 5, 1944, that the composition of the Italian Government was a purely domestic matter which should not be influenced from outside.³⁹⁸ Given the nature of US intervention in China’s leadership appointments and its subsequent bizarre interference in elections around the world, that was another case of sheer hypocrisy. Its definition of a “domestic matter” is quite problematic.

Pius XII still strongly favoured the Fascist model with intimate links between the church and the ruling elite, and he was actively working against both the communist model and the Western democratic model. He objected strongly to the American-style free-enterprise democracy which extolled individualism and consumerism and brought with it a flood of American clothes, movies, pop music, beer, cigarettes, chewing gum, Coca Cola and Reader’s Digests (distributed with US government backing) in the wake of the flood of American occupation troops. Therefore, having been a party to the disbanding of the former Catholic Popular Party by Pius XI, and having engineered the demise of the German Centre Party himself, Pius XII now sponsored the rise of the Christian Democrats. It was not a confessional Catholic party but it was strongly supported by a loose coalition of Catholic Action, the clergy, the church’s religious communities and “the formidable constituency of voters who feared the Communists.” He saw this as a move towards “the best of all possible worlds:” the Spanish model of “a seamless Catholic-corporatist state ... (with leadership based on selection rather than election) ... a partnership between two sovereignties, the temporal and the spiritual, both Catholic and loyal to the Pontiff.” To encourage this ‘vision’, and either in spite of Franco’s readiness to impose his will on the church or in an effort to encourage him to soften his approach, Pius XII therefore honoured the Caudillo with the highest Vatican decoration, the Supreme Order of Christ. Franco responded. He sponsored parties of pilgrims who would cry out at public gatherings in St. Peter’s Square, “Spain for the Pope,” and Pius XII would call back, “And the Pope for Spain.”³⁹⁹

But the American concern was equally directed at the British intervention in Greece. Even though it had been carried out with US agreement and Soviet acquiescence, the Americans were eager to distance themselves from it after civil war broke out in Athens on December 3, 1944. Communist supporters had confronted police in a banned demonstration. When they refused to leave the city next day and attempted to seize the capital by force, Churchill took personal charge of the situation and ordered the British contingent to fire on the armed mobs. The situation deteriorated rapidly and, with estimates of Communist forces ranging from twelve to twenty two thousand, substantial British reinforcements were required.

ANOTHER CHANGE OF HEART

Thus, as the Fascist Movement collapsed around him and people turned more and more to the Italian Communist Party which was styled on the Moscow model, and the influence of Communist Parties in surrounding countries grew, Pius XII was forced to modify his stand. In his Christmas broadcast he “grudgingly and guardedly gave democracy his blessing.” To justify his shifting position he turned to Leo XIII who had been elected pope in 1878 at the height of the German Kulturkampf. (Chapter 15, pp. 23 ff.) Europe was then in political chaos; the Catholic Church was being pummeled heavily; Leo XIII was in a middle of a round of concordat writing, and he achieved a coup by signing one with Bismarck and deflecting the Chancellor’s wrath from the Catholic Church to the Jews. Then in 1888, in his bid for a few more, he made the statement which Pius XII now sought refuge behind, after having contradicted it directly in his own encyclicals of 1938 and 1939. Pius XII conceded that Leo XIII had said that the Catholic Church does not condemn “any of the various forms of government, provided they are in themselves adapted to secure the welfare of the citizens,” but he then he pointed out the dangers of democracy as “the mindless rule of the ‘masses’ ... (and that it was) ... unworkable without the auspices of the Catholic Church.” That qualifying comment camouflaged the contradictions which he had made in his various encyclicals and addresses and he went on to say “[The Church] communicates that supernatural strength of grace which is needed to implement the absolute order established by God, that order which is the ultimate foundation and guiding norm for every democracy.”⁴⁰⁰ With the church as the divinely appointed and exclusive interpreter and administrator of that absolute order established by God there was to be no provision for cultural, religious or political diversity or pluralism. Nor was there, in the pope’s Christmas address, any “exploration of social Catholicism and the need for complex webs of communities to enrich the space between the state and the individual.”⁴⁰¹

If Pius XII had not modified his overriding stand in favour of Fascism he would have been seriously out of step with the ideals of Christian-based democracy which were being espoused by leaders such as De Gasperi in Italy, Schuman in France, and Adenauer in Germany, and the aspirations of people across Europe. His tunnel vision can be summed up thus: democracy led either to the dubious values of the United States or to the “spectre of socialism” which he deemed to be a precursor of Communism, and the United States stood for “a dangerous relativism that entertained all manner of creeds, denominations, and affiliations including Protestantism and Freemasonry.” America’s unabashed materialism was a counterpart to the atheistic materialism of the Soviet Union but, pragmatically, in his view, “the choice between the two great power blocs was being for Communism or being against it.” He saw Italy as the front line of the East West divide with the imminent threat of a Communist takeover followed by “the martyrdom of the Catholic Church” and he therefore emphatically sided with the West as the lesser of two evils – a position which led to him being labelled the “Chaplain of the North Atlantic Alliance” with a very pragmatic alliance between the United States, the Italian

Christian Democrats and the Vatican to prevent “the Cossacks and Stalin camping in St. Peter’s Square.”⁴⁰²

The pope’s action was completely consistent with the historical pattern of conduct of the church in that as he sought to suppress one challenge he failed to see that he was aggravating another. The things which he objected to in American consumerism have subsequently become the trigger point for an era of bitter antagonism between the Third World and the Western World as a consequence of the globalization of the world economy. That process is widely viewed by ordinary people of the Third World – in contrast to the business elite who benefit from the process – as the export by the West of undesirable patterns of life. And the West is still similar to the amorphous Christian gel which was responsible for the abuses of the European colonial era, the major difference being that it is now dominated by the Judeo-Christian giant which used to call itself “The New Israel,” the United States. The antagonism takes on different patterns dependant upon where it is occurring, but it has very important components of both religion and politics. Because of the circumstances in which it has evolved it is now largely regarded, in the West, as “Islam against the West.” The reasons will become apparent as we progress through the post war years and observe the links between technical and social changes or ‘developments’, and it is sufficient to note at this point some of the earlier linkages and that both excessive consumerism and economic globalization have flourished within the framework of the Protestant Work Ethic which took root in nineteenth century America and was deliberately exploited during the twentieth. (See chapter 16.) The Protestant Work Ethic was intimately related to the excesses of unbridled Capitalism and, with those two factors together providing the driving and driven wheels of the colossal American steamroller, they were soon to power American expansionism in the wake of the Second World War.

But the things which Pius XII objected to and was prepared to accept as “the lesser of two evils” were already products of earlier decisions taken by the church on the basis of its self-understanding and challenges to those decisions and reactions against that self-understanding. They were also linked to the anti-church-establishment attitudes which spawned the First Amendment to the constitution of the United States and intimately linked to the American anti-Vatican environment which had made it necessary for Roosevelt to use subterfuge to get around Congressional opposition to the appointment of an ambassador to the Holy See. (See chapter 23, pp. 11 ff.) They were tied, in turn, to the origins of colonial settlement in North America and in particular the influence of two waves of settlers. The first wave was the papal standard bearers inspired by the a papal bull “Rominus Pontifex” in 1454. (See chapters 9 and 11.) The second was the rash of Protestant communities known as ‘The Pilgrim Fathers’ who were escaping in order to old-fashion the ‘New World’ to the perfect Biblical model, not with the aim of making history, but of fulfilling theology. They were escaping religious persecution in Europe to put their Christianity into practice. (See chapter 12.) So the things which Pius XII objected to were an intimate part of the amorphous Christian gel in exactly the same manner as anti-Semitism.

When he condemned Soviet Communism so trenchantly and gave his papal blessing to Capitalism in his twin encyclicals of 1937, Mit Brennender Sorge and Divini Redemptoris, (see chapter 20, p. 31) he did not appreciate that he was releasing yet another genie.

The pope asserted then that the Christian civilization or social order was the true civitas humana, that it was based on the natural law with divinely imposed obligations which were expounded in the age-old doctrines of the church concerning the individual and social character of private property which explain the right and dignity of labour, the relations of mutual aid and collaboration which should exist between those who possess capital and those who work. He noted: “The Communism of today, more emphatically than similar movements in the past, conceals in itself a false messianic idea. A pseudo-ideal of justice, of equality and fraternity in labour impregnates all its doctrine and activity with a deceptive mysticism, which communicates a zealous and contagious enthusiasm to the multitudes entrapped by delusive promises. This is especially true in an age like ours, when unusual misery has resulted from the unequal distribution of the goods of this world. This pseudo-ideal is even boastfully advanced as if it were responsible for a certain economic progress. As a matter of fact, *when such [economic] progress is at all real, its true causes are quite different, as for instance the intensification of industrialism in countries which were formally almost without it, the exploitation of immense natural resources, and the use of the most brutal methods to insure the achievement of gigantic projects with a minimum of expense.”*⁴⁰³ (Emphasis added)

Pius XII said he was talking about Communism. But never in the history of humanity has money – the dollar, whether gold or not – been elevated to the level of ‘worship’ and been credited with messianic capacities to the extent that is now the case. And never in the history of humanity has the abuse of the environment and people in the process of resource exploitation reached the levels ‘achieved’ under Western Capitalism. Pius XII thought he was talking about Communism. He was trying to suppress the theological challenge of Marxist Communism by attacking economic and social policies of the Soviet Union. His descriptions – the terms he used – were more appropriate to evolving Western Capitalism, but he was giving that his blessing. However while he had blessed Capitalism in 1937 he did not bless democracy. He wanted Capitalism within a framework of Fascism or other totalitarian regimes with which he could relate and with which he could enter into concordats to control civil society in an overall totalitarian environment.

After giving those descriptions of the woes of the world and claiming that the established Christian society has divine origins and is the ideal state, Pius XII made the barely compatible concession that Christian employers and industrialists “are saddled with the heavy heritage of an unjust economic regime whose ruinous influence has been felt through many generations” but proceeded to say that the poor “while engaged, according to the laws of charity and justice, in acquiring the necessities of life and also in bettering their condition, should always remain ‘poor in spirit’ and hold spiritual goods in higher esteem than earthly property and pleasures ... [remembering] that the world will never be able to rid itself of misery, sorrow and tribulation, which are the portion even of those who seem prosperous.” The poor should be patient, the pope said, because patience comforts the heart with the divine assurance of eternal happiness, and “the more the workingmen and the poor realise what the spirit of love animated by the virtue of Christ is doing for them, the more readily they will abandon the false persuasion that Christianity has lost its efficacy and that the Church stands on the side of the exploiters of their labour."⁴⁰⁴ The enemies of the church, he noted, "accuse her of having failed to act in conformity with her principles, and from this conclude to the necessity of seeking other solutions." But "the utter falseness and injustice of this accusation is shown by the whole history of Christianity ... (and) ... it was Christianity that first affirmed the real and universal brotherhood of all men of whatever race and condition ... (and) ... with an amplitude and conviction unknown to preceding centuries ... potently contributed to the abolition of slavery."⁴⁰⁵

The pope's recollection of history had again deserted him. The poor were condemned to a long wait. Instead of pausing as the parody of Mein Kampf approached its final scene to reflect on the challenges of both the parody and Marxist Atheism with its social policies and philosophy which were, in many respects, more attune to the teachings of the Gospel and human needs, he encouraged the socially destructive tendencies of a system which was cloaked in a mantle of Christianity. He rejected a middle course, encouragement of the welfare and economic philosophies of Socialism, because of a fear and an assumption that welfare socialism must automatically result in rejection of the church's teachings. His error in that sense was the same as that of his predecessors over a very long period: equating the teachings of the church – its doctrinal base and its dogma – to the Gospels and to the recognition and worship of God. He was rejecting, yet again, the challenge to rethink the complex web of doctrine and dogma which hung between humanity and God. His attitude towards Socialism was also consistent with his opposition to Ecumenism. Welfare Socialism was strongest in those streams of the church in which the humanitarian or social philosophy thrusts of the Gospel were strongest, such as in John Wesley's Methodism and a number of fragments of the church away from the mainstream. It was in these fragments that there was a deeply held commitment to the teachings on welfare and community responsibility which are the main thrust of the Mosaic Law of the Torah (the first five books of the Bible) and which are reflected in the Letter of James with his insistence that 'faith without action is dead' (James 2:18–20), and also in the community welfare teachings of the Qur'an. And it was these fragments which placed least emphasis on the concept of personal salvation, which rejected the notion that redemption was tied strictly to naming Jesus of Nazareth as Saviour and adherence to the sacraments, and which also presented the greatest challenge to papal authority and the self-understanding of the mainstream church. The whole episode was symptomatic of either failure to recognize or determination to reject the challenge of Mein Kampf, and failure to recognize the basis of the trouble in the triangle.

In any case the power brokers of the United States were indeed happy to have the support of the pope for their brand of Capitalism linked to democracy – as the Chaplain of the North Atlantic Alliance – even if his support was given so reluctantly and with such concern for the impact of their policies. They shared Churchill's enthusiasm for a new alliance. The United States very promptly applied intense pressure to Britain until Churchill and Eden visited Greece for several days from Christmas eve, arranged a truce between the warring factions to allow a conference to be held, and persuaded Archbishop Damaskinos to act as regent pending a plebiscite on the future of the monarchy. A new government took office on January 3, 1945, and an armistice was agreed on January 11. Churchill chose to represent the incident in terms of protecting the legal government and the monarchy but the world knew it was an exercise in suppressing Communism.

Following Mikolajczyk's visit to Moscow with Churchill and his resignation as premier of the London Polish Government-in-exile, the dispute between the London Poles and the Lublin Committee, which Stalin recognized, continued in parallel with the Communist uprising in Greece. With hard liners in control of the London Government, Stalin warned Roosevelt on December 27 (while Churchill and Eden were still in Athens) that if the Lublin Committee were to declare itself a provisional government in Poland it would be recognized by the Soviet Union. The declaration was made on January 1, and four days later, despite a plea from Roosevelt to postpone such a move, Stalin advised the president that Soviet recognition had been granted.

On January 12 the tug of war for control of Eastern Europe became an even more one sided affair when the Soviet army occupied Warsaw, and the scene was set for some straight talking when the Big Three met at Yalta on February 4.

In the meantime, in France, DeGaulle had started to patch up some of the cracks which divided his country by having talks with each of the Protestant, Catholic and Jewish leaders, separately, on January 1. In the Far East the Japanese had replaced the Vichy French puppet government in Indochina with a military administration after the governor-general swore allegiance to DeGaulle; and in the Middle East fallout from the signing of the Alexandria Protocol continued. The prime ministers of Syria and Jordan, both of whom had led their country's delegations to the conference, were dismissed because of dissatisfaction with the drafting which was said to make the proposed Arab League unworkable. Reaction in Lebanon was also mixed and criticism by the Christian Arab community was particularly severe. The Maronite Patriarch and the Falangists denounced the protocol as an attack on Lebanese sovereignty.⁴⁰⁶ But Ibn Saud gave his approval to the document and then issued a note urging that the League establish a joint military committee to defend Arab Palestine by force if necessary. In response, on January 9, Stettinius advised Roosevelt that it was significant that Ibn Saud should "regard himself as a champion of the Arabs of Palestine and would himself feel it an honour to die for their cause."⁴⁰⁷

Next day Roosevelt 'withdrew' the Anglo-American oil agreement which had been signed on August 8 1944 to have it redrafted in the face of strong objections from the American oil industry. The revised version was ready late in February but after months of delay the Petroleum Administrator, Ickes, announced that it would be the subject of further talks with Britain.⁴⁰⁸

Then Roosevelt received some very blunt advice from James Landis, the Director of Economic Operations in the Middle East. Landis warned that any proposals in relation to Palestine must be far reaching and get to the root of the matter. “[The government’s] approach to the problem must start from the insistence that the objective of the Jewish commonwealth or the Jewish State as distinguished from the Jewish national home must be given up. The political objective implicit in the Jewish state idea will never be accepted by the Arab nations and is not consistent with the principles of the Atlantic Charter, nor is the Jewish state idea demanded by the mandate.”⁴⁰⁹

Landis proposed that immigration should be related to the economic absorptive capacity of Palestine which, he said, had been “grossly exaggerated” rather than to the political issue of the Jewish minority or majority. This would give some hope of “striking an acceptable compromise” with the Arabs.

On January 15, with the area under his control shrinking by the hour, Hitler returned to Berlin and his Chancellery bunker. On January 17 an order was given for an end to the mass gassing of Jews at Auschwitz, the evacuation of the camp and the destruction of all evidence of what had taken place there. The curtain had risen on the final act of the parody of Mein Kampf. Next day the mass evacuation began of about 60,000 persons from Auschwitz and other concentration and death camps in the east. The evacuees included Jews, Poles, forced labourers from all across Europe and prisoners of war. Thousands did not survive the forced march west towards Silesia. The demolition of gas chambers, crematoria and ‘treasure stores’ began almost immediately. And as three million Russian troops poured through breaches in the German eastern front following the massive assault launched on January 12, more than two million Germans, struggling to keep in front of the Russia advance, became the newest class of Europe’s refugees.⁴¹⁰

On the 25th Hitler’s Chief of the General Staff, Guderian, urged Ribbentrop to seek an immediate armistice with the West so that what was left of the German armies could be thrown against the Russians to prevent them from swamping Germany. He got a dressing down from Hitler for his trouble.⁴¹¹

Two days later Russian forces captured what was left of Auschwitz. Blasting had been carried out even that day, but there was still ample evidence in the stores which had not been destroyed of the scale of the crime perpetrated.⁴¹² That night, in a response to the Allies bickering over the British action against the Communists in Greece which can only be described as a flight of fancy, Hitler, Goering and Jodl seriously discussed Guderian’s armistice proposal. They thought that the British and Americans so feared a Bolshevik takeover that they might call a halt to the battles on the western front and join Germany in driving off the Soviet troops in the east.⁴¹³

On January 30 Hitler broadcast to the nation. It was a pitiful performance but he was consistent. He had not relented and he maintained his attack on international Jewry and Asiatic Bolshevism to the last. He called for a final desperate sacrifice to overcome the calamity, saying that despite everything the crisis would be mastered by “our unalterable will.” The nation which had represented Europe against the East for one thousand five hundred years, “our Greater German Reich” would continue to do so, he said.⁴¹⁴

YALTA: TO PLAN, OR TO SCHEME?

By that time Churchill and Roosevelt were together at Malta, trying to patch over their differences before they went to Yalta for conferences with Stalin from February 4 to 11, 1945. In the buildup to the Yalta Conference tensions between the Western Allies had risen further over Britain’s intervention in each of Yugoslavia, Greece and Italy. The reasons were several. In the first instance, with an administration in the United States which for the most part did not see Russian Communism in the same dangerous role as did the extremists of the McCarthy era a few years later, there were some American politicians who believed that Churchill was intent on re-establishing out-moded monarchies wherever possible and that a return to regimes of imperial colonialism would have worse consequences, world wide, than Communist rule. Having succeeded in ending several European monarchies after World War I those people were determined that they would now bring down a few more, and in an effort to make Britain change course they took full advantage of public concern in Britain, Europe, the United States and elsewhere that British troops were being used to put down Communist troops who had been fighting alongside them against Hitler until only a few weeks before.

An equally important source of tension, however, was the fear that British behaviour was setting a bad precedent for the Russians. In Russia itself, British intervention was seen at one level as the direct outcome of the percentages agreement which Churchill had discussed with Stalin in October. At another level, though, it was seen as a timely reminder that hostility to communism was as deeply entrenched as it had always been, and a deliberate message that the influence of Communism was not to be allowed to spread any further. Britain was therefore providing all the encouragement the Soviets may have needed or wanted to firmly tighten control of their own sphere of influence in Eastern Europe. And that, of course, did not suit the United States, since it further contradicted public claims that the peace would be based on the Atlantic Charter, and it would therefore threaten public support for the administration’s plans for post-war cooperation.

The American public certainly had genuine cause for concern. In Rumania, following the Red Army’s arrival in August 1944, a new coalition government had been established after King Michael had overthrown the pro-German regime and an armistice had been signed with the Russians. Initially a tiny minority, by October the Communists were in a position to challenge the political power of the anti-Russian Peasant and Liberal parties. United with other leftists parties as the Nationalist Democratic Front, and supported by the Soviets through the Soviet-dominated Allied Control Commission, which oversaw the terms of the armistice, they accused their opponents of reaction and fascism and successfully obtained some reorganization of the coalition government.⁴¹⁵ Further reorganizations quickly followed, with the appointment in December of the government of an anti-Semite reactionary, General Nicolae Radescu, which immediately came under intense pressure from the left. By January, with clashes intensifying and peasants in some areas ‘spontaneously’ redistributing land under Communist party direction, there was a risk of civil war.

A similar situation had developed in Bulgaria where, days after it declared war on Germany in September 1944, the communist-led anti-fascist ‘Fatherland Front’ had installed itself in government and had welcomed the advancing Red Army. Finding no resistance in a political vacuum, the Bulgarian Communist party rapidly expanded from 15,000 members at the time of the ‘September Revolution’ to the point where in January it could claim 200,000.⁴¹⁶ By then its supporters and others of the Fatherland Front had come into conflict with those of the former pro-fascist regime and its remnants, and while roving communist militants scoured the countryside savagely settling scores with pro-fascists, special courts instituted by the Communist-controlled Ministry of the Interior proceeded to effect an extensive purge.⁴¹⁷

POLAND: STILL THE BUFFER

However, it was the Soviet’s use of the same police-state methods in Poland which was politically most explosive. In the lead-up to Stalin’s recognition of the Lublin Committee as the provisional government of Poland, the Soviet security police, the notorious NKVD, had ruthlessly suppressed independent resistance groups, including those that had helped the Soviet advance. Then, while the Lublin Communists called publicly for a united democratic front, the NKVD provoked dissent by killing, arresting and deporting people and denouncing them as “terrorist bandits’ and “pro-fascist rebels’. By early 1945 the situation had virtually become an undeclared civil war.⁴¹⁸

Concern on the part of the United States government was therefore considerable. The continuation of such policies not only threatened to destroy support for Roosevelt’s policy of cooperation with the Soviets, it also threatened the prospect of US participation in the new world peace organization. However, the Soviets could hardly be expected to moderate their behaviour if the British did not do so as well. Publicly, therefore, Britain was subject to intense pressure, even if in his personal telegrams to Churchill Roosevelt studiously refrained from outright criticism of British actions.

Indeed, there was certainly growing concern among many people that Churchill’s belligerent anti-Communist attitude would result in an immediate World War III with Western guns simply turned towards Moscow instead of Berlin. Nevertheless, for all their anti-British posturing American leaders were mistaken about the most fundamental source of uncertainty in great power relations. They were simply incapable of seeing that it was their want to sit astride the world economic and political dung hill, and the resulting secrecy which they had imposed on atomic research and development, which had become just as important as Churchill’s anti-Communism of 1944 and 1945. In fact it was central to the crisis in international relationships. Development of the bomb was never discussed at meetings of the Big Three and Roosevelt assumed that Stalin knew nothing of it. In fact Stalin was well briefed on both the stage of development and the efforts which the United States had taken to prevent any information flow to Russia. However it was to be another year before the extent and the effectiveness of information flow from scientists working on 'Tube Alloys' to Russia was discovered by the Americans. That discovery was so embarrassing for the US that its gross over reaction caused shock waves which totally undermined relations between East and West and brought the world perilously close to another world war on several occasions.

Karl Marx' philosophical and economic challenge to the Christian Western World's self-understanding had been muted somewhat by the cooperation between opposing ideologies which the additional challenge of Hitler's parody had made necessary. But now, as the Second World War moved into its closing phase, it was being further aggravated and elevated to the level of a major world crisis. Britain's attitude was being fuelled by fear and that of the United States by greed, but Russia would soon be accused of single handedly causing the problem.

So the Big Three sat down to talk, with the Polish question assuming centre stage. It was discussed at seven of the eight plenary sessions during the Yalta Conference and even then none of them were really satisfied with the agreement reached. It was, in Churchill's words, the most urgent reason for that Conference and it was to prove "the first of the great causes which led to the breakdown of the Grand Alliance."⁴¹⁹

For Churchill, the restoration of an independent Polish State was a "matter of honour" and because Britain had hosted the government-in-exile right through the war it would be a matter of "betrayal" if it transferred recognition to another government at that stage. His support for Stalin's boundary proposals was part of his effort to ensure the continuation of Poland as a free, independent and sovereign nation and he told the other leaders that that achievement was much more important than particular territorial boundaries. With a politician's short memory for facts he said that Great Britain had no material interest of any kind in Poland and "honour was the sole reason why we had drawn the sword to help Poland against Hitler's brutal onslaught." He omitted to say that because of the conspiracy of silence that was what the public had been told and that was what they had believed. And he also omitted to say that the primary factors were the threat to Britain's grasp on its empire and the pressure it was under from the Zionist lobby, of which he personally had been an important part. Instead he said that going to war on Poland's behalf, so ill-armed, "nearly cost us our life, not only as an empire but as a nation." And perhaps he had the Vatican in mind when he added: "Poland must be mistress in her own house and captain of her own soul. Such freedom must not cover any hostile design by Poland or by any Polish group, possibly in intrigue with Germany, against Russia; but the World Organization that [is] being set up [will] surely never tolerate such action or leave Soviet Russia to deal with it alone."⁴²⁰

Roosevelt's agenda was to avoid an outright Communist take-over of Poland, but he didn't express it in those terms. He stressed the need for the norms of representative government: for a government of national unity drawn from the five main political parties and all regions. He opposed recognition of the 'Lublin Government' because it represented "only a small section of Poland and of the Polish nation” And he was eager that if the Curzon line was adopted as the eastern boundary, the Soviet Government “would grant some concession” such as the Lwow oil fields staying in (a capitalist) Poland to counterbalance the loss of Konigsberg.⁴²¹

Stalin said his concerns related to both honour and security. Honour: because Russia had had many conflicts with Poland over a long period and it wished to eliminate the causes of such conflict. Security: because throughout history Poland had been the corridor through which Russia’s enemies had moved to attack her, because it was relatively weak, including Germany twice in thirty years. Confirming Poland’s role as a buffer, he said Russia wanted a strong, independent but friendly Poland which could shut the door itself. It was a matter of life or death for Russia, but the Soviet Government was not adopting a Czarist policy of suppression and assimilation to control the buffer. He was happy with an independent Polish government as long as it was not antagonistic to Russia. And it was not him but the London Poles who had made any discussion on a new Polish government pointless.⁴²²

What Stalin did not say was that for a host of reasons the Soviet Union could only conclude that it needed that buffer as much as it ever had. To begin with there was the possibility that the Western powers would rebuild a capitalist Germany which would naturally ally itself with the West in any dispute between the Big Three. There was also the immensely weakened state of the Soviet Union due to the enormous losses suffered as a consequence of the war. There was the fact that the new world organization of which Churchill had spoken so kindly would be dominated by countries allied to the Western powers, and there was the decided lack of friendliness being shown by the British in their virulent anti-Communist interventions which also had to be taken into consideration. And there was the fact that the United States was holding the atomic bomb behind its back and assuming the role of ‘the enforcer’ for Capitalism.

WHAT OF GERMANY?

Other issues canvassed during the conference discussions further illustrated the double talk and conflicts of interest for Britain and the United States. The Western Allies had previously proposed that Germany would be partitioned into zones which could develop into self-contained states. This, according to the reasoning of the time, would avoid reunification and the development of another German threat. The Soviets had agreed unenthusiastically. But the number of zones and responsibility for providing the army of occupation, and the method of government had not been settled. In any case, each of the three great powers would provide an army of occupation until stability had been achieved. But when Roosevelt at Yalta advised that the United States was only prepared to garrison troops in Europe for two years, Churchill advised that Britain could not increase its commitment to fill the consequent shortfall. This meant, he said, that France would have to contribute an army of occupation as well as establishing and maintaining an army for its own defence and that was likely to cause it severe strain. Then the truth of Britain’s position came out. Russia was not the only country that wanted a friendly power controlling a vital buffer zone, (Poland in its case), between it and Germany. Britain did, too, and its buffer zone was France. A strong France was vital not only to Europe but to Great Britain, Churchill said. She alone could deny the rocket sites on her Channel coast and build up an army to contain the Germans. To give France a zone of occupation was by no means the end of the matter, he said. Germany would surely rise again and while the Americans could go home (and be out of retaliation range) the French had to live next door to her.⁴²³

Britain certainly didn't want either an antagonistic power or one which was weak and easily over-run between her and Germany. Why, then, should Russia have to contemplate the prospect? Moreover, as Stalin pointed out, why should the Western Allies insist on an elected and representative government for Poland when the government of France which the West recognized could make no better claim? All of this manoeuvring merely illustrated the fact that the Allies' attempts to apply moral principles to Soviet behaviour in Eastern Europe were fatally flawed by their own compromised and self-interested standards. Quite simply, they wanted to eat their cake and have it too.

Nevertheless, Stalin was not above double talk when it suited his own purposes. Despite his earlier reluctance to endorse the permanent break-up of Germany it was now he who insisted that the Allies reach a formal commitment to dismemberment. His argument was simple: What if, he asked, a group within Germany overthrew Hitler and accepted the terms of unconditional surrender? Were the Allies prepared to treat with such a group as they had done in Italy? If so, should not dismemberment form a part of the surrender terms?

Churchill was strongly opposed, while Roosevelt agreed. Eventually it was agreed in principle to dismember Germany with the question of the number of states Germany was to be divided into left open, (thus leaving Churchill an escape clause); to include in the formal surrender terms a qualified statement advocating dismemberment "to the extent necessary to safeguard peace and security"; and to refer the question of implementation to another body for further study.

Stalin's motives were simple, and demonstrate how far his allies were from earning his trust. Firstly, by insisting on a decision he was able to test the waters on British and American attitudes to rebuilding Germany. Secondly, by including dismemberment in the terms of surrender he ensured that the Western Powers, either alone or together, would find it impossible to do a last minute deal with a German group which might result in an alliance of all against the Soviet Union. By March, little more than a month after Yalta, Soviet support for dismemberment had in fact been repudiated.⁴²⁴

REPARATIONS, OF COURSE

At Yalta the Big Three were also forced to contend with some key issues left in the 'too hard basket' from their previous meeting. Unfortunately the discussions did not always provide satisfactory solutions. One case was the payment of reparations by Germany. Another was the United Nations procedure for voting and the power of veto.

The debate on payment of reparations centred on a plan presented by Russia which demanded a total of $20 billion dollars in goods and heavy capital equipment to be removed over a ten year period. Reparations would be shared among the victors according to the size of their contribution to the victory and the losses they had sustained. On that basis Russia was to get $10 billion; Britain and the United States would share $8 billion; and the rest would be divided among other countries. Roosevelt, who had still not decided between the State Department's plans for Germany's reconstruction and Morgenthau's plan for repression, was sympathetic. The Russian proposal fell somewhere between. Though he renounced any interest on the part of the United States in receiving reparations, he expressed his willingness to use the Soviet figures as the basis for further discussions. The Germans, he stated, should keep enough to prevent them starving, but they certainly should not be left with living standards higher than the Russians.

Churchill expressed resolute opposition, arguing that the sums being demanded were unrealistic. Experience after World War I had demonstrated that reparations didn't work. Moreover, Germany must be left with enough export earnings to pay for imports of food. Though he acknowledged that Russia had faced the greatest losses in the war, Britain faced the most desperate financial and economic consequences and simply could not afford to pay to feed the Germans in her zone of occupation. And since Britain had no interest in reparations from Germany, Russia, Churchill insinuated, should follow Britain's example.

In response the Russians pointed out that Churchill's analogy with World War I was irrelevant, since they were demanding reparations in the form of goods not money. Moreover the very fact that Germany's former enemies had invested heavily in her economy after World War I had encouraged her to default. And, they argued, the sums were reasonable: Germany had formerly spent $6 billion a year on military expenditure, while their plan would only cost $2 billion a year. Under Russia's plan Germany would have every chance to build a post-war economy based on the expansion of light industry and agriculture.

That last point drew attention to a key intention of the Russian plan – the removal of 80% of Germany's heavy industry would completely eliminate the possibility that Germany would rearm as she had after World War I. Churchill quite understood. He also understood that with the US intending to withdraw its troops from Europe within two years, there would be no significant military power on the continent which could confront the Soviet Union. So in addition to protecting Britain's financial position, he also wanted to prevent the weakening of Germany to Russia's advantage. The British therefore refused to agree to the fixing of a figure, and insisted that any agreement acknowledge that reparations be limited by Germany's ability to pay for her imports.⁴²⁵

Eventually it was agreed that a commission of the Grand Alliance would be appointed to sit in Moscow to determine the nature and level of reparations. The conference communiqué recorded that Russia and the United States agreed to the figure of $20 billion in reparations as a "basis for discussions" It recorded that Britain did not.

THE UN: A QUESTION OF CONTROL

Discussion on the United Nations centred on an American proposal for a system of voting and vetoes for the Security Council. Stalin, having been on the receiving end of changing alliances so often – Britain and the US after World War I, and Germany in World War II – was much more alert to the possibility of future problems between the Great Powers than either Churchill or Roosevelt and this fuelled his concern for a fail-safe voting system which would prevent any combination of powers ganging up on one other and using the punitive powers of the Security Council against it. The possibility that Germany might rise again was not the problem, he said. It was the possibility of conflict within the big three and everything should be done to safeguard against that. He did not let on that he knew about the atomic bomb. Why should he? The US and Britain were not being completely honest or open with him. He also refrained from mentioning the fact that under existing membership proposals the West was guaranteed a decisive majority in the General Assembly through the support of its allies and dominions. Instead he reminded his colleagues that Britain and France had used their powers in the League of Nations to expel Russia when a simple territorial dispute led to the Russo-Finnish War. And he suggested, with somewhat less justification, that there were marked similarities between the structures of the British Empire and the Soviet Union. The biggest difference was that Britain's dominions and colonies were scattered while the member republics of the Soviet Union were clustered within continental limits. He therefore demanded that the Soviet Republics be included as members in their own right.⁴²⁶

After receiving assurances from both Churchill and the Americans that the power of veto would extend to all matters affecting the enforcement of punitive measures, including expulsion, Stalin pronounced himself satisfied. So the Big Three agreed to the American plans and also to a scheme to determine founding membership of the United Nations. Any country which had declared war on one or more of the Axis Powers before March 1 1945 would be eligible to become a founding member, together with any country which had already signed the proposed articles of association. No one seemed to care about the paradox that in order to be eligible to join a peacemaking body a country first had to declare war on a country when it presumably had no reason to do so. So much for the aspirations of any country which chose to live by pacifism. It was also agreed that two Soviet Republics, Byelorussia and Ukraine, would be permitted to join in their own right.⁴²⁷

However, Soviet agreement to the American proposals, of crucial importance to the United States, came at a price. That price was agreement on Poland, the running sore of the conference. Despite repeated assurances from Britain and the United States that they wanted to see a Poland friendly to the Soviet Union, the Soviets refused to budge on their demand that the Warsaw government be immediately recognized. The Western Allies in return insisted that a new government be formed in Poland to include other Polish leaders both from within Poland and from the London Government-in-exile. Now, having accepted the American position on the UN, new Soviet compromise proposals were put on the table. After much tough bargaining over the detail, and the realization by Churchill and Roosevelt that the Soviets were not going to give any further ground, the Soviet proposal formed the basis of an eventual agreement

The agreement provided that there would be a Provisional Government of National Unity based on the existing Warsaw Government but with additional members drawn from within Poland and from among Poles abroad, (to accommodate the London government-in-exile. A Commission of three was named to appoint the provisional government. That government would then arrange elections on the basis of universal suffrage and secret ballot as early as possible, with any group except the Nazis free to stand. The governments of Britain, the US and the Soviet Union would each recognize the elected government. A modified Curzon line would form the country's eastern border and the western border would be determined by the eventual peace conference.

It was hardly the deal the Western Allies had hoped for. Russian compromises on the Curzon line were essentially cosmetic, but cosmetic concessions were better than none at all since that would at least give Churchill and Roosevelt something to sell to their domestic critics. More importantly, there was no guarantee on the number of non-Warsaw Poles to be included in the interim government. In accepting that aspect of the agreement, both Roosevelt and Churchill had placed a great deal of emphasis on Stalin's assurances that elections could be held within a month. However, since no timetable was specified for elections, and Russia could use any number of excuses to postpone them, the Western powers were on very shaky ground. Indeed, as Admiral William Leahy, Roosevelt's chief military aid, noted at the time, the entire agreement was 'so elastic that the Russians [could] stretch it all the way from Yalta to Washington without technically breaking it' ⁴²⁸ Roosevelt's reply is highly instructive: "I know, Bill, I know. But it's the best I can do for Poland at this time."

That recognition of the power realities was further reflected in a more general agreement proposed by Roosevelt which was ostensibly aimed at securing representative governments for post-war Europe as a whole, but which was intended mainly to shore Western demands on Poland as well as help secure Soviet cooperation in Eastern Europe in general. Put forward near the end of the conference, the Declaration on Liberated Europe was a vaguely worded document which Roosevelt had taken from a much more expansive State Department plan for a tripartite Commission to direct the formation of new governments in all liberated European nations. It affirmed the principles of the Atlantic Charter and called in part for the formation of interim governmental authorities broadly representative of all democratic elements in the population and 'pledged to the earliest possible establishment through free elections of governments responsive to the will of the people'. ⁴²⁹ Immediately Churchill again made a point of exempting the Empire from the jurisdiction of the Atlantic Charter. That pleased Stalin, who was eager to secure some qualifications of his own. He proposed a statement be included pledging support to political leaders who had taken "an active part in the struggle against the German invaders" That, of course, meant support for communists, and was opposed by Eden and Stettinius on the grounds that it constituted interference in the internal political affairs of liberated countries – obviously the suppression of communists didn't count. In response, Molotov proposed instead that references to the establishment of machinery for implementing the declaration be replaced with a reference to ‘mutual consultations’. Britain and the United States readily agreed.⁴³⁰ It was all but official: Eastern Europe was to be a Soviet sphere. Britain and the United States had dealt themselves out.

PACIFIC CARVE-UP

With Europe out of the way, the Big Three then turned their attention to the war in the Pacific. Or two of them did, anyway. Showing the same blatant disdain for Britain’s Imperial interests as he had from the moment of its declaration of war against Germany, Roosevelt sought confidential discussions with Stalin on a declaration of war against Japan. He, the President of the United States, quite deliberately excluded Churchill and then expected that Churchill, the Prime Minister of Great Britain, would be a confirming signatory to an agreement on highly sensitive and contentious matters which he had reached with Stalin.⁴³¹

The secret US-Soviet agreement (it is better called that than an accord of the Big Three even though it opens with the words “The leaders of the three Great Powers – the Soviet Union, the United States of America and Great Britain – have agreed that ...”) provided for the Soviet Union to enter the war against Japan on the side of the Allies within two to three months of the surrender of Germany and the end of hostilities in Europe. But there were a string of conditions concerning Soviet acquisition of, or ‘rights’ in, territories which were at that time variously independent, subject to either Chinese or Japanese sovereignty, or disputed, which the heads of the three Great Powers agreed “shall be unquestionably fulfilled after Japan has been defeated.”

Japan was to forfeit the Kurile Islands, Southern Sakhalin and the adjacent islands to the Soviet Union. Manchuria was to be recognized as part of China but the Southern Manchurian Railroad and the Chinese-Eastern Railroad were to be jointly operated through the establishment of a jointly owned Soviet-Chinese company; the port of Dairen was to be internationalized and used jointly by China and Russia as a merchant port; and the lease of Port Arthur to the Soviet Union for a naval base was to be restored.

In addition the ‘status quo’ was to be maintained in Outer Mongolia, otherwise known as the Mongolian People’s Republic. This secured recognition of a complicated three-way arrangement under which Outer Mongolia claimed the status of an independent republic, (prompted by the Soviet Union in the 1920s), while still being an integral part of China, with Russia retaining diplomatic and commercial privileges.⁴³²

In devising that agreement with Stalin in the way that he did, Roosevelt belittled Churchill, the elder statesman of the Alliance, both personally and as head of the British Government. He confirmed for Stalin (if confirmation was necessary) that the United States intended to be the determining player in world affairs. He made a mockery of his protestations about self-determination for all peoples and recognition of national rights and independence, aping the negotiators of the Munich Agreement by giving away other people and their territory to suit his neo-imperial ends. And he eloquently gave substance to Stalin’s concerns about future relationships between the Great Powers as permanent members of the Security Council. However the implications of the agreement do not stop there.

The Big Three had agreed to a process of diplomatic consultation followed by the first conference of the United Nations, known as the United Nations Conference on International Organization, which was set to begin in San Francisco on April 25 1945. It was expected that the charter of the new organization would be finalized and adopted by that conference and that the United Nations Organization, both the Assembly and the Security Council, would be established and operational within a few months. The principal functions of the Security Council were to include negotiation of peace settlements and the establishment of mechanisms and military forces necessary to secure peace within the agreed settlements.

At the time of the Teheran Conference in December 1943 the US military chiefs had expected that, barring exceptional circumstances, the war in the Pacific would continue for about eighteen months after the surrender of Germany. That estimate was still current.⁴³³⁴³⁴⁴³⁵ In the circumstances it would have therefore been reasonable that the terms of any peace settlement between the Allies and Japan would have been left to the Security Council or, at least for the Security Council to have been involved. But Roosevelt chose to go his own way. He was determined to draw the Soviet Union into the war against Japan in exactly the same way that Churchill had been determined to bring the United States into the war against Germany. Naturally he wanted a quicker end to the war to minimize the trauma for Americans. But in doing so he wanted to strengthen the relationship between the US and Soviet Russia. And he could do this at Britain's expense by ensuring that Britain and the other European powers had a minimal role in the victory and, as a consequence, the minimal chances to re-establish their colonial positions in Asia.

In addition, by trading concessions at China's expense Roosevelt expected to cement Stalin's support for Chiang Kai-shek and the Chinese Nationalists. He was highly conscious that the alliance between the Kuomintang and the Chinese Communists was a matter of convenience in the struggle against Japan, that they fought between each other almost as much as they fought the Japanese, and that if support from Russia started to flow heavily into Mao Tse-tung's camp the consequences could be dramatic. It was fortunate for Roosevelt that Chiang also appreciated that fact, since Japan had the upper hand in the military war in China, but not in the diplomatic war. Being surrounded and effectively blockaded by the United States, it was only holding its military position at the cost of heavy losses and defeats in other theatres. It had sought to open peace talks with Chiang Kai-shek with the aim that the Kuomintang of Nationalist China and Japan would form an anti-Communist front in an alliance that would eliminate the Chinese Communist Army and then provide the basis of Japan's new order in Greater East Asia. But Chiang Kai-shek had received more aid from Stalin for the war against Japan than had Mao Tse-tung, with assurances of continued support from the Soviets plus more help to come from the US, as well as an influential role in world affairs, if he stayed on the right side of the barricades and didn't surrender or make a separate peace.

Nevertheless, as was to be expected, Chiang Kai-shek was not happy with the deal. It was struck behind his back and it was quite contrary to the agreement which Roosevelt had made with him at Cairo in 1943. However he liked the idea of his consolation prize: a permanent seat on the Security Council with the power of veto in world affairs and a very strong position from which to negotiate with Britain over the return of Hong Kong. Anthony Eden was also unhappy. He urged Churchill not to sign.⁴³⁶ But because of Britain's dependence on the United States for the defeat of Hitler, Churchill feared that if he did not cooperate with Roosevelt on this issue the Americans may insist on even tougher decolonization measures than they had foreshadowed for other regions of Asia. Roosevelt was therefore again able to dictate terms to – or to blackmail – both Britain and China and to use as a bargaining chip a prize which was not rightly his to offer: a seat on the Security Council. But then none of the people or the territories which he was bartering in return for an even greater position of power were his, or America's, to give away anyway. In spite of all its high sounding declarations, doctrines and constitutional amendments over the years, Europe's favoured child was out-performing its parents in a demonstration of power grabbing, economic imperialism and sheer national greed in the worst tradition of the Berlin Conferences of the 1880s, the Balfour Declaration, the Treaty of Versailles and the Munich Agreement.

To prevent a pre-emptive strike by Japan, the deal had to be kept secret at least until the Soviet Union was ready to declare war against her and this meant almost certainly until after the establishment of the United Nations and acceptance of the American proposals for membership of the Security Council. Even though Chiang Kai-shek was given an understanding of the general thrust of the agreement he was not told of the details officially until June 15. That was a month after the war in Europe had ended. The membership of the Security Council was cut and dried and it was only ten days before the charter of the United Nations was formally adopted. The people of Manchuria, Mongolia and the territories which were to change hands were not going to be consulted, even though they, like most countries which became entangled in the war, were victims of the great powers' power struggles.

Roosevelt had to push the agreement through regardless of whether the absent fifth member of the proposed Security Council, France, or any other members of the United Nations were happy or not. Churchill was in no position to object and Stalin was very happy indeed. He got everything he wanted for Russia in Asia and the Pacific without really having to fight for it and without justifying his claims to either the people concerned or the world community. It was hardly the most promising basis on which to establish the new world body.

In his speech to Congress about the Yalta conference on his return to the United States Roosevelt pronounced it all a resounding success. Echoing Hull's words after the Moscow Foreign Minister's Conference of October 1943, he stated that post war cooperation among the Allies was assured, and that the agreements that had been made represented the end of "unilateral action, the exclusive alliances, the spheres of influence, the balance of power, and all the other expedients that have been tried for centuries – and have always failed."⁴³⁷

It was all self-deluding and dishonest tommyrot. As historian Richard Kuniholm has put it: “[Roosevelt] conveniently forgot that expediency on the Polish question allowed him to make the statement in the first place; that unilateral action had been taken at Yalta, particularly in regard to China; that spheres of influence still existed in the Balkans; and that in the Near East [Iran] the question of the balance of power had not ended – it was only dormant, and only because discussion of the issues involved had been avoided or obscured.”⁴³⁸

TALKING PALESTINE, OIL – AND JEWS

From Yalta both Roosevelt and Churchill went to the Middle East, essentially to talk oil and Palestine, or Palestine and oil. Roosevelt went first – he insisted on it – and Churchill was left to cool his heels in the Crimea and Greece for a few days. Roosevelt had discussions with Farouk, Haile Selassie and Ibn Saud; Churchill with Ibn Saud, Farouk and the President of Syria.

Immediately before the Yalta Conference the Zionist Movement had besieged the State Department and the White House with its heaviest barrage, to that time, of demands for increased immigration certificates for Palestine. Under Britain’s White paper they were due to be withdrawn in four months and after that immigration would be subject to the approval of Arab authorities. The Zionists feared that Roosevelt would succumb to pressure from the pro-Arab State Department and renege on his undertakings to Rabbis Wise and Silver. At their meeting on February 14, 1945, Ibn Saud naturally gave him every reason to do so, emphasizing that continued Jewish migration and land purchase constituted a grave threat to the Arab community. In response the President assured the King that he would do nothing to assist the Jews against the Arabs and would make no move hostile to the Arab people, and the two leaders agreed that homeless Jewish survivors of Hitler’s terror might well be resettled in the lands from which they had been driven.⁴³⁹

When his turn came for talks with Ibn Saud on February 17, Churchill is said to have acted as if he was wielding a big stick. He made it clear that in spite of the assassination of Lord Moyne he was still committed to Zionism and he reminded the King that Britain had sustained his kingdom with subsidies for twenty years. He refused to give an assurance that Jewish migration to Palestine would be stopped. He also suggested that Jews could be settled in Libya, “a country with a lot of room and few people,” but he did give an assurance that he would not drive the Arabs out of Palestine or deprive them of their means of livelihood there.⁴⁴⁰

Responding in a quite predictable manner, Ibn Saud made it equally clear that the promotion of Zionism from any quarter must, without question, bring bloodshed and widespread disorder in the Arab lands with the certainty of no benefit to Britain or anyone else. He is reported to have said that Britain and its allies “would be making the wrong choice between a friendly and peaceful Arab world and a struggle to the death between Arabs and Jews if unreasonable immigration of Jews to Palestine is renewed.” And he added that in any case the formula must be arrived at by open discussion with Arabs and with Arab consent.⁴⁴¹

On his return to Washington, Roosevelt authorized Rabbi Wise to state that the President was still in favour of unrestricted Jewish immigration and a Jewish State. Arab governments reacted with justified anger so he then authorized the State Department to tell foreign missions that his statement through Rabbi Wise referred only to 'possible action at some future date'. He stood by his pledge to consult Arab heads of state as well as Jews on any US move relating to Palestine, he said.

Earlier in February, while the Yalta Conference was in progress, a German intermediary named Kleist, who had been involved in previous attempts to set up peace negotiations with the Western Allies, involved Himmler in a plan to trade the release of Jewish concentration camp inmates for an armistice. Contact was made through a representative of the World Jewish Congress with an adviser to Roosevelt who said the President would be prepared to consider a political deal in return for the release of one and a half million Jews held in such camps. That response showed a significant shift in American thinking under the enormous pressure of the Jewish lobby, (both Zionist and non-Zionist), because the first major scheme to trade Jews for concessions, the Eichmann incident, (page 28/88), had been rejected out of hand and used for propaganda fodder.

Negotiations were then put on a more formal basis between the Germans and the Swedish Minister for Foreign Affairs and it was agreed that Count Folke Bernadotte would visit Berlin to complete negotiations with Himmler personally. But that meant that Foreign Minister Ribbentrop also had to be involved and the scene became complicated. Ribbentrop met Bernadotte but he also sent his personal agent, Fritz Hesse, to Stockholm on February 17 for additional talks. Hesse returned convinced that both Churchill and Roosevelt were intent on destroying Germany and that an approach to the Russians may be more successful. Ribbentrop would not authorize contact with the Russians without Hitler's knowledge. On March 16 he sought the Fuhrer's approval. At first Hitler agreed, but then he hesitated. It was all senseless, he said. Whoever talked to the enemy was a traitor to The Idea. "We may fall in the fight against Bolshevism but we will not negotiate with it." He forbade any further contact with the enemy.⁴⁴²

The Kleist plan was dead, but together with the Eichmann plan it illustrates yet again the central role of the Jewish question in the parody of Mein Kampf. Apart from the threat to Britain's colonial interests which became greater if Britain took no action to stop Hitler from subjugating Europe, it was the direct threat to the Jewish population of Poland which determined the government's decision to declare war against Germany. Then, when Hitler held the upper hand with much of Europe subjugated and the threat to Britain, fighting alone, at its greatest, Churchill rejected Hitler's offers of a settlement because the Nazis would have been free to dominate Europe and clear out its Jews as they wished – if the Allies would not accept them. But later, after the tide had turned and the defeat of Germany was assured, the hatred ran so deep that the Allies would not consider an early settlement to save the remainder of the Jews whom they had originally gone to war to save.

Just as the Kleist plan faltered the leaders of the Arab countries were acting in concert to protect the Palestinians from being engulfed by Europe's surviving Jews. Following the adoption of the Alexandria Protocol, Arab foreign ministers and experts had met during February and early March to draft a constitution for the Arab League. As a consequence of that meeting Roosevelt received letters from each of the King of Saudi Arabia, the regent of Iraq, the President of the Syrian Republic, the King of Yemen and the Prime Minister of Lebanon on March 10.

Reviewing those letters the State Department noted the Arab claims to Palestine on the basis of moral, historical and political arguments, and recognized that the Arabs, particularly Ibn Saud, were prepared to fight in defence of their position on Palestine if necessary. Wallace Murray, the Director of the Office of Near Eastern Affairs, warned that: "The President's continued support of Zionism may thus lead to actual bloodshed in the Near East and even endanger the security of our immensely valuable oil concessions in Saudi Arabia." He also said it would not be wise to reach a settlement on Palestine without the full support of the Soviet Government which at that date, March 20, 1945, was opposed to the establishment of a Jewish State. "The continued endorsement by the President of Zionist objectives could throw the entire Arab world into the arms of the Soviet Union," he said.⁴⁴³ Amazingly similar sentiments to those of Stettinius and Landis. But the very determined Zionist lobby had more political clout.

That State Department review was still in progress when the General Arab Congress convened in Cairo on March 17 to review the Arab League Pact which had been drafted six months earlier. It was approved and signed on March 22 by six of the seven founding members: Egypt, Iraq, Lebanon, Syria, Saudi Arabia and Trans-Jordan. Yemen signed on May 10. Unofficial delegations from Algeria, Libya, Morocco and Tunisia had each sought membership but the initial agreement provided that membership was to be restricted to independent Arab states. As those four countries were each subject to foreign occupation and foreign sovereignty they were not then eligible for membership, but the Front for the Defence of the Maghreb was organized to foster their independence and membership of the League.⁴⁴⁴ At the same time that the Arab foreign ministers met to finalize the Arab League Pact, representatives of twenty countries of Latin America met in Mexico City, under United States 'guidance,' to adopt a common approach to the drafting of the United Nations Charter and a similar meeting of British Commonwealth representatives was held in London in early April.

THE SIEGE OF MANILA

While Roosevelt was sailing home from his talks in Egypt to become even more embroiled in his Palestinian affair and Churchill was still there, being rapidly reduced to the role of second fiddle, the American battle to recover its own piece of empire, the Philippines, was reaching a dreadful climax. When US troops besieged Manila the Japanese troops fought house to house battles with a fanatical zeal based on a religious- nationalist dedication which the European-American mind set could not understand. But they also slaughtered Filipino civilians on a scale which the world should have viewed with the same horror as Hitler's genocide against the Jews. In an orgy of sadistic killing which ran for only a matter of days about 100,000 people were murdered, including 5,000 hostages during the final siege of the old city.⁴⁴⁵

Such crimes, certainly not restricted to the Philippines, cost the Japanese all the good will which their anti-colonial liberation plan and policy of Greater Asian Cooperation could have generated. Like their fanatical defence, the slaughter was carried out with a fanatical hatred of their enemies, based on a combination of revulsion at their national experience of colonial repression and their religious-nationalist dedication which was not understood by those with a European-American mentality. And yet, what that second wave of World War II 'liberators' did not wish to recall was that their forebears had been responsible for similar senseless slaughter in their own territories in what were, in historical terms, relatively recent periods of their history. The difference was that the Japanese non-Christians and the German Christians were doing it now and the Western Christian liberators wanted their colonies back and a return to their positions of privilege, and they operated all the propaganda machinery. Manila finally fell on February 23. The Americans, still smarting from the humiliation of the enormous losses which they suffered at Pearl Harbour in the opening round of the war, were now even more eager to retaliate for the slaughter of prisoners of war and civilians by the Japanese. They had already discarded the principle of avoiding the bombardment of areas of civilian population, having taken part in the fire bombing of Dresden which was destroyed as a joint Anglo-American exercise on February 13 and 14. They now planned the destruction of a series of Japanese cities along the same lines.

Their first target was Tokyo and in less than three hours on March 9 they unleashed 2,000 tons of incendiary bombs in the most destructive single air raid ever. An area of almost sixteen square miles was destroyed and deaths, mainly from incineration and asphyxiation, totalled 130,000. The cities of Nagoya, Osaka, Kobe, Yokohama and Kawasaki were to suffer similar treatment over the next three months with total civilian deaths exceeding 250,000.⁴⁴⁶ But that was not barbaric slaughter ... that was justified retribution ... or so the world was expected to believe.

CRACKS IN THE GRAND ALLIANCE

In the wake of the Yalta Conference a tide of confidence and optimism had swept through the Western world. The apparent success of the Conference had demonstrated to all but the most hard line opponents of communism that future cooperation between East and West was assured. The Polish settlement had attracted more than its share of criticism, to be sure, but the western public had been told by their leaders that it was fair and just, and that Stalin could be trusted to live up to it – otherwise they wouldn't have signed it, would they? With the final defeat of Hitlerism only a matter of weeks away it therefore seemed that a long lasting period of peace and prosperity was just around the corner...

Behind the scenes, however, a different story was emerging. In Moscow, the Commission for the Reorganization of the Polish Government, consisting of Molotov and the British and American ambassadors, had quickly become divided over the interpretation of the agreement on Poland. At issue was which Poles should be invited to negotiations to determine the makeup of the proposed Provisional Government of National Unity, and who should be given the power to decide. In line with the Soviet Union's previous recognition of the Lublin Committee as the legitimate government of Poland, Molotov insisted that only those Poles sympathetic to the Yalta agreement be invited to attend and that the Warsaw Government be consulted first on any list of Polish leaders proposed by the Commission. The Western representatives conceded, only to find that most of their proposals, including more moderate members of the London Government-in-exile, were rejected.⁴⁴⁷

With the Moscow discussions deadlocked, the Polish Provisional Government continued to act, with Soviet support, consolidating its grip and eliminating rivals out of sight of the western powers. And while reports of the situation filtered through to the Western governments through the Polish government-in exile in London, repeated requests by Britain and the United States to send in observers were rebuffed.⁴⁴⁸

As the tension over Poland increased 'spot fires' began to break out elsewhere which only raised the international temperature further. Within weeks of Yalta the Soviets also proceeded to consolidate their control of Bulgaria and Rumania. In Bulgaria the anti-fascist purges which had begun in late 1944 continued unabated. The pro-western head of the Peasants Party had been forced to resign in January for his part in the war, and the Peasants Party had left the governing Fatherland Front. By March, the US representative was reporting that the Bulgarian Communists were attempting to impose joint electoral lists in which their own participation would be 50 percent to 60 percent.⁴⁴⁹ In Rumania the situation was more dramatic. The Soviets moved to exploit the deepening crisis which had enveloped the Radescu Government. Violent demonstrations occurred in Bucharest with an open clash between the Liberal, Peasant and leftist parties in cabinet as the leftists stockpiled arms in preparation for a coup. In response, the Allied Control Commission, under Soviet direction, ordered the demobilization of the Rumanian army and the disarming of police.⁴⁵⁰ An American protest reiterating the Declaration on Liberated Europe was shrugged off with the excuse that order had to be established behind Red Army lines. Besides that, the Soviets argued, a new government was needed to rid the country of the last vestiges of Nazism and to create democratic institutions in accordance with agreements reached at Yalta.

Then on the February 26, the Soviet Deputy Foreign Minister, Vishinsky, arrived in Bucharest to take matters directly in hand. A resistant King Michael was flatly ordered to dismiss the Radescu government and install the pro-Communist Petru Groza, and on the 6 of March the formation of a new government was announced. Of its eighteen members fourteen were from the leftist National Democratic Front, with Communist control of the key ministries of Justice, War, Communications and the Interior.⁴⁵¹

Churchill's anti-Bolshevik alarm bells were ringing. On March 8 he cabled Roosevelt: "I feel sure that you will be as distressed as I am by recent events in Rumania. The Russians have succeeded in establishing the rule of a Communist minority by force and misrepresentation." He continued, however: "We have been hampered in our protests against these developments by the fact that, in order to have the freedom to save Greece, Eden and I at Moscow in October recognized that Russia should have a largely preponderant voice in Rumania and Bulgaria while we took the lead in Greece. Stalin adhered very strictly to this understanding during the thirty days fighting against the Communists and ELAS in the city of Athens, in spite of the fact that all this was most disagreeable to him and those around him." Any protest to Stalin by Britain, Churchill said, would only "lead to comparison between the aims of his action and those of ours. On this, neither side would convince the other." Indeed. The Western public had clearly seen through Churchill's pretense of 'restoring democracy' in Greece, so why shouldn't Stalin?

In Churchill's eyes, however, a deal was apparently not a deal. That Stalin fellow simply could not be allowed to get away with brutally interfering in other countries' affairs! What to do? If the British couldn't register a strong protest, he suggested to Roosevelt, then perhaps the Americans could. Roosevelt, however, was not to be taken in. He refused to take the matter up with Stalin, and nor was he impressed with Churchill's urgent plea that they both protest directly to the Soviet leader over the situation in regard to Poland. Although he shared Churchill's concern at the turn of events, he argued that the matters under dispute were already being taken up by their respective ambassadors and neither he nor Churchill should personally intervene until all other avenues had been exhausted.

Roosevelt's grasp of the situation was accurate. He was fully aware that the results of the Yalta Conference had essentially confirmed the deal that Churchill and Stalin had made in Moscow with his tacit approval the previous October, that Eastern Europe was to be a Soviet sphere of influence. As Roosevelt pointed out in a cable to Churchill in late March, despite the fact that the Warsaw government's veto on who could attend the Moscow negotiations could not be directly supported by the terms of the Yalta accord, the reality was that "we placed, as clearly shown in the agreement, somewhat more emphasis on the Lublin Poles than on the other two groups from which the new government was to be drawn."⁴⁵³ Moreover, neither Britain nor the United States could now claim to be surprised if the Soviets chose to interpret the agreement in a manner that best served their interests, since both had been fully aware of the rubbery nature of the accord. The simple fact was the Soviets had the power, and the agreements reached at Yalta merely acknowledged that fact. Indeed, as both Churchill and Roosevelt were also well aware, without joint enforcement machinery the Declaration on Liberated Europe was essentially a piece of propaganda for Western public consumption. Although it provided for 'joint consultations' on matters affecting its implementation, in practice it could be stretched in any direction the Soviets chose.⁴⁵⁴ The two western leaders may well have counted on some good-will concessions from Stalin, but since he had studiously avoided interfering in Greece, as Churchill himself acknowledged, he had absolutely no reason to offer the West any gestures solely for the purpose of saving them face. And although neither Roosevelt nor Churchill realized it, Stalin was well aware of their duplicity over development of the atomic bomb and, making allowances for the worst case scenario, he was naturally determined to strengthen his buffer zone.

The chickens were indeed coming home to roost. British and American actions in securing their positions of privilege at other people's expense were now providing the pretext for the Soviet Union to do the same. For Churchill, however, the question was more than one of Empire or anti-Bolshevism. It was also a straightforward matter of electoral politics. Due to the pre-war conspiracy of silence the public had been told – and believed – that Britain had gone to war to preserve Poland's independence. With a general election due within three months, Churchill could hardly expect support from either the public or Parliament if it turned out that the territory of Poland – 'cleansed' of its Jewish communities – had been 'saved' from the Nazis only to become a part of the Soviet empire. Heated criticism in Parliament of the agreements reached at Yalta had already forced an undertaking from Churchill that he would report back if they were not being faithfully implemented, so it was no wonder that he was keen to force the pace with Roosevelt.⁴⁵⁵

However, Churchill's electoral problems were hardly the concern of Stalin, who proceeded to make diplomatic moves on Turkey that only served to raise tension levels another notch. On February 23 the Turkish government had abandoned neutrality and declared war on Germany and Japan so as to gain entrance to the San Francisco UN conference. On March 19 Molotov handed the Turkish Ambassador in Moscow a statement concerning the Soviet-Turkish Treaty of Friendship and Neutrality of 1925. It noted that the treaty no longer corresponded to circumstances and required important revisions.⁴⁵⁶

Just what the Soviet concerns were was no secret. During Churchill's visit to Moscow in October 1944 Stalin had said he wanted changes to the Montreaux Convention which restricted transit of Soviet warships through the straits of the Bosphorus and Dardanelles. Churchill was not opposed in principle, expressing his understanding of Soviet needs for better access to the Mediterranean. At Yalta a revision of the convention in line with Soviet wishes had been informally agreed, subject to the provision that Turkey be given a joint guarantee of its independence and unity. However, despite the fact that the Soviets had had no formal opportunity to make specific proposals to their allies since Yalta, and their actions could be seen as a reasonable attempt to broach a delicate subject with the Turks prior to the San Francisco Conference, alarms bells rang for both the Turks and their British Allies. Soviet criticism of the Turkish government in the press and on radio had been stepped up, and rumours of Bulgarian troop movements on the Turkish border had started circulating. The Commons feared that this was an attempt to pre-empt British interests, perhaps presenting them with a fait accompli which might include the cession of bases or territory which had formerly been Russian, against the wishes of the Turks.⁴⁵⁷

Unsuccessful in his political manoeuvring, in mid March Churchill began urging Roosevelt and Eisenhower to alter military strategy so as to meet the Soviets as far east as possible and beat them to Berlin, thereby hoping to improve the West's post-war bargaining position in the crucial post-war settlement negotiations. However, his consciousness of the political factors at stake was not matched by the Americans. As it was, the lack of German resistance on the western front meant that the Western armies would find themselves deep inside the intended Soviet zone in Germany, and contrary to Churchill's repeated urgings, Washington and Eisenhower stuck to their strictly military plan of advancing to the Elbe river and then directing their main forces south to prevent the possibility of Hitler establishing a 'southern redoubt' in the mountains of Bavaria. In addition, to Churchill's great consternation, Eisenhower informed Stalin of his intention not to go for Berlin, and gave him the details of the western Allies' order of battle.⁴⁵⁸ Stalin, however, was not impressed. When informed of Eisenhower's actions he thought they were a trick, and immediately accelerated his own measures to take Berlin. He was convinced, along with his generals, that Montgomery in the north was racing them to the German capital.⁴⁵⁹

Politically, however, the Polish issue continued as the major focus of attention. During Yalta the Polish Provisional Government in Warsaw had unilaterally declared Pomerania, Upper and Lower Silesia and East Prussia to be part of Poland, and on March 14, fourteen Polish woiwodships were established on former German territory, creating a de facto border further west than either the United States or Britain at Yalta had been willing to concede. Most of the German residents were expelled.⁴⁶⁰ Then in late March the Soviets pulled their most audacious stunt yet: lured to Moscow on the pretext that they would be attending discussions on the reorganization of the Polish government, sixteen Polish underground leaders, some of whom were on Western lists for participation in the Moscow discussions, were arrested for activities against the Red Army.⁴⁶¹

As rumours of the arrests began to circulate in the West, the fact that the underground leaders had in reality decided to continue armed resistance against the Soviets, and were thus inimical to the establishment of a Poland 'friendly' to the Soviet Union as the Western powers had promised at Yalta, was of little consequence. Poland had become a test case for Soviet intentions in Eastern Europe as a whole, symbolic to the Western Allies and the world of the ability of the Allies to maintain post-war unity. Without Allied unity the United Nations would be a failure. A firm stand had to be taken, and on April 1, at Churchill's urging, Roosevelt confronted Stalin directly. Despite Roosevelt's own admission that the Yalta agreement gave weight to the Soviet position on the reorganization of the Polish government, his growing concern led him to gravely warn Stalin that it was unacceptable, and that the question needed to be settled 'fairly and speedily' if the 'difficulties and dangers to Allied unity' were not to be made more 'acute'.⁴⁶²

Before Stalin replied, however, another issue erupted to destabilize even further the already unstable situation. As Churchill's suspicions about Soviet intentions had mounted, the Soviets, in mid-March, had revealed suspicions of their own. On March 8 General Karl Wolff, German

SS commander in Italy, had taken steps through Vatican intermediaries to make contact with the American head of Mission in Switzerland, Allen Dulles, with a view to negotiating surrender terms. Four days later the Soviets were informed of the approach, and on the 13th were told that if the contact proved serious Soviet representatives would be welcome to General Alexander's HQ in Italy. The Soviets, however, suspected duplicity, and their protests peaked on April 5 with a blunt telegram from Stalin to his two counterparts accusing America and Britain of trying to cut a deal with Germany to put more pressure on the eastern front. Their aim, he stated, was to slow the Russian advance in return for less arduous terms when a peace treaty was eventually signed. Roosevelt and Churchill expressed their shock and outrage, but rather than making an issue out of it, both preferred to let the matter die a natural death.⁴⁶³

That was probably just as well, since, as later historians have shown, Dulles had indeed made such an offer informally to his German negotiating partners behind the back of his Washington superiors.⁴⁶⁴ Nevertheless, with Western ears still ringing from his denunciation of the negotiations, and with the US and Britain refusing to recognize the Lublin government or invite it to the San Francisco conference until it had been reorganized, Stalin responded to Roosevelt's cable on April 9 with the suggestion that one new member be added to the Polish government for every five members of the existing Warsaw government, in line with the reorganization of the Yugoslav government under Tito and Subasic.⁴⁶⁵ However, since both Britain and the US viewed that outcome as a communist takeover by Tito, neither were satisfied with the proposal.

Clearly the Soviets were in control of the situation, and it was equally clear that there was little the Western Powers could do about it. Stalin was not going to give away anything that was in his power to keep. Faced with such a firm stand, however, others besides Churchill were beginning to question just what Stalin's ultimate intentions might be. One who was convinced he knew was US Ambassador to Moscow, Averell Harriman. Previously a committed supporter of Roosevelt's policy of flexible accommodation with the Soviets, Harriman had now changed his mind. Taking advantage of the soured mood resulting from Russian accusations of duplicity in the Italian surrender negotiations, on April 6 he suggested in a cable to Secretary of State Stettinius that whatever had been in the Soviets' minds at Yalta, it now seemed that they felt they could force the US to "acquiesce in their policies." And what those policies aimed at was clear: "the Soviet programme [in Eastern Europe] is the establishment of totalitarianism, ending personal liberty and democracy as we know and respect it." Equally clear were the implications of the programme: expansion across Europe. Soviet arguments that they must guard against a future German menace by erecting a tier of security states were a sham. One tier of 'security states' inevitably implied the need for another, and once the Soviets had gained control of the states on their border it was inevitable that they would attempt to penetrate further using communist-controlled parties to exploit the democratic process. The 'domino theory' had appeared on the scene, and with Soviet actions from Poland to Turkey providing 'proof', it would soon be proliferating as quickly as communist plots.⁴⁶⁶

Then, before the action could be taken any further, a new factor was thrown into the world equation: the death of President Roosevelt. An invalid since 1921 when he suffered an attack of poliomyelitis, Roosevelt had struggled against failing health for some months. When he died on April 12, 1945, the United States mourned; intense lobbying began as every group with a vested interest in the conduct or the outcome of the war sought to capture the ear of the new president, Harry Truman; Japan hesitated in its tracks, uncertain whether the change of leadership may have any impact on the US war effort; and Hitler celebrated – temporarily – ordering the spirited defence of Berlin in the hope that the Allies might split over the conduct of the war.

The Allies didn't split. They were certainly having some tense moments. Quite apart from the standoff over Poland, major quarrels were breaking out between Britain and the United States. The root cause was the continuing efforts by United States political and military leaders to belittle Imperial Britain's role and to undermine its capacity to return to its pre-war position of imperial or colonial pre-eminence. It was that deeper conflict which bubbled to the surface through a steady stream of disputes over command roles, areas of operational responsibility and control in occupied areas, and the role of Communism in the areas liberated from Nazi control. However the extent to which their political interests and war time economies and operations had become enmeshed, and their determination to put an end to Hitler, the Nazi organization, its operations, its philosophy and its influence were sufficient to hold them together through such troubles. In the same fashion, the possibility that the three-way Alliance would disintegrate was mitigated by the desire to get the Soviets involved in the Pacific war. However, even that seemingly straightforward motivation was soon to become subject to calculations of interest which contained within them the potential for even more dramatic destabilization in world affairs.

In the Pacific the situation was also changing rapidly and the forecasts that the war with Japan would continue for at least eighteen months after victory in Europe were being revised with every territory which fell. Iwo Jima had fallen on February 22 and because the Americans were able to make their massive fire bombing raids against Japanese homeland cities almost at will from Tinian Island, military analysts were predicting that the war would end before Christmas. In fact senior members of the Japanese cabinet were hoping to end it within weeks. The invasion of Okinawa began on April 1 and even though there would be almost three months of ferocious fighting before the whole island was occupied, the loss of the island had to be conceded on April 4.

The Government of Premier Koiso fell on April 5 and Admiral Suzuki succeeded him. Peace feelers were already being passed through Sweden and to forestall them the Soviet Union advised the new Japanese government that it regarded the Pact of Neutrality as no longer valid. The message was clear and the Japanese government was stunned. In an effort to avoid a Soviet declaration of war – and not knowing that Stalin had already committed himself to a declaration of war in order to earn a bit of Japanese and Chinese territory – the new Foreign Minister, Togo Shigenori, authorized Prince Konoye and another senior statesman to approach the Russian ambassador in Tokyo, Jacob Malik. They were to offer to transfer certain Japanese rights on the continent to Russia as an inducement for peace. Malik was interested. Moscow was not. However, in spite of the fact that Soviet troops were already being rushed from the German front to the east in preparation for the agreed declaration of war, Soviet Foreign Minister Molotov assured Japan's Ambassador Saito in Moscow that the Soviet Union still intended to honor the pact of neutrality during the remaining year.⁴⁶⁷

By that stage it was apparent to everyone that the war in Europe was in its final phase. Germany's military resistance virtually collapsed from April 2. Its communications systems had been shattered, all of its oil and coal supplies were in Allied hands, food supplies were totally blockaded as Germany's food bowls had been occupied one by one, refugees clogged the roads and any public facilities which were still accessible, and morale had totally disintegrated. The people could do nothing except wait for the inevitable unconditional surrender. The only factors which really slowed the Allied advances towards Berlin were the rate at which supplies could be brought forward and the need to clear the chaos as they pushed ahead.

There was widespread expectation within the Zionist movement that the end of the war in Europe and the full exposure of the nature of the Holocaust would bring general support for the idea of a national home for the Jews and the establishment of the State of Israel. Moshe Sharett, who later became Foreign Minister for Israel, hoped to secure Vatican support for the plan and sought an audience with the Pope to discuss the fate of Jews in Europe and the statehood proposal. It is believed that at their meeting on April 10 he proposed a special position in the future Jewish State for the Catholic Church but all he received was a firm rebuff.⁴⁶⁸ The Pope did not favour the establishment of a Jewish State and he was moving towards his own plan for the internationalization of Jerusalem.

In some respects the new president adopted a tougher stand than that taken by his predecessor, notably on the key point of Nazi philosophy: the Jewish question. This was in spite of a strong appeal by the Secretary of State only six days after Roosevelt's death. Stettinius warned Truman that it was very likely that "efforts will be made by some of the Zionist leaders to obtain from you at an early date some commitments in favor of the Zionist program." He was well aware that they would try to offset Churchill's coolness towards the Jewish community since Lord Moyne's assassination with increased support from the new president. And with an eye to the fact that the war in Europe was in its final throes he then warned that Truman should handle the issue with the greatest care and with a view to the long range interests of the United States. It was highly complex and involved "questions which go far beyond the plight of the Jews in Europe," he said.⁴⁶⁹

The dying days of the Third Reich were both chaotic and pathetic. Hitler ordered 'the traitors' all around him to continue fighting. Some did so, for absolutely no purpose. Thousands of people died every day for the sake of the pride of leaders on both sides of the front while Himmler and others tried to toss in the towel, and still others deserted.

On April 22 Himmler offered, through Count Bernadotte, to surrender to the Western Allies but to keep fighting against the Russians until the Western Allies took over the anti-Communist fight against the Soviet Union. Churchill rejected the offer, of course. But the situation was such that Himmler could not have persuaded the German officers or troops to that line of action if he had been given the opportunity. On the eastern front that day General Steiner could not stir his army to mount a defence of Eberswalde against the Russians who simply rolled on regardless.

The Soviet armies totally surrounded Berlin on April 27. That day, Hitler's first and principal ally, Mussolini, was captured by Italian partisans as he travelled north from Milan to make one last stand. He had failed in a bid through the Archbishop of Milan and the Vatican to raise interest in a political settlement among the Western Allies. There was an argument among the partisans over whether the Fascist dictator should be handed over to the Allies or executed on the spot. It was resolved next day when he was gunned down by an execution squad. There was to be no chance for a second rescue. Mussolini's body, together with that of his mistress, was taken back to Milan and hung next morning, April 29, upside down on a butcher's hook in the city square.

THE DEATH OF THE SCOURGE

A few hours earlier, on the evening of April 28, Hitler wrote his political testament, married his mistress of many years, Eva Braun, and prepared to die by the bullet also, but at his own hand. About mid afternoon on April 30, 1945, after his wife had taken cyanide, he did the deed. His staff obeyed his final instruction that they destroy both bodies by incineration. It was a rather less glorious funeral than that arranged to honour Roosevelt, one of his key opponents, who had died only days before. No one seems to have commented on the fact that they had held the principal office in their respective nations in parallel for virtually the same length of time. Roosevelt took office on March 4, 1933; the final Reichstag election was held next day, March 5, and eighteen days later Hitler received the vote which gave him absolute dictatorial power. Now Roosevelt had died eighteen days before Hitler. The curtain had fallen on the final act of the parody of Mein Kampf and the Scourge of the much wider plot, the Night Journey, was dead. He had gone the same way as so many of the victims of his final solution. Except for one thing. They did not get a Requiem Mass but he did. When Adolf Bertram, by then the Cardinal Archbishop of Berlin, learned of Hitler's death he ordered all the parish priests of his archdiocese, in his own hand writing, "to hold a solemn Requiem in memory of the Fuhrer and all those members of the Wehrmacht who have fallen in the struggle for our German Fatherland, along with the sincerest prayers for Volk and Fatherland and for the future of the Catholic Church in Germany."⁴⁷⁰ Perhaps that Requiem really puts Hitler's funeral on a par with that of Roosevelt. Bertram's action was possibly intended to do so. It was totally consistent with Pius XII's insistence in Divini Redemptoris at Easter, 1937, that Hitler's renaissance was 'founded solely on Christianity'. (Chapter 20.). The cardinal could hardly disagree with his Pontiff. He had to support him, even if senior members of the hierarchy had declined to support Pius XI when he became too sympathetic with the Jews. And Pius XII had made provision for people, like Hitler, who might have wandered from the straight and narrow path once or twice in their lifetimes. Perhaps he had Hitler in mind when he released the encyclical Mystici Corporis Christi on June 29, 1943.

Let all men, therefore, abhor sin, which defiles the mystical members of the Redeemer; but should anyone have unhappily fallen, and if he has not by his obstinacy rendered himself unworthy of the fellowship of the faithful, then let him be welcomed most lovingly, and let a practical charity see in him a frail member of Jesus Christ. For it is better, as St. Augustine says, "to be healed within the organism of the Church than to be cut off from its body as an incurable member." "So long as a member still adheres to the body its cure is not beyond all hope; but if it has been cut off it cannot be cured or made whole."^{471 472} [See above, p. 40, emphasis added.]

The cardinal's exercise of his authority was consistent with several things: the misguided encouragement which Hitler had received from the Vatican throughout the war, Catholic Canon Law, and an encyclical of the church's Pontiff whom the church was required to believe was infallible and divinely appointed as the successor and Vicar of Christ, constituting, with him, one only Head. He had confirmed for all the world that Hitler was still a Catholic in good standing at the time of his death. The author of the parody of Mein Kampf, fulfilling his dual roles as the instrument which had flung the parody at the feet of the church, and the Scourge of the Qur'anic Night Journey, was indisputably an integral part of the amorphous Christian gel which was the subject of the parody. Hitler did not do anything or pursue any policies during his period of office which had not already been done, enacted into law, or pursued outside of the law by one or more Christian leader, head of church, head of state, industrialist or politician except to introduce the use of the gas chamber with its greater killing efficiency for the purpose of genocide.

Neither the church as a body or the leaders of the amorphous Christian gel (with a few notable exceptions) were able, or prepared, to recognize that fact or to see in it a statement of the church's abject failure and its causal contribution to the broken relationships and misconduct which had brought the world to the state which it was in. Without being able to recognize that fact they were certainly not going to be able to recognize the challenge of the parody to put their houses in order, to rethink the theology which had led to their erroneous self-understanding, and to set out on a new course, starting from scratch, in an attempt to fulfill their commission from Christ. That commission was simple. To go into all the world and guide humanity towards an understanding of their relationships with God and with each other: and to do it without putting loads on their shoulders and stumbling blocks in their way.

The Scourge was dead but Gog and Magog were still at war and the State of Israel had not yet been established to enable its people to show that they could fulfill their pivotal role in collaboration with their partners in the triangle of Abrahamic messianic faiths. In fact there was no guarantee that it would be established. The participants in the three interlocking 'plots' who were bringing all of the progressive challenges to the church together had all read their lines quite well so far, but there was little indication that they had understood their roles. In fact the reconstruction proposals which they were planning; their efforts to reimpose European imperial control; and their efforts to strengthen or to prop up positions of privilege and their capacity to exploit, clearly indicate that they did not understand the circumstances of the war. The question was: how long would it be before the truth would dawn?

CHAPTER 26

THE GRAND DESIGN ... OR ... IT'S MY TURN TO PLAY POLICEMAN

After six years of war the victorious powers turned their attention to the post-war order. Whatever the outcome of their talks would be, one thing was certain. The world had changed, and there was no going back to 1939. The self-satisfied superiority of European Christian civilization had been shattered, along with its claims to leadership on the world stage. In Europe itself the Holocaust had exposed the shallowness of its pretensions to moral superiority for all to see, while across Europe's far-flung empires the prestige of European power had been stripped away, replaced by an awakening of nationalist aspirations which marked a fundamental and irrevocable shift in the relationship between colonizers and people colonized.

But one thing above all signalled the demise of the centuries-old Eurocentric world order and the ushering in of a new strategic balance in world affairs. Europe had been split in two, and looming massive on each other's horizons across the divide were the occupying armies of the two largest powers on earth. They represented two mutually antagonistic ideologies which had been brought together in wartime under an alliance of convenience. On one side was the United States, the scion of the Christian capitalist world and self-styled New Israel, and on the other was the Soviet Union, the world's first atheistic communist state. The mantle of world power had effectively passed to them, and how they would behave towards each other in peacetime would shape not only the future of Europe, but ultimately the entire world.

So the world waited with uncertainty and with some apprehension to see the shape of the new peace. With the war in Europe grinding to a bitter end and the defeat of Japan only a matter of time, a meeting began far away from both theatres of war. On April 25, 1945, at the San Francisco Opera House, delegates representing fifty invited nations met to debate the founding Charter of the United Nations Organization. Together they were to plan the institutions which would put into practice the principles by which the post war international order would be governed, and for which the war had been officially fought – in terms of the Atlantic Charter anyway. Those principles were the sovereign equality of peace loving nations and their right to self-determination. They represented hope for the world's many millions of war-torn and oppressed people who longed for justice, freedom, security and an end to exploitation. Their meeting on the basis of such high ideals was the first of many steps that had to be taken if there was to be progress towards realizing the promise of the Messianic Age.

Unfortunately, however, the ideals existed in pure form only in the politicians' rhetoric. As if to erase any lingering doubts about where the real power lay, whatever independent steps the delegates might have had in mind were constrained by arrangements already made between the United States, Britain and the Soviet Union. In addition to the 'Big Three', China was present as a 'sponsoring power', but it had little effective input since its proposals were subject to the wishes of the others. France, offended at being left out of the Yalta Conference, rejected the offer to become a sponsoring power when its suggestions for amendments to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals were rejected by the Big Three. The agenda for the whole conference was effectively under the control of the victorious sponsoring powers, who, with the addition of France on May 4, decided what was and what was not to be considered, including any new amendments or proposals of their own. Any change to their agenda proposals required a two-thirds majority of delegates¹ All the delegates had to do was perform according to the script. They could do little more than tinker around the edges. Just as Roosevelt had envisaged, and Churchill and Stalin had agreed, the UNO was to be a show run by the big powers, with they themselves in the leading roles. There was no role for the countries facing defeat or for those which chose not to take sides in the war which was still being fought with as much bitterness as at any time – perhaps even more – or for those which were still under colonial or other foreign political control.

This was all said to be justified by the 'realities' of power politics. The advocates for the UNO had argued that the League of Nations failed because it was unrealistically idealistic. Though well intentioned, it had been reduced to a farcical debating forum racked by internal bickering because the decisions it made were not backed by the weight of authority which only the great powers were in a position to wield. The new organization, in contrast, would provide mechanisms which could avoid such problems. In addition to the legislative body in which all members had an equal voice, the General Assembly, there was to be an executive body, the Security Council. This would have as permanent members those nations with the power to command agreement and back their decisions with force. Unlike the old League of Nations Council, recommendations for the peaceful settlement of disputes would require only a majority of seven votes among its eleven permanent and non-permanent members, rather than unanimity. To sweeten the deal, however, and thus maintain the support and participation of the permanent members, they were each to have a power of veto over the Council's collective security decisions so as to protect their own interests. Security decisions were those involving diplomatic, economic, or military pressures against a country which was threatening the peace. In this way a compromise could be forged between the forces of idealism and self-interest which supposedly would be to the benefit of all.²

However, while such a compromise may have reflected the realities of a world as yet unable to live according to the principles of community rather than the dictates of power, it did little if anything to redress the crushing burdens of inequality and exploitation under which the vast masses of humanity laboured. In fact, most of the world's colonized peoples were not even represented at the meeting. Their exclusion was an ironic comment on the attitudes of the great powers which were in sharp contrast to the UNO's expressed ideal of self-determination. The exclusion was not the fault of the delegates, but of the great powers who claimed the right to control the agenda on behalf of the countless numbers of people they did not represent, and whose real interests and aspirations they largely ignored.

Indeed, due to the self-interest of the two largest Western powers, discussions which were planned to take place before the conference on the issue of greatest concern to many of those countless millions – trusteeship proposals – had been impossible. Roosevelt had initially hoped that the UN could be given special responsibilities for exercising watch over all dependent territories to assist their progress to independence, not only those under League mandates. When that was mentioned at Yalta, Churchill hotly declared that he would not consider any suggestion 'that the British empire is to be put in the dock and examined by everybody.'³ Similarly, the US had its own self-interest reasons, apart from an ideological dislike of imperialism. It still wanted to dismantle the kinds of economic preferences which gave the colonial powers a big advantage, to ensure for itself unrestrained access to the resources and markets of countries under colonial control.⁴ But Roosevelt's views were not even to the satisfaction of his own armed services departments. They wanted to maintain unfettered US control of conquered Japanese Pacific territories which they believed essential to US security, and they resisted any proposal which would make the US accountable to an international body for its actions.⁵

Thus, as the conference opened, the great powers prepared once more to haggle over the future of much of the rest of the human race. But if the great powers ignored the real aspirations and interests of the vast majority of humanity, even the reasons for their actions had deeper historical roots. If the world was as yet unready to live as a community, a large proportion of the responsibility could be sheeted back to the organized religions of the world, and the Christian Churches in particular. If they weren't still intent on their traditional roles as convenient cheer squads for their associated state allies and sponsors, they were, with a few notable exceptions, busy on their equally traditional missions of self-interested political manoeuvring. However even if the churches of the world were not yet able to provide meaningful leadership and to give succour to the overburdened masses of humanity, at least now those masses might be left to be crushed in peace. Perhaps, if they were allowed – and that was a doubtful chance at best – they might also marshal the will and resources to slowly lift the burden through their own efforts.

As the conference opened, the plans of the great powers were already well advanced, and there was little evidence that the officially stated war aims of the treaty partners were providing much in the way of guidance. Each one manoeuvred to manipulate the shape of the post-war order to its maximum advantage. Britain and the other European colonial powers took the near-ending of hostilities as a signal to return to business as usual and to reconstruct their war-ravaged empires. Whether and to what extent they would be able to do that, however, would depend in large part on factors beyond their control. For a start, if the European powers thought the ideals of the United Nations were little more than convenient tokens to be traded in the crooked business of international relations, their subject peoples certainly expected them to be taken at face value. They were prepared to fight to see that they were taken seriously. But just as significantly, the ability of the European colonial powers to reassert control over their colonial possessions would also depend on the attitudes of the two new policemen on the block, neither of whom had much time for old-style imperialism.

So far, however, there was little indication that they would attempt to replace it with anything much better. Indeed, as their carve up of the Far East at the Yalta conference showed, they were both on the take. The people of the United States certainly had their own idealistic vision of post-war peace and prosperity, but the new international economic and political order that the post-war planners of the Roosevelt administration were intent on establishing had far less to do with reforming interfaith and inter-racial relationships than with making the world safe for their own brand of capitalist democracy. The fact that such an order would firmly cement the United States in a position of world dominance could be happily glossed over by giving an assurance that what was good for the United States was good for the world. But whether anyone else would agree was another matter. The fact that the Soviets had themselves given no indication that they would pursue a more radical agenda in the colonial territories of the European powers was itself reason for pause. It suggested that they may be more interested in consolidating their position against a possibly hostile capitalist world and that they might not take too kindly to playing second fiddle to anyone. This basically reflected resentment that after Western efforts to suppress their self-determination at the end of the First World War, it was they who had suffered worst when they agreed to stay in the war against Hitler instead of suing for an armistice and, in doing so, had deflected Hitler's war machine away from Britain and, potentially, also away from the United States at a critical stage.

But if anyone in April 1945 was in a position to demonstrate the fundamental importance of the problems of interfaith and inter-racial relations which the war had laid bare, they had little hope of making themselves heard. The new situation in Europe was already dominating the agenda. In the chaos and destruction in the wake of the advancing Allied armies the people of Europe were once again contemplating the future of their ruined homelands, and recovery was expected to be slow. For many, the impending victory celebrations would provide a welcome temporary distraction, while others could do little but wait with uncertainty on the whim of their new masters. The agreements made at Yalta had left the shape of the post-war settlement in Europe only vaguely defined, and there was much yet to settle. Apart from the arrangement of zones of occupation, no decision had yet been made about how Germany would be governed, or even if it would survive in one piece. The vexing issue of reparations which had proved so troubling after the First World War was also left up in the air, along with the divisive issue of Poland's western borders. To resolve such issues peacefully and constructively would obviously require a good deal of goodwill and cooperation among the victorious powers – at least as much as they had shown to each other during the war, and definitely more than they had shown before it.

To those in the know, however, the evidence was far from reassuring. The common purpose that had held the Grand Alliance together was now about to be removed, and indications were that the mutual goodwill that had been fostered between the populations of the Western Allies and the Soviet Union during the war was being rapidly squandered by their leaders as each side attempted to shape the political, social and economic complexion of the post-war settlement in accordance with their own perceived interests. Even before the UN meeting got underway cracks began to appear in the facade of unity that the Allies had strenuously tried to maintain during the war. They were centred on the region that had once been intended as 'living room' for the Third Reich, and which now provided the buffer zone between the Soviet Union and the West: Eastern Europe. But those cracks only hinted at what was beneath. The Great Powers were walking on shifting ground, and a wary tread would be needed if the deepening mistrust and rift was not to open into a chasm that could make Europe, and perhaps the world, a battleground once again.

Any hope for some sane and rational reflection on the fundamental problems of world peace was rapidly disappearing in the slipstream of world events. Nevertheless, in spite of the turbulence prior to the San Francisco conference, some reassessment of interfaith relations just could not be avoided. As the end of hostilities approached there was a brutal realization of the scale of the horror inflicted by the most systematic mass extermination program in human history. With that realization, the Jewish question finally came to a head. The liberation of the concentration camps provided immediate, irrefutable and overwhelming evidence of the terrible facts that the Allied powers had tried for so long to ignore or suppress. Backed by all the technology and precision of modern science and industry, carried out with all the efficiency of a modern bureaucratic state, and operated with a brutality inspired by zealous commitment to a fanatical racial ideology based on religious belief, by the end of the war Hitler's killing factories had accounted for the deaths of nearly 6 million Jews. That was more than half of Europe's 10 million strong pre-war Jewish population. In addition millions of Slavs, Gypsies, homosexuals and other assorted 'sub-humans' and enemies of the Nazi state of every European nationality had also been slaughtered.⁶

AN OPPORTUNITY TO BUILD ON

For a world so long lulled into ignorance and apathy, the grainy black and white newsreel footage and the agonized newspaper accounts which had been deliberately suppressed and then manipulated were a profoundly disturbing revelation. They sent shock waves of revulsion and shame reverberating through the complacent self-image of a supposedly Christian civilization. The issues of racism and anti-Semitism had been forced squarely onto the public agenda in a manner that simply could not be ignored or passed over. For the citizens of the Christian world, whether religious or not, Hitler's genocidal madness meant that they had to confront the barbarous evil of racist xenophobia, along with the undeniable fact that it existed at the very heart of their supposedly superior civilization. The heavy-handed lesson provided so obligingly by Nazi Germany was simple. The organized persecution and oppression of one group of people to satisfy the craze, greed or collective ego of another was no longer acceptable. History had shown that turning a blind eye and tolerating such evil allowed its insidious cancer to flourish and spread, with consequences that were tragically now no longer unimaginable.

Unfortunately, however, there were few indications that the lesson would be taken any further. Deprived of the facts behind the war and filled with the myths of its own wartime propaganda, it was too easy for the Western world to salve its wounded conscience by continuing to blame it all on one madman and the people that had followed him. "They" were the ones who had allowed it to happen, or so the reasoning went, and now "we" must be on guard lest it ever be allowed to happen here. Some deeper reflection on racist attitudes and beliefs was clearly necessary, but immediate responsibility could be placed elsewhere: partly in economic circumstances, partly in the things which had shaped German character perhaps, and certainly in the racist ideology of fascism. But the fact that the attitudes and actions of the Western Christian world as a whole, based on the church's selfunderstanding, had laid the basis for Hitler's genocidal madness and had allowed it to happen could, for the moment, be conveniently ignored. So could the wider implications of the parody of Mein Kampf. After all, everyone knew who the good guys were, and dwelling on the facts might just prove too complicating. There were empires to reclaim and a post-war order to construct. And even more disturbing for the longer term, there was a great ideological confrontation looming in which the facts might prove a distraction.

For Jews, on the other hand, the wider significance of Hitler's parody was as nothing in comparison to the immediate significance of the Holocaust, and they had little need to grapple with that. For them it simply represented the culmination of nearly 2000 years of bigotry, repression and persecution at the hands of their Christian neighbours, aided and abetted by the Christian churches and their allied states. In contrast to the Christian world, whatever soul-searching occurred in the Jewish community was sparked in some measure by an agonized sense that European Jewry, conditioned by centuries of abuse and persecution to accept its lot, had walked meekly to meet its fate. Others needed no such unwarranted self-recrimination to fuel their reaction. Living through the Holocaust, and the years of unheeded warnings which had preceded it – indeed, simply observing it all unfold – had forged a burning sense of rage and determination. Never again should Jews be forced to submit, meekly or otherwise, to the deadly whims of others, powerless to prevent the torture and slaughter of innocent men, women and children. Never again could Jews go undefended, and since the world had proved over and over again that it would not defend the Jews, they must be able to defend themselves.

To many more Jews it was now clear that the Zionists had been right all along. Jews must have a state of their own. It had to be a secure home in which they could not be forced to rely on anyone except themselves and themselves alone. It had to be a haven and stronghold for the entire world Jewish community. In the face of the evidence, the logic of the Zionist argument was now all but compelling, and with all other options apparently now exhausted, many more Jews were willing to fight more desperately than ever for that home upon which many Zionists had long insisted, and which the Biltmore program had made official policy – a Jewish state in Palestine.

Despite the Zionist movement's intense lobbying efforts during the war, it had proved impossible to gain ground while hostilities lasted. Now, with their ranks swelling, the barriers of the Third Reich at last broken, and the White Paper immigration quotas soon to reach their limits, they moved quickly to take advantage of the opportunities that the end of the war provided. Around the world supportive Jewish communities swung their political clout and financial resources behind the Zionist program, particularly in America, which had now become the focus of world Jewry, and the Zionist organizations began a full scale assault on the ramparts of western policy makers with two immediate aims in mind. They wanted representation for the Jewish Agency at San Francisco, and if possible, unrestricted immigration to Palestine. This was more important for the longer term.

Following the Zionist Congress at Montevideo in January, 1945, Zionist groups from a number of American republics wrote to Roosevelt urging both objectives, while Rabbi Wise of the American Zionist Emergency Council also wrote to Stettinius. At a meeting with Truman on April 20 he voiced angry criticism at Stettinius' failure to reply. Whether stung by Wise's criticism, motivated by Congressional pressure, or persuaded by eighty eight rallies in support of a Jewish Commonwealth sponsored by the American Jewish Congress and the American Jewish Committee (the largest drew 60,000 people) Stettinius forwarded the names of those two organizations to be invited as consultants to the UN conference. A petition was organized demanding that Weizmann represent the Jewish people at the Conference, and the New Zionist organization publicized a declaration signed by 12 US senators urging that Palestine be proclaimed a Jewish state and that Jewish delegates be invited to join UN members at the Security Council. Then, in addition to the two official 'consultant' bodies, twenty four organizations in the United States sent delegations to the conference.⁷

It might not have been the result that the Zionists hoped for, but it was a start, and, at that time, an important factor had not come fully into play. In launching their public relations and political assault, Zionists now had a weapon that they had never before been in a position to exploit. It could prove decisive in the coming battle. It was western public opinion. As Zionist leaders had hoped and expected, public exposure of details of the Holocaust had led to widespread public sympathy for the Jews. It was only a short step for that sympathy to be translated into sympathy for the Zionist cause.

To quell its uneasy and unfocussed sense of guilt the Western world was ready to offer some kind of atonement for the suffering that had been inflicted. Unfortunately, however, it was just as ready to accept a solution to the Jewish question that would enable people to avoid being forced to identify the attitudes and actions which had led to Hitler's actions in the first place. Immigration to Palestine meant that there would be less Jewish 'Displaced Persons' to be relocated and assimilated elsewhere or resettled in their former homelands. With only a little readjustment to a map, the cost of recompense for the Holocaust could simply be foisted on someone else. Regardless of guilt-induced sympathy for them, did anyone want an influx of those European Jews, with all the tension and opposition that it would inevitably lead to? Why stir up problems about anti-Semitism and immigration laws at home when they could go somewhere else? It was much easier to let a few Muslim Arabs give up a bit of land. They had plenty of it, and as the Zionists said, the Bible showed that it belonged to the Jews anyway, or so the reasoning went.

For the Zionist movement, however, there was little incentive to question such motives. Allowing DP's to emigrate to the West would only lessen the need for them to go to Palestine. And to make the most of Western public opinion would obviously require more than sympathy and a good excuse. It also required a united front. Presenting Palestine as the sole solution desired by the Jewish community would advance the credibility of Zionist claims enormously. Already a good beginning had been made. Support had grown, and feeling was strong, whatever other reasons complicated the picture, that the Zionist cause was just. Even among those who did not wish to emigrate from war ravaged Europe an independent Jewish state seemed fair restitution and, for the Diaspora communities outside Europe in particular, a symbol embodying the pride and aspirations of the world Jewish community in the face of tragedy and disaster. Nevertheless, despite the effects of the Holocaust, the Zionist program was still not universally supported among Jews. There were still significant streams of non-Zionist and anti-Zionist Jews, but their numbers were small and they could be largely ignored or 'worked on' to support the cause. But even among those survivors for whom the prospect of rebuilding their lives and communities among the bitter ashes of the Holocaust was unthinkable, many still preferred destinations other than Palestine. They would have to be convinced.

The crucial task for Zionist leaders was to convince the world, or at least those who made the decisions on its behalf, that there was no option, and that would still be an uphill task. For a start, Britain still controlled the mandate, and support from their old ally Churchill, while it still existed, had cooled. There was also the British Labour Party, but they were still in opposition and their credentials were yet to be tested. History had provided enough lessons to be suspicious of easy promises. In particular, the White Paper had demonstrated that when it came to the crunch, the British preferred Empire, oil and Arabs before Zionism, and there was no sign that it was about to give up the imperial ambitions for which control of the region, its canal and its oil had provided the key. On the contrary, the significance of the Middle East's oil reserves had increased. Not only was it still a crucial strategic resource, made even more so by the rapid advance into the mechanical age fostered by the war, it had now become a vital factor in the economic post-war reconstruction of Europe.

In addition, the new strategic balance resulting from the war placed the future of the region in a state of uncertainty which would certainly mitigate against any hasty decisions. Any hope that the US could be made to pressure Britain had to take account of the fact that the US had clearly signalled its intention to become the new mistress of the Middle East. Roosevelt had already committed the US to a policy of 'consultation' with the Arabs. The Soviet Union was sitting astride the frontiers of the Persian oil fields with its troops occupying northern Iran, and it was already on record as opposing Zionism, and after the trauma of the inter-war period the British position on Palestine was not likely to be decisively moulded by the fate of a few million homeless Jews. The creation of the Arab League and the Alexandria protocol meant that the Arab world was publicly committed to fight if necessary for the historical claims of the Arab Palestinians, and in the context of competition for control of the region, offending the Arabs was not something any of the competitors could really afford to do. Beyond that – if the Zionists ever got that far – the Atlantic Charter's espousal of the principle of self-determination, to be written into the United Nations Charter, meant that the creation of a new state in Palestine would demand the consent of its Arab majority, and there was certainly no sign that they were about to give that.

Indeed, for the great powers the Middle East was itself only one part, albeit a very big part, of a much larger stage, and for the politicians and postwar planners facing the problems of the post-war world, the question of a Jewish state must have appeared as little more than a frustrating sideshow. Within a few decades there would be more than enough evidence to dispute such an assessment, but by then, to the terrible detriment of international and inter-communal relationships, the issues at the heart of the matter would have become obscured in the ideological haze of a geopolitical conflict fought to the brink of apocalypse. Ultimately the development of that confrontation would become a major factor in preventing the deeper reflection that was required to grapple with the problems that had been raised. For the most part honesty and recognition of the facts of history would be forsaken. The lessons of the war would be left largely unheeded. Hitler would remain little more than a convenient scapegoat, an aberration, his memory merely a stick to beat down the ugly head of racism whenever it threatened to appear or, just as unfortunately, to beat it up when it served a convenient political purpose.

TAKING STOCK IN EUROPE

For the moment, however, as the world prepared for the UN conference, war still raged and the Big Three intensified their backstage showdown over Poland, attention was almost entirely occupied by other matters. For Britain, winning the war which had been fought to save its empire had not solved its dilemma. The direct threat to its imperial position had been beaten off, only to be replaced by an indirect one of equal proportions. Its financial position was shattered, and it had lost its former position of influence in world affairs. One quarter of its total pre-war wealth was gone, foreign debt had increased by a factor of five, and it had been forced to liquidate half of its foreign investments, reducing its foreign earnings substantially. Its exports had been slashed by half, and its imports had risen by half.⁸ The bulk of its merchant fleet lay at the bottom of the ocean, its cities were devastated, and what remained of industry was worn down and largely geared to war-time production. In the face of the pressing financial and psychological needs of reconstruction, sharpened by a desire to reassert a semblance of power with which to compete with that of the Soviet Union and the United States, a return of colonial possessions and the profitability of empire thus seemed all the more vital. India was already lost, along with Transjordan – the promise of independence being the price of their continued wartime support – and there was little desire to let the rest slip away.

However, any attempt to simply reassert control over the remainder would inevitably incur military and political costs, and in the financial climate that had resulted from the war such costs were something that Britain could ill afford. As with the other European colonial powers, imperial rule in Asia and the Middle East was under direct challenge from the nationalist independence movements which had taken firm root as a consequence of the war. In Asia in particular, where expectations of Asia's control of its own affairs had been raised by the early Japanese success and then cruelly dashed, the indigenous populations were not keen to get rid of one overlord only to see another return. The Arab world had also demonstrated its desire to assert its unity and independence through the establishment of the Arab League. Complicating the situation were the serious ethnic divisions which threatened a series of explosions from within. Apart from Palestine with its Muslim-Jewish-Christian mix, there were deep tensions between the Hindu and Muslim communities in India; between the Chinese, Indians and Malays in Malaya; and between Burmese and Karens in Burma. None of these situations offered the prospect of easy and peaceful resolution.

But Britain's imperial position was under further challenge. On top of the pressure from the US and Russia in the Middle East, there was also the problem of maintaining access to Suez. Egypt had signalled a desire for a renegotiation of existing treaties, and the Soviet's desire to exercise more control over the Dardanelles Straits was now evidence in British minds that they may be intent on muscling Britain out of the Mediterranean. The task of propping up Britain's puppet regime in Greece against its communist and leftist opponents had already demanded large military and financial resources, and there was little chance that the situation would improve. With the Soviets now in control of much of Britain's former sphere of influence in the Balkans, and communist influence firmly cemented in neighbouring Albania and Yugoslavia, much would depend on the outcome of Churchill's October 1944 conference and agreement with Stalin.

RUSSIA'S NEED FOR A BUFFER

But Soviet control of much of Central and Eastern Europe which resulted directly from Western insistence on keeping the war going, had brought problems of its own. Quite apart from the future of Britain's political and economic interests in the region, the Soviet Union's behaviour in consolidating its influence in eastern Europe, and in keeping western influence out, was raising alarm. Europe's security – and thus Britain's – was at stake. Soviet intentions for the future were unknown, and as yet no firm settlement had been reached, most crucially on the key question of Germany. For Churchill, convinced of Soviet designs to dominate post-war Europe, the need to meet the Soviets as far east as possible and to reach a settlement before "the armies of democracy melted" was now, in the dying days of the war, vital.⁹

For the Soviets, however, the shape of the settlement in Europe was no less important, and whatever Britain's grounds for concern at their ultimate intentions, their brutal imperialist stance towards Eastern Europe and their policy towards Germany equally reflected concerns of their own. Unlike Britain, the Soviet Union had been invaded by Germany twice – with the catastrophic Allied intervention after the first attempt – and the second attempt had come within a hair's breadth of succeeding. It had also left the Soviet Union even more physically and economically devastated than Britain.¹⁰ Another invasion simply could not be allowed to occur. Russia needed a buffer zone as much as it ever had.

In Stalin's mind, however, Germany would soon be in a position to try it again. As he warned his fellow European Communists in April 1945, Germany will recover, and very quickly... Give them twelve to fifteen years and they'll be on their feet again.'¹¹ From Stalin's point of view, Germany's potential to wage war in the future thus had to be minimized, and if that could be achieved in part by extracting vast sums in reparations which would at the same time help the Soviet economy recover, then so much the better. As for Germany's borders, the more Poland was shifted westward, the more space that would put between Germany and the Soviet Union, and whatever Britain's concerns, the fact that Soviet troops were already on the ground meant there was little, short of war that Britain could do about it. It was certainly not a case for another venture of the 1917 type.

But just as important as a land buffer was the need for a political buffer. The 'cordon sanitaire' which had been erected against the Soviet Union after World War I had been the conduit for the German invasion, as well as a source of German resources and raw materials which the Soviets now needed to reconstruct. It was thus equally vital in Soviet minds to ensure that the countries of Eastern Europe maintained a 'friendly attitude' so as to provide both a security buffer and the economic benefits of trade and resource extraction. In effect, the cordon sanitaire which, in between the wars, had become a "hotbed of anti-Soviet unrest"¹² had to be reversed, or as Stalin put it somewhat euphemistically to his European communist comrades in April 1945, there must be "unity of the Slavs" – by fair means or foul. "If the unity of the Slavs exists," Stalin declared, "no one will dare move a finger."¹³

However, as Stalin's injunction showed, the German question was by no means the only one occupying the minds of the Soviet leadership as it assumed an imperialist stance towards Eastern Europe. Hanging like a dark cloud over considerations of post-war peace were bitter memories of Western anti-Soviet policy since 1917.¹⁴ Despite their wartime cooperation, the Soviet leadership's views on the trustworthiness of the West had changed little. For one thing, the experience of western anti-bolshevism was still all too fresh.¹⁵ In 1917 the West had poured in thousands of troops against the new and unstable regime. It had refused to cooperate in the 30's, and in 1938 had tried to turn Hitler against Stalin. During the war itself, the opening of the second front had been delayed for more than two years, while the Red Army and the Russians bore the brunt of Nazi aggression and Stalin attempted a deal with Germany – with or without Hitler – in fear that the West would attempt to do the same.¹⁶ In 1945, despite the war-time cooperation of the western powers, there was no guarantee that the Western Powers would not, sooner or later, take up where they had left off. Perhaps it would be sooner rather than later. After all, the Alliance itself had been a matter of convenience, reinforced by the fact that one of its leaders, Churchill, had been a prime mover in the pre-war anti-Bolshevik crusade. The fact that he had changed his stripes once only suggested that he was capable of doing it again. Similarly, many Americans, particularly on the right, saw the Soviet Union as the epitome of evil, in contrast to their own God-fearing country which was the embodiment of all that was progressive in the world. That attitude was reinforced and made more dangerous by the knowledge that the US was now without rival in might, which, as Stalin well knew, was a position soon to be backed up with the deceitful and supposedly secret exclusive control of the atomic bomb.

Underlining the situation dramatically was the contrast between American strength and the pitiful condition in which the war was leaving the Soviet Union. Another war was simply out of the question. What the Soviet Union needed was a period of consolidation. That need was made doubly imperative for the Communist Party in order to repair the damage the war had caused to the Soviet system of government. To deal with that, Stalin would soon have the propaganda machine working overtime, along with the labour camps. German occupation had undermined or destroyed Soviet authority, particularly in the non-White Russian regions. The general population expected improvements in living conditions, increases in personal freedoms, and rights to political consultation as a reward for wartime sacrifices. The mass of people were living in grim conditions, with severe rationing of food, clothing and housing, and working long hours. During the war the government had found it necessary to re-emphasize in propaganda programs the pre-Revolutionary traditions of the Russian people as well as to grant greater freedom to the Orthodox Church. By the end of the war, however, more direct methods were deemed necessary. The system of penal and forced labour camps was extended to the point where 10 million Soviet citizens were permanently interned. Special attention was given to the Red Army which had been exposed to 'corrupting influences' in central Europe and which had grown too rapidly for Stalin to impose rigid political control. Likewise, whole population groups from territories occupied by the Germans were interned. The Communist party was mobilized against army leaders and industrial managers whose power and prestige had been increased as a consequence of the war, while special schools were opened to teach Stalin's doctrines. The figure of 'Mother Russia', which had provided the basis for wartime propaganda, gave way to 'Glorious Stalin.'¹⁷

So with the future of East-West relations in doubt, during 1945 the Soviets proceeded to act unilaterally on the basis of the most favorable possible interpretations of the Yalta agreements. The reins were quickly tightened on Rumania, Bulgaria and Poland. In Germany the process of 'democratic transformation' of the Soviet zone was started as soon as possible. Stalin made it known that he no longer intended the division of Germany, and beginnings were made on the denazification of the administration, land reform, the expropriation of capitalist assets and the removal to the Soviet Union of large amounts of materials as war booty and reparations. Once again, the local Communist Party, returning out of exile with the Red Army, was placed at the forefront of the process.¹⁸

But for the Western Allies, contemplating Soviet behaviour in early 1945, the great irony was that they themselves had handed the Soviets the capacity to do as they pleased in Eastern Europe because of the way they had conducted the war against Hitler. However that did not mean that the Soviets were intending to export their communist system, as many in the West increasingly feared. Full sovietization would require revolutionary change and would inevitably provoke a western backlash, and the situation prevailing at the end of the war meant that their actions of necessity had to be limited by the need to coexist with the West. Indeed, analyses prepared by the Soviet Academy of Sciences suggested that international capitalism would continue under American leadership for a very long time. On the other hand, however, the growth of American power relative to war-torn Europe would inevitably lead to a world-wide concentration of capitalist power in American hands which would strengthen anti-Soviet forces, most crucially in those areas such as eastern Europe which bordered the Soviet Union.¹⁹

Short of sovietization, therefore, the decisive requirement on the border regions was a friendly attitude guaranteed by internal social and political 'restructuring', and where the existing political forces proved less than amenable to a sharp leftward political swing, the presence of the Red Army – and the NKVD – were brutally guaranteeing the results that the Soviets were looking for. At the same time, however, given the impossibility of world-wide communist revolution, the existing capitalist order in the primary sphere of likely American economic expansion – namely Western and Southern Europe and China – had to be stabilized against the spread of American imperialist influence, even if that meant sacrificing the immediate development of the local socialist movements to the local national capitalists.²⁰ Thus, rather than pursuing international revolution the Soviets in effect aimed to divide the world into spheres of influence – with the American influence in its own sphere minimized, Soviet influence maximized, and a neutered Germany in the middle.

With regard to the American sphere of influence, the first signal had been sent in 1943 with the disbanding of the Comintern. More concrete steps had been taken at Yalta, where Stalin had given Roosevelt an assurance that he would deal with Chiang Kai-shek, rather than Mao Tse-tung, in return for territorial concessions and a promise to enter the war against Japan.²¹ Most dramatic, however, had been the cooperative behaviour of the Communist parties of Western Europe, whose major role in the resistance and in liberation had made it necessary to allow them substantial places in the post-liberation coalition governments. Not only had they actively aided the Allied forces in re-establishing government control, they had independently held back from revolutionary policies and favoured a parliamentary path to power. In France, for example, the Communist led resistance was estimated by Eisenhower to have been worth an extra 15 divisions during operation 'Overlord' – larger than De Gaulle's own forces. Their subsequent cooperation with De Gaulle, who had raced to Paris to prevent the possibility of a communist led liberation of the city, had actually enabled him to act to reestablish the powers of a centralized state. Similarly, in Belgium, intervention by Communist leaders in late 1944 prevented a possible revolution being put down by the British with bloodshed after a tense stand-off between the resistance and the occupation powers over the return of the unpopular exiled government had reached the point of revolutionary anarchy and a general strike.²² No doubt the fact of Allied military supremacy made immediate revolution impossible, but with Moscow's blessing they had thrown themselves wholeheartedly into the process of national capitalist reconstruction, often in the face of opposition from their grassroots members.

But even in the Soviet sphere of influence the full treatment was by no means inevitable. Soviet interference in Finland following the armistice had been kept to a minimum, and by late 1944 genuinely democratic elections had already been held. In part that was because the Finns had twice fought the Soviets to a standstill during the war, but just as important was the fact that the Paasikivi government had demonstrated sufficient sympathy to allay Soviet security concerns.²³

In Czechoslovakia the issues were more clear cut. As leader of the London exile government, President Benes had, after Teheran, clearly seen the writing on the wall, and instead of fighting the inevitable he had resolved to make a virtue of the new strategic situation brought about by the war. Wanting a decisive share in determining his country's post-war future he turned to Czechoslovakia's eastern neighbour, convinced that a sympathetic and cooperative attitude towards the Soviets could win for his country what the disaster of Munich had shown the western powers were not able to provide – independence and security.

In December 1943, before the Red Army crossed into Czechoslovakia, Benes had signed a treaty of Friendship, Alliance and Mutual Assistance with the Soviet Union, under which Czechoslovakia agreed not to enter into any anti-Russian blocs in Europe and allowed the Soviets to be Czechoslovakia's sole protective power. As a further indication of his good-will, Benes expressed his intention to proceed with nationalizations, and agreed that one fifth of seats in a new provisional government should go to the Communists, whose support had grown substantially during the war from a pre-war electoral base of ten per cent. In return, Benes privately gained Stalin's commitment to non-interference in Czechoslovakia's internal affairs.²⁴

For his part, Stalin was as good as his word. As the eminent Cold War historian Wilfried Loth has remarked, 'Benes in general proved himself to be such a stalwart supporter of Soviet interests that Stalin did not even remotely consider replacing his government with a satellite regime.'²⁵ Indeed, due to Benes over enthusiasm – or perhaps negligence – the communists got a greater share of power than perhaps even Stalin expected. In final discussions with the Communists in Moscow following the Yalta conference in March 1945, on the eve of Czechoslovakia's liberation, almost one third of cabinet posts went their way. For Britain and the United States, however, who had thought that Benes' policy would result in Czechoslovakia falling into the Soviet orbit, that now seemed like evidence that their worst fears were being fulfilled. Neither country had supported the treaty, despite the fact that Benes had offered to sign an identical one with the British, and neither had taken up his offer to sign civil affairs treaties on the eve of the Soviet advance into Czech territory.²⁶ Nevertheless, despite their fears, Benes' strategy had worked. A basic consensus was forged and a fragile basis for genuine democracy had been retained, along with independence. Tragically, it would avail his country nothing.

Benes' aims were wider than securing the immediate future of Czechoslovakia, however. Munich had occurred, he thought, because the West feared Russia more than it hated Germany, and unless the mutual hostility was bridged, the disaster would be repeated. Czechoslovakia's role was to be that bridge.²⁷ So far, despite Roosevelt's desire for cooperation with the Soviets and Churchill's October 1944 'percentages' agreement, there was little indication that the West was willing to meet it half way. They preferred bridges of their own design – if bridges were to be built at all.

Neither was it apparent that the other eastern European nations could learn from the Czechoslovakian example, as Benes had also hoped. Nations wishing to avoid the full force of the Soviet heel did not even have to venture as far as Czechoslovakia. Even in formerly fascist Hungary the Soviets had kept the pressure to a comparative minimum, allowing the formation of a four party coalition government under the leadership of Horthyite General Bela Miklos which promised strong social and economic reforms but guaranteed private property and trade.²⁸ Elsewhere, however, anti-Bolshevik sentiment ran too deep. It was fostered to fever pitch in no small part by the Christian churches, but it was compounded in Poland in particular by historically entrenched anti-Russian sentiment. The Soviets had actually bitterly reinforced this by their brutal attempts to counter or circumvent it with the Katyn massacre subsequent to the Warsaw uprising. Rationality and the spirit of cautious compromise had long been abandoned in much of the region, if it ever existed, and Poland, Rumania and Bulgaria were suffering the worst consequences as a result.

Nevertheless, in the inevitable cycle of action and reaction, such actions also had consequences, and by the closing weeks of the war, mistrust and uncertainty on both sides gave way to outright suspicion and confrontation. The conference at Yalta, publicly trumpeted as a triumph for post-war cooperation between the Allies, had in reality been nothing of the sort. If anything it had merely papered over deep differences.

However, the Soviets' position at the end of the war meant that those differences were now a permanent factor in international affairs, and their brutal control of Eastern Europe was not going to be dealt with overnight. Doing that meant first overcoming the Soviets' deep seated suspicions, which had been made quite clear by their accusations that the Western powers were attempting to negotiate a mild peace with Germany. But overcoming those suspicions completely would require great strength and foresight and a willingness to identify long-term national interests with those of the human race as a whole. Short-term material and political self-interest had to be forgone so as to allow the truth of benign intentions and real human interest to emerge, and real morality to assert itself to act as the judge of international behaviour.

The conduct of the Christian West had shown that this was never going to happen and the world had just gone to war to prove it. The best that people could hope for was a period of peaceful co-existence between rivals which would open a space for some rational reflection on the state of human affairs. That then might allow whatever truths were contained in various conflicting ideologies to be demonstrated in the long term one way or another by their success or failure in meeting the real needs and interests of all human beings – an approach surely suited to the nations of the West which were supposedly pluralistic and tolerant. But just what the immediate result would be now rested with the Western powers, and the United States in particular. Their response would largely determine how quickly the widening breach could be bridged – if it could be bridged at all.

But if British experience was any indication of American attitudes to ‘cooperation’ then the future of East-West relations was looking anything but rosy. As Britain’s leaders well knew, their ‘Atlantic cousins’ had plans of their own. In stark contrast to both Britain and the Soviet Union, the United States had emerged from the war as an economic and military powerhouse. Where Roosevelt’s New Deal had failed to shake off the depression, war production and the flood of refugees with their technology and research skills had succeeded with spectacular results. Long before the war ended it was clear that Britain was going to have to rely heavily on the United States for post-war assistance. But as the wartime experience of bargaining over Lend-Lease and the Atlantic Charter testified, the US was definitely not going to extend a helping hand simply in recognition of sacrifices that had made for the common war effort. And with its anti-Communist legions growing in force, neither was it likely to let the Soviets get in the way of its plans for the post-war order, despite Roosevelt’s personal attempts to assure cooperation. Haunted by the spectre of depression, and shaken out of its isolationist slumber by an unprecedented war which was widely seen as the result of these things the self-styled New Israel was intent on remodelling the world so that none of it would be allowed to happen again.

A “GET TOUGH” ATTITUDE: THE SAGA OF A-BOMB CONTROL

In the days immediately before the UN conference the confrontation between the Russia and the United States over Poland entered a dramatic new phase. The task of leading America into the new peace had fallen to the new president Harry Truman, who immediately pledged to continue Roosevelt’s policies. Previously excluded from foreign policy matters and, by his own admission, without much knowledge, it was about all he could do. His first act had thus been to declare that the San Francisco conference would go ahead as scheduled, resisting British suggestions that it be postponed until after the Polish dispute was resolved, and calming fears that Roosevelt’s death would weaken US commitment to the international organization.²⁹ Within days, in concert with Churchill, he then sent to Stalin a joint response (previously prepared by the State Department) rejecting Stalin’s offer of April 9 and demanding that the London Poles be consulted on the composition of the future government of Poland.³⁰

However, the simple fact was that for the Soviets, discussions which included the London Poles on equal terms were anathema. Historian Daniel Yergin has noted that even they would have had to agree with Molotov's characterization of them as "secretly an enemy."³¹ Nevertheless, in a series of meetings in the second half of April, with the conflict over Poland casting its shadow over the San Francisco conference, Truman and his top advisers attempted to determine a further course of action. Insecure in his new job and jealous of his presidential powers, Truman was determined to be firm and decisive. But in doing that he was reliant on advice, and that advice was to be tough.³²

At a meeting with Truman on April 20, US Ambassador to Moscow Averell Harriman repeated his new analysis of Soviet expansionist intentions in slightly more colourful language. In effect, what the United States was faced with, he said, was a 'barbarian invasion of Europe.' The Soviets weren't just establishing a sphere of influence, they were extending the Soviet system and taking what amounted to totalitarian control in satellite countries. However, they were weak and economically backward. They needed US assistance and were afraid of facing a united West, and thus could be made to yield if the situation was handled correctly.³³ Truman agreed: "The Soviets need us more than we need them", and if the US could not get 100 per cent of what it wanted on important matters, it should be able to get 85 per cent.³⁴

Truman's 'get tough' attitude was no doubt reinforced when rumours that the Soviets were about to conclude Treaty of Friendship and Mutual Assistance with the Lublin government against American and British wishes were proved true the next day, effectively granting Soviet legal recognition to the Provisional Government and its unilateral westward shift of Poland's borders. The announcement only raised the tension a further notch.³⁵ In the meantime, however, Molotov had arrived in the US for the San Francisco meeting, and at an impromptu meeting of advisers on April 23, immediately prior to a scheduled meeting with the Soviet Foreign Minister, Truman rehearsed the gung-ho attitude he would take with Molotov. Agreements with the Soviets had so far been a one-way street and this could not continue – it was now or never. If the Russians didn't want to join the US in their plans for San Francisco they could go to hell. Most of the others present agreed with the two-fisted approach.³⁶

Secretary of War Stimson, however, did not. Neither an advocate of the UN or of America's global involvement, he was one of the few who saw an analogy between the Monroe Doctrine and the Soviet desire for a security sphere. In his view, as he later wrote in his diary, it was State Department clumsiness and the United States emphasis on "altruism" and "humanitarianism" rather than on "stark realities" which had caused the crisis. He might as well have called it hypocrisy – after all, the United States would hardly have tolerated the creation of a potentially hostile government across its own borders. But none of that was said. Stimson instead reminded his audience that in major military matters the Soviets had always kept their word – even gone beyond it – and that free elections in Poland were unlikely anyway. Poland was too big an issue to confront the Soviets on. The Soviets, perhaps, were being more realistic than the US about their security concerns, and rather than running the risk of antagonizing them with undiplomatic language it would be better to proceed with caution.³⁷

Stimson's suggestion fell on deaf ears. The only other opposition came from General Marshall, who feared that antagonizing the Russians might delay their entry into the Pacific war "until we had done all the dirty work."³⁸ However, the strength of that objection was quickly diluted by Truman's other military advisors. Joint Chiefs of Staff planners had already concluded that, though it would be valuable, early Russian entry into the war to divide the Japanese forces was no longer necessary to make the invasion of Japan feasible.³⁹

Fortified by the near unanimous advice, and confident of his position of strength, Truman let the Russian have it with both barrels at his meeting with Molotov soon afterward. After bluntly insisting that the Soviets carry out the Yalta agreement, he then flexed America's economic muscle as Harriman had advocated. The US, he told Molotov, intended to proceed with the San Francisco conference regardless, but American economic assistance depended on Soviet cooperation on other matters of mutual interest. "No policy in the United States, foreign or domestic, could succeed unless it had public support", Molotov was informed, and he hoped the Soviet Government would "keep this in mind." Molotov's attempts to respond were sharply rebuffed: an agreement had been reached, and Stalin ought to carry it out. Then when Molotov protested that: "I have never been talked to in that way in my life," Truman is reported to have said: "Carry out your agreements and you won't get talked to like that."⁴⁰ If anyone had planned to cause a bad impression of the new President in the eyes of the Soviets, they could hardly have done a better job.

The next day, Stalin delivered a message in language only slightly more diplomatic than Truman's. It was, in his view, American and British demands that were contrary to the Yalta agreement, and those demands suggested that Britain and the United States did not want to see a government in Poland friendly to the Soviet Union. However, unlike her allies, the Soviet Union shared a border with Poland, and could not agree to the existence in Poland of a government hostile toward it. Moreover, the Soviet Union was not consulted over the establishment of governments in Belgium and Greece, and it laid no claims to interference "as it understands the whole importance of Belgium and Greece for the security of Great Britain." Why, then, could the United States and Britain not take into account Soviet security concerns in regard to Poland? In closing, however, Stalin did something that none of the tough-talking Americans had expected. He reaffirmed his willingness to do everything possible to achieve a settlement, but made it clear that such a settlement had to be in line with Soviet interests. In his view, the only way out was to accept the Yugoslav precedent as a model for Poland.⁴¹

Contrary to American expectations, Stalin had shown that the Soviets would neither buckle nor break. But if Stalin's response had given Truman something to think about, it wasn't the only thing that did. At a meeting the next day – the day that San Francisco opened – Stimson, in the company of the Manhattan Project's director General Groves, gave the new President his first formal briefing on the atomic bomb. Surprisingly, though many of those around him knew of the bomb's existence, Truman as yet had not been officially informed. It was certainly a significant factor in Stimson's thinking and, no doubt for other advisers also. The Secretary of War had for some time been giving consideration to the implications of the new weapon in regard to both the end of war and the post-war peace, and such thoughts had also been uppermost in his mind in advocating a cautious approach to the Soviets.

In contrast to Roosevelt's policy of exclusive Anglo-American control which had been set out in the secret Quebec agreement with Churchill of September 1944, Stimson believed that international cooperation on atomic energy was vital to the stability and peace of the post-war world. The agreement was so secret that even he, the secretary for war, was not aware of it although he had suspected its existence. He and other officials of like mind had tried repeatedly early 1945 to engage Roosevelt on the issue, but to no avail.⁴² With Roosevelt's death, however, the opportunity arose to push the cooperative line to Truman.

Before Stimson presented his case, however, Groves read from a twenty-four page memorandum summarizing progress on the Manhattan Project and the Murray Hill Area. He stressed two important points. First, a deliverable bomb was all but assured, and would be ready for testing some time that summer. Second, the United States and Britain together had virtually cornered the world's known market of fissionable materials, thereby ensuring that atomic bombs would not be available to any other country for the duration of the war and for an indefinite period beyond.⁴³ Stimson then read out his memorandum, the thrust of which was, on the surface at least, diametrically opposed to the aims represented by the Murray Hill Area. He firmly stated his appreciation of the enormous historical implications of the new weapon, outlined the possibility of an atomic arms race and the dangers of atomic war, and argued for some form of international cooperation in the field of atomic energy if the United Nations Organization was to work. Despite personal attempts by atomic physicist Neils Bohr to encourage Churchill and Roosevelt to adopt a policy of disclosure and cooperation with the Soviets in 1944 and early 1945, and similar attempts by Chairman of the US National Defence Research Committee, Vannevar Bush, to have Roosevelt include a section in the UN charter dealing with international scientific research, no dents had been made in the policy of exclusive Anglo-American control. The closest Roosevelt had come to overturning the policy of secrecy was immediately following Yalta, when fears that French scientists working in the Canadian section on the Manhattan project would leak information to a French colleague. However, Roosevelt's casual suggestion that the Soviets be informed on the grounds that De Gaulle might do so first was quickly squashed by Churchill.⁴⁴

It was clear to Stimson that world peace and the future of civilization itself were at stake. "If the problem of the proper use of this weapon can be solved", he wrote, "we would have the opportunity to bring the world into a pattern in which the peace of the world and our civilization can be saved." It was the importance of cooperation on atomic energy which had underlaid his earlier advice for caution in dealing with the Polish question. Though the memorandum didn't explicitly say it, it seemed to Stimson that antagonizing the Soviets with an overtly confrontational approach would seriously undermine such a possibility.⁴⁵ Unfortunately, however, he did not question the assumption that the bomb should or would be used – indeed, given the context of total war, that had never been seriously questioned by anybody. But more significantly, despite his apparent understanding of what was at stake, neither did he argue that the aims of the Murray Hill Area were inconsistent with cooperation on atomic energy, or that an approach to the Soviets on international cooperation should be attempted before the weapon was used in the war. Instead, a more circumspect approach was crystallizing in his mind.

Towards the end of 1944 Stimson had formed the view that cooperation should not be offered to the Soviets until after the weapon had been demonstrated and the Soviets had in return demonstrated that they were worthy of being trusted. Uppermost in his mind had been genuine concerns about getting the Soviet Union as a secretive police state to comply with international inspection controls.⁴⁶ However, the hope that the Soviets might make domestic liberalizing concessions had faded, but the desire to find some way of adding the bomb to the United States' diplomatic arsenal had not. In effect, Stimson still wanted to use the offer of shared control of the bomb as a diplomatic weapon to extract some form of "quid pro quo", and for all his apparent sensitivity to Soviet security concerns, he was blind as anyone else to the fact that the Soviets might well consider that a threat – particularly if its first use in war was unilateral and unannounced.

Whether his plans were relayed to Truman at that initial meeting is not known, though that is unimportant. What is important is that in the following weeks Stimson certainly had opportunity to do so. By that time, as Soviet entry into the Pacific war became imminent, plenty of reasons could be found to support the plan of action he advocated – along with some enthusiastic boosters even more eager to let the Soviets know just who was boss. Many of those boosters in fact found themselves on the Interim Committee set up by Stimson and Truman to formulate official policy on atomic issues.

Indeed, for all the rhetoric displayed by Stimson and others about the desire to use the new weapon for the benefit of mankind as a whole, it was virtually inevitable that they would attempt to use it in a fashion that best served American interests. Of course, it could be said in their defense that whatever other reasons of self-interest motivated them, they really had the world's interests at heart – indeed, they had more or less come to assume that what was best for America was best for the world. But that defence only underscores the fact of their enormous arrogance, and no doubt the arrogance of the Western Christian civilization of which they were a vital part. (Indeed, one is led to wonder what exactly motivated Stimson when he cautioned in his memorandum to Truman that the fate of 'our civilization' was at stake.) But whatever the motivations of America's leaders, what is most disturbing is that for all their apparent awareness of the immense historical significance of the weapon they were about to unleash on an unsuspecting world, their unquestioning arrogance was so complete it never occurred to them for a moment to doubt their absolute right to use it in a unilateral attempt to shape the destiny of the entire world into a pattern of their own choosing.

So, on the same day. Stimson met with Truman on the atomic bomb; Stalin sent his telegram to Truman on Poland, and the conference which was intended to rid the world of the scourge of war and usher in a new era in international cooperation proceeded as planned – without the Polish government. Conference delegates were unaware that a weapon would soon be available with the potential to completely change forever the basis of world affairs. On that same day US and Soviet troops were exchanging warm greetings as they met for the first time on the Elbe River. Unknown to the front line troops, however, the potent symbolism of their friendly exchanges was being undermined, and the good-will that was expressed on the front line in Europe found little reflection at the peace meeting in the San Francisco Opera House. The tensions that had been bubbling hotly behind the scenes suddenly became public.

Almost before the welcoming speeches were over a battle for prestige erupted between East and West. In line with an earlier Soviet request that the presidency should be held in rotation by each of the four sponsoring powers, Molotov immediately objected to Stettinius remaining in the chair for the whole meeting.⁴⁷ No sooner had that matter been settled when the decorum of proceedings was further marred by an ugly procedural debate over who was to participate. As was inevitable, the Soviets demanded the admission of representatives from the Lublin government. After a few days of angry debate the demands were dropped, and Molotov accepted a Belgian sponsored compromise which made provision for delegates from a Polish government reorganized under the Yalta agreement to attend before the Conference adjourned. However, Soviet demands to have Byelorussia and the Ukraine immediately admitted as participants were then blocked by Latin American countries under American tutelage demanding the participation of Peron's pro-fascist Argentina, which the Soviets then attempted to link with the admission of Poland. After days of fruitless and hostile argument, it was eventually agreed that Argentina and the two Soviet republics could attend – but not Poland.⁴⁸ It was not an auspicious start.

On April 30, the day of Hitler's death, Stettinius informed Truman that discussions on the composition of the Polish government at the San Francisco conference had reached an impasse.⁴⁹ The mood was not lifted when on May 4 Molotov confirmed that the Polish underground leaders arrested in March were being held in detention in Moscow, and an official Soviet newsagency stated the next day that they were awaiting trial on charges of "diversionary tactics in the rear of the Red Army."⁵⁰ The next day both the American and British Governments jointly announced that they would not continue discussions of the Polish issue until a full explanation of the arrests had been given. Two days after that, in reply to an earlier lengthy missive from Churchill which had been endorsed by Truman, Stalin provided an explanation in line with that already given, but in return stated flatly that existing British and American attitudes "exclude the possibility of an agreed solution to the Polish question."⁵¹

END GAME IN EUROPE

By this time, however, events in Europe were moving to their ultimate conclusion, and in the strained atmosphere the erstwhile Allies had been making some last minute bids for strategic advantage. Having succeeded in gaining a temporary 'stand fast' directive from the joint Chiefs of Staff after his unsuccessful attempts to change Eisenhower's military strategy, following Roosevelt's death Churchill had immediately gone to work on Truman to indefinitely prevent any troop withdrawals.⁵² Truman, after consulting with the Joint Chiefs of Staff, at first refused to comply, but Churchill was not to be put off. On April 24, with the temporary directive still in effect, he had pressed his arguments concerning the need to first finalize arrangements on the occupation of Germany and Austria, and the President, fresh from his confrontation with Molotov and his meeting with Stimson, was at last inclined to agree.⁵³ On the 27, as the Soviets proceeded to tighten their circle around Berlin, a joint message had been sent to Stalin linking troop withdrawals in Germany to a satisfactory solution to the problem of Austria.⁵⁴

Stalin, however, was not going to be pushed around – he was obviously well aware of his own bargaining strength in Austria. On April 29 Radio Moscow announced that the Soviet commander in Austria had recognized a provisional government set up by former Socialist Chancellor of the Austrian republic Karl Renner. Though Renner's government appeared to represent all political elements as required by the Declaration on Liberated Europe, the Western Allies were nevertheless incensed – not only were the Soviets acting in blatant disregard of American and British calls for consultation, they were also refusing to allow western representatives into Vienna until zonal arrangements had been finalized.⁵⁵ Despite Western pleas that final zonal arrangements could not be made until observers had been allowed in, Stalin refused to budge.

To Churchill that only provided “a foretaste of what would happen” in a Soviet zone of occupation and made it all the more imperative to arrive before them wherever possible.⁵⁶ Already in mid-March he had communicated his concern to Eden that British and American troops should occupy Denmark before the Soviets, as well beat them to German atomic research installations near Stuttgart, and both of those objectives had been met.⁵⁷ Now, however, two further objectives seemed critical: Prague and Trieste. On April 30 the Prime Minister again cabled President Truman urging that the Western Allies participate in the liberation of Czechoslovakia. Once again, however, despite the State Department now giving its support for the idea, Eisenhower stuck to his purely military strategy and only crossed the Elbe after consolidating his position and obtaining Russian agreement to a limited advance. A request by the Soviet commander to liberate Prague was respected, even when on May 5 the people of Prague led by the communists rose in spontaneous revolt and requested help from the Americans nearby in Pilsen.⁵⁸

With regard to Trieste, where a tense situation was developing between the western Allies and Tito concerning control of the strategically important north-eastern Italian province of Venezia Giulia, Churchill was in a better position to make good on his demands. Both the US and Britain feared that Tito's claims for the former Austro-Hungarian province would be made a fait accompli if his partisan forces were first to arrive, and that that would arouse resentment among Italians against their weak government and cause a transfer of support to the Communists, as well as hinder the maintenance of western occupation forces in Austria to which the port of Trieste was vital. Moreover, if Tito was allowed to succeed he might try it again in bordering parts of Austria.⁵⁹ However, the Americans were still cautious, agreeing that General Alexander should proceed with his advance and then set up his Allied Military Government only with Tito's cooperation, without which he should seek further instructions from the combined Chiefs of Staff. Tito withheld his agreement, claiming that the Yugoslav theatre of operations now extended over most of the region. This time, however, Churchill had his own man on the ground, and on April 30 the British CoS decided to let Alexander proceed with care, only halting to consult with the Combined Chiefs if he met Yugoslav forces who refused to cooperate.⁶⁰

On the same day, Churchill telegraphed Truman arguing that Alexander should take Trieste from the sea before saying anything to the Russians or Yugoslavs. With clashes between Allied forces and Yugoslav troops possible at any moment, the American suspected that Churchill might well be trying to get them involved in fighting the Yugoslavs and possibly the Russians, and Truman again urged caution, reiterating his earlier demand that Alexander consult with Tito and the Combined Chiefs before getting into a fight. On May 1, however, after informing Churchill that he was now sure that Tito would not withdraw his troops without Russian say so, Alexander continued to push forward, and that night, after meeting up with Yugoslav forces a few miles north of Trieste, British Commonwealth troops continued to the port and safely received the surrender of the German garrison.⁶¹

Despite hostilities being avoided, it was by no means an end to the crisis. Tito's troops also occupied the town and there was no sign that he was about to moderate his claims for the region. But however justified Churchill and his American counterparts might have been in expecting a drawn out power struggle with the charismatic Yugoslav leader, one factor in their analysis was characteristically wrong. Tito wasn't a front man for the Russians at all. In fact, there was little if any love lost between the independent minded Yugoslav and the Soviets, who opposed his actions, in the words of Daniel Yergin, as "dangerous and provocative adventurism."⁶² For Churchill in particular, however, Tito's actions were only one more link in an unbroken communist chain which now extended from Norway to Turkey, and with the prospect of American and Commonwealth troops soon leaving the European theatre to join the Pacific campaign, something had to be done to stem the tide of Russian advance and prevent her total domination of Europe.

On May 4 he cabled Eden in San Francisco, outlining his view of the European situation and reiterating his earlier strategy of postponing troops withdrawals. Now, however, he threw his net far wider: the Allies ought not to retreat from their present positions "until we are satisfied about Poland, and also about the temporary character of the Russian occupation of Germany, and the conditions to be established in the Russianized or Russian-controlled countries in the Danube valley, particularly Austria and Czechoslovakia, and the Balkans." In addition to that bargaining counter, he hoped to use the prospect of agreements over the exits to the Baltic and the Black Seas. To use them, however, it was "indispensable" that a meeting between the Big Three be held as soon as possible. "If [these matters] are not settled before the United States armies withdraw from Europe and the Western World folds up its war machines", he concluded, "there are no prospects of a satisfactory solution and very little of preventing a third World War."⁶³

Even in the undoubtedly fractious international situation, the main danger to the security of world peace was in all likelihood Churchill's belligerent anti-Communist paranoia. But before World War Three could start present hostilities had to end, and with the German military machine now crumbling virtually of its own accord, matters in Europe were rapidly drawing to a close. On April 29, the day before Hitler's suicide, Alexander had accepted the unconditional surrender of German military forces in Italy. On the 30th in line with Hitler's last will and testament, Admiral Doenitz was informed that he had been appointed the Fuhrer's successor, and on May 4 Montgomery accepted the partial capitulation of the northern forces of the Doenitz government for the Western Front only – after rejecting the offer of a capitulation on both fronts as outside his jurisdiction. On May 6 Eisenhower in contrast insisted on capitulation for both fronts, and at 2.41am next day the instrument of general unconditional surrender was signed. All hostilities ceased at midnight on May 8, with formal ratification by the German High Command taking place in Berlin in the early hours of the next morning.⁶⁴

FINDING THE RIGHT LEVER

Hitler's dream of an end to the Jewish Question and a thousand year Reich was at an end, but the world was not yet at peace. The war with Japan had not yet ended, and the Allies had yet to demonstrate that they could come to terms with each other over the post-war arrangements for Europe. More than that, they had yet to demonstrate whether they could cooperate in peace at all. And having faced the disastrous consequences of appeasing totalitarian Nazi Germany – a power with whom they had more in common than they cared to admit – the Western Allies were now drawing the first false lesson of the war: that totalitarian power must inevitably lead to unslakeable expansionism. Germany's expansionist foreign policy, mistakenly attributed to its totalitarianism, was now being projected on to the Soviet Union. The fact that the Soviets were in it for themselves no more and no less than the western powers was being rapidly submerged under a rising tide of blinkered anti-Communist prejudice. The only real difference, of course, was that the Soviets were less encumbered by moral scruples and not at all by domestic public opinion, and therefore in fact more consistent in their behaviour – brutal as it was. And in the competition for post-war spoils, that in fact gave them an advantage which no amount of phoney moral lecturing or muscular posturing on the part of the West could easily diminish.

Nevertheless, with the end of hostilities in Europe, new Western concerns came into sharp focus in the light of the perceived Soviet threat: the possibility that chaos in Central and Western Europe might lead to revolution and communist penetration, and the possible consequences in the Far East of Russian entry into the Pacific war. So while the citizens of the Allied nations joyously celebrated their hard fought victory over Hitlerism, harder heads were busy behind the scenes reassessing the uneasy strategic balance in global political affairs and calculating measures that could be taken to assure that their side came out on top.

Uppermost on Churchill's mind was the pressing need for a summit meeting. Already on May 6 he had cabled Truman requesting a meeting of the Big Three at the earliest possible moment. Truman's reply on May 9, however, was disappointing. Though he agreed that such a meeting was desirable, it was "extremely difficult" for him "to be absent from Washington before the end of the fiscal year" on June 30.⁶⁵ To Churchill that seemed too late. He urgently cabled Truman on May 11, and again the next day. An "iron curtain" was drawn across the Russian front, he told the President on May 12. Already reports of troop transfers to the Pacific had reached the newspapers, and with the Russians already in substantial control of much of Europe and about to advance across half of Germany as American troops withdrew to their zone of occupation, "it would soon be open to the Russians in a very short time to advance if they chose to the waters of the North Sea and the Atlantic." A meeting with Stalin was essential at the earliest date possible, mid-June at latest. In the meantime, the present troop positions should be held.⁶⁶

Truman did not reply immediately, and in the meantime Churchill took steps of his own to bolster the West's position against the Soviets. He ordered the British Chiefs of Staff to stop reductions of the Air Force and slow that of the Army, and even attempted to hold fast to the Doenitz government in case German troops might be needed in the event of a Soviet advance to the North Sea.⁶⁷ However, while Truman may not have shared Churchill's desperate sense of urgency, he was far from idle. In the intervening days before his reply to Churchill on the 21st, a number of decisions would be taken with tremendous implications for the future. In fact, there is evidence to suggest that one of those decisions may have already been taken. The reason Truman gave to Churchill for postponing a meeting with Stalin was not his real, or even his primary, one. However, before that matter is dealt with, it is necessary to consider some of the other events and decisions that occurred within the US administration in the tense and busy weeks of mid-May.

In line with Ambassador Harriman's strategy to apply economic pressure to secure Soviet compliance with American plans, Truman on May 11 approved the curtailment of Lend Lease shipments not destined for use against Japan. Such a decision was also in line with previous demands by Congress as well as considerable public sentiment that Lend Lease should stop as soon as hostilities ceased, but there is no doubt that was also intended as a diplomatic weapon. However, it was not supposed to appear as a weapon. Harriman had been at pains to stress that "any implication of a threat or any indication of political bargaining" should be avoided. The object was merely to show that American economic largesse could no longer be expected as a matter of course, and thereby persuade the Soviets to take a more 'reasonable' attitude. Unfortunately for the strategy, however, in the anti-Soviet atmosphere that was beginning to permeate the administration the officials responsible for implementing the order were rather more keen to send a message, and the directive was carried out with such alacrity that even ships a sea were ordered to turn back. After bitter protests from both the Soviets and the British, who had also been affected, Truman countermanded the turnaround order, but the damage had been done.⁶⁸

Nevertheless, that episode did nothing to blunt American enthusiasm for using the economic lever. Already in April a definite policy of deferral had been placed on discussions of a post-war loan to the Soviets⁶⁹, and in early May steps were taken to have reparations guidelines tightened. With mounting fears that economic chaos could lead to political revolution and communist infiltration in Western and Central Europe, the Soviets' figure of $20 billion in German reparations agreed to at Yalta as a starting point for negotiations was effectively discarded in favour of an approach which placed primary emphasis on the need to maintain the German economy intact, even if it meant restricting reparations shipments to Russia. Reparations in the form of manufactured goods were to be kept as low as possible, and should first be used to provide for the basic needs of the German people and to pay for essential imports – the so-called “first charge” principle. In addition to helping stabilize post-war economic and political conditions in Germany, the new plan meant that the US could avoid financing the German economy as it had after WWI, and thereby also avoid indirectly aiding the Soviet Union. At the same time, it would be made clear to the Soviets that they could not expect massive shipments from the industrialized western zones without helping to feed the people in those areas in return.⁷⁰

The plan had other implications as well. Restricting reparations from current production was also intended to facilitate the State department's aim of German integration into the new international multi-lateral trading order – which effectively meant that that now had priority over aid to the Soviet Union, the United States' war-time ally.⁷¹ But even more significantly for the longer term, the plan now made disagreement with the Soviets almost inevitable. Since the Soviets were anxious to rebuild their own economy with the help of German industrial products, the exclusion of such products now made it extremely unlikely that agreement would be reached.⁷² Indeed, disagreement was made even more certain by the fact that Truman had already replaced Roosevelt's appointee as head of the American delegation to the Reparations Commission with a tough Texan oil operator, Edwin Pauley, on the basis that he wanted somebody “who can throw his weight around.”⁷³

RUSSIA IN OR OUT?

But while concerns about Europe had so far dominated the decision making process, attention was also beginning to shift dramatically to the situation in the Far East. So far, the secret Yalta Far Eastern agreements had been immune from the deepening standoff between the Allies. On April 15, ten days after the Soviet Union had announced its intention to abrogate its neutrality pact with Japan, Stalin reaffirmed his intention to declare war on Japan and recognize Chiang, and one week later – the day before his confrontation with Molotov on Poland – Truman had assured the Soviet Foreign Minister of his intention to keep Roosevelt's Far Eastern pledges. For security reasons, however, Chiang had not yet been told of the arrangements that had been made largely at his country's expense. The delay proved opportune. While Truman continued to postpone informing Chiang, the State Department on May 12 initiated a proposal for a review of the political implications of the Yalta agreement, and whether, given estimations of American bargaining power and the need for Soviet military assistance, it could or should be reconsidered.⁷⁴

The questions that were raised indeed cut deeply. On the one hand, Soviet participation would in all inevitably involve them in the post-war settlement in Japan, possibly as an occupying power, as well as leave troops on the ground in Korea and Manchuria, thus further opening the Far East to communist influence. Already control of one fifth of China was in communist hands, and prospects were high for continued civil war. To American policy makers caught in an increasingly confrontational mood over the Soviet's refusal to toe their line in Eastern Europe, the threats the situation represented to American 'principles' in the Far East – not only in regard to Japan itself, but also a strong, pro-American and 'free' China, which would also be the economic gateway to the rest of Asia – were no doubt disturbing to contemplate.⁷⁵

On the other hand, however, though the defeat of Japan was now only a matter of time and now could be achieved without Russian assistance, Russian entry into the war was still considered to be of immense value, if only as a devastating shock to Japanese morale. US military planners were acutely conscious of the price that a planned invasion would extract in lives, and on that basis alone they were more than willing to get the Russians in to help them reduce the burden and shorten the war. Those concerns had been dramatically confirmed in early April when the Japanese fully unleashed their most ferocious and frightening weapon. To the Western mind, the kamikaze which appeared in numbers at the battle of Okinawa displayed a fanaticism almost impossible to comprehend, and along with the fanatical fighting that accompanied every inch of the US advance on the island, the suicide pilots demonstrated the desperate lengths many Japanese were prepared to go to in fighting to defend their homeland and Emperor. Of course, few in the West should have been too surprised given that the relentlessly reiterated demand for unconditional surrender left no way out.

However, there was always the prospect that the whole problem might be substantially avoided by a modification of the surrender terms to assure the position of the Emperor in post-war Japanese society, and an increasing succession of unofficial Japanese peace feelers, particularly after the Soviet denunciation of the neutrality pact and emanating mostly from diplomatic missions in Europe, lent increasing weight to that possibility.⁷⁶ Already American efforts to clarify the meaning of 'unconditional surrender' had been initiated as part of the psychological warfare campaign, and following Truman's announcement of victory over Germany May 8 a carefully worded presidential press statement had been released which softened an earlier hard-line speech to Congress on April 16 and implicitly emphasized that unconditional surrender applied specifically to the military.⁷⁷

However any further moves had to be weighed carefully. As later historical commentators in particular have argued, moving away from the 'unconditional surrender' formula raised the prospect of domestic opposition. Memories of Pearl Harbour – the American administration's propaganda version of it anyway – were still fresh. The war had been fought with unremitting relentlessness on both sides and the most appropriate response seemed to many Americans (still ignorant of US pre-war provocation and the fact that their leaders were well informed of the stages of the Japanese offensive) to be to repay like with like. In addition, in view of the most recent demonstrations of Japanese intransigence, it also seemed to many Americans, that the demand for unconditional surrender was justified by a desire to exorcise the devil of militarism from Japanese society once and for all, but that was mainly the result of ignorance of Japanese history. The Atlantic Charter notwithstanding, there were those who argued that the only way to ensure that was to rid Japan altogether of its outdated Imperial traditions and replace them with those of a modern democracy – à la President Wilson's 'republicanisation' of Germany after World War I. Moreover, anything less than 'unconditional surrender' might generate feelings of betrayal among hard-line Japanese, leading to continued post-surrender resistance and post-war political problems along the lines of those which were exploited in Germany after WWI.

However, none of these problems can be seen in retrospect as insurmountable. Firstly, as historian Gar Alperovitz has documented, influential sections in the US media had by mid-May already begun to call for a reassessment of surrender policy, while by early June the Joint Chiefs were beginning to worry that the Japanese themselves might offer terms which were unacceptable to the administration but which the war-weary American public might be inclined to accept.⁷⁸ Moreover, the other issues were themselves not so much part of the problem as they were its solution. As early as March 1944, intelligence estimates had concluded that given the central importance of the Emperor to Japanese society, a surrender would in all likelihood be unenforceable if it was not backed up by Imperial sanction, which thus implied the need to maintain the Emperor on the throne.⁷⁹ Some form of constitutional monarchy was therefore widely considered the most likely option.

In fact, by April 25 Joint Staff Planners had concluded that "it is by no means certain...that 'unconditional surrender' can be brought about by any means...[T]he concept...is foreign to the Japanese nature." They recommended that unless "a definition of unconditional surrender can be given which is acceptable to the Japanese, there is no alternative to annihilation and no prospect that the threat of absolute defeat will bring about capitulation." However, in the absence of such a re-definition they concluded that "the invasion of Japan proper is considered the most suitable strategy to accomplish unconditional surrender or ultimate defeat", and on May 10, given the existing official surrender policy, the Joint Chiefs began planning for an invasion on the basis of the Planners' report. At the same time, however, they followed up the Planners' recommendation that a careful study of the surrender terms be made, and began a push to develop a proposal to clarify the 'unconditional' language. By May 12 general agreement had been reached that 'unconditional surrender' should refer explicitly to the armed forces and that explicit reference be made to the continued authority of the existing Imperial institutions.⁸⁰

But there was one final problem. The Planners' report of April 25 had concluded that the final blow which would induce the Japanese to accept modified terms, on top of the defeat of Germany and the increasing effects of the air-sea blockade and strategic bombardment, would be Russian entry into the war.⁸¹ To many top US officials it seemed that if that would indeed be the decisive factor it might well be too late. However, to the select few privileged to know of its existence, another solution was on the horizon which carried with it both the prospect of an early end to the war as well as a demonstration to the Soviets – and anybody else who cared to watch – that the peace in the post-war world was only going to be made only on terms that were entirely acceptable to the United States.

One of the best available sources of information on thoughts and events within the Truman administration at the time are the detailed diaries of Secretary of War Henry Stimson. Confronted with the State Department initiative concerning proposals for a review of the Yalta Far Eastern accord on May 13, Stimson noted in his diary their “powerful connection” to the success of “S-1” – the atomic bomb. On the 15th, meeting with colleagues from the Departments of State and Navy, he argued that it was too soon to take a position on the issues that had been raised. The problem was, he thought, that Truman had already agreed to meet with his counterparts on July 1, and that it would probably be necessary then to “have it out with Russia” over political arrangements in the Far East. In his diary he wrote that “over any such tangled weave of problems the S-1 secret would be dominant and yet we do not know until after that time probably, until after that meeting, whether this is a weapon in our hands or not.” It seemed “a terrible thing to gamble with such big stakes in diplomacy without having your master card in your hand.”⁸²

Stimson need not have worried. Contrary to his assumption, Truman had not yet agreed to Churchill’s urgent requests for an early meeting of the Big Three, in spite of the fact that numerous senior American officials were also pressing him for such a meeting. On May 15, Harriman also stressed Churchill’s view that it should be held before substantial numbers of troops had been withdrawn to the Pacific theatre. However, Truman again postponed a meeting and it is no longer in doubt that he did so to allow the bomb to be tested. He admitted as much to Stimson on June 6.⁸³ Similarly, Robert Oppenheimer later recalled that, “I don’t think that there was a time where we worked harder at the speedup than in the period after the German surrender and [before] the actual combat use of the bomb.” The Manhattan Project scientists, he stated, “were under incredible pressure to get it done before the Potsdam meeting.”⁸⁴ And although Truman publicly maintained that the deferment was for domestic political reasons, citing his need to prepare a budget message before the end of the fiscal year, the diaries of former ambassador to the Soviet Union, Joseph Davies, also confirm that this was not his real reason, or at least his only one. Meeting privately with Davies on May 21, Truman informed him that he did not want the heads of government meeting until July. The budget was one reason. The bomb, he revealed, was the other. According to Davies’ account, “The final test had been set for June, but now had been postponed until July.”⁸⁵

That same day Truman had contacted Churchill with the message that within two weeks he may have more information bearing on a date and location for the proposed meeting with Stalin.⁸⁶ Presumably by then a more precise timetable for the test would be available. However, Truman was no doubt also referring to the results of another crucial diplomatic initiative he had underway involving Roosevelt's former aide and close confidante, Harry Hopkins. In opposition to senior officials of the State Department, Truman had decided that Hopkins would be sent on a personal mission to Moscow to meet with Stalin – a task Hopkins had often undertaken for Roosevelt. Part of Hopkins brief was to fix a date for the proposed meeting.

It is also clear, however, that the Hopkins mission had a far wider significance, though exactly why and when Truman decided to recall the ailing former aide to active diplomatic duty remains unknown. Well known to and liked by Stalin, Hopkins was clearly associated with the policies and modes of operation of the former President, and given the context of the international situation and the tenor and outcome of the eventual discussions, his mission has been widely interpreted as an attempt by Truman to patch up the increasingly rocky relationship between the allies, as well as secure final agreement for Russian entry into the Pacific war.⁸⁷ Supporting such an interpretation is the fact that Truman had by now come to question the overtly confrontational approach he had earlier adopted at the urging of his aides, not least through its obvious in effect, but also through conversations and correspondence with former ambassador Davies, whose strongly sympathetic views towards the Soviet Union contrasted sharply with those of many of Truman's other advisors.⁸⁸ On the other hand, though there is no direct evidence available, it has also been suggested that Hopkins' mission to Moscow may also have been intended to stabilise the international situation to buy time until the bomb had been tested, as well as to gain the 'insurance policy' of a Russian commitment to the Pacific war in case the test should fail.⁸⁹

A THREAT TO THE UNITED NATIONS CONFERENCE

Whatever the case, there was certainly a lot of patching up to be done if the erstwhile Allies were going to maintain even a semblance of cooperation in the post-war world. Already the bruising conflict over eastern Europe had gone so far as to threaten the new United Nations Organization even before it had been established, and now another dispute had emerged to again threaten the breakdown of the Conference, this time centred not on external events but on the provisions of the Charter itself. At issue was whether the permanent members of the Security Council had the right to veto the discussion of a dispute as well as any subsequent decisions related to enforcement actions – a point which would seriously diminish the ability of the organization to act in any dispute involving a permanent member. If, as the Soviet delegates held, the veto should also apply to discussions, it could also be used in situations involving a permanent member which might have otherwise resulted in a vote to institute peaceful settlement procedures, to which the veto did not apply. Faced with this interpretation, the United States, Britain and France were categorically opposed, and were determined to uphold their position at all costs. Unfortunately, so were the Soviets.⁹⁰

However, it was already clear that even if it ever got off the ground the new international organization was not going to survive the emerging standoff between East and West unscathed. In fact, two of the most influential members of the American delegation, Senator Arthur Vandenburg and Assistant Secretary of State David Rockefeller, were keen to see that that was so. Vandenburg, a virulent anti-Communist and former isolationist whose opposition to the Yalta accords had only been silenced when Roosevelt had shrewdly made him a delegate to the UN conference, was now doing everything he could to counter what he saw as the appeasement of untrammelled Soviet expansionism.⁹¹ Rockefeller, Assistant Secretary of State for Latin American Affairs and intimately acquainted with the region through his family's enormous investments – not to mention political clout – was keen to have the Soviets excluded from the region so that the economic relationship between North and South America could continue to develop 'productively' without outside interference. Both were thus opposed to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals which gave the Security Council express authority over the use of regional security groupings for enforcement purposes.

To Vandenburg and Rockefeller, that arrangement spelled disaster: the end of the Monroe Doctrine and the beginning of Soviet interference in the Western Hemisphere. Latin America had only just set up its own regional security system under the Act of Chapultepec, and if the Security Council had ultimate responsibility for regional enforcement measures, that meant the Russians could exercise their veto, and who knew where that might lead? Faced with that problem they were intent on devising a means by which the Americas could be kept firmly within Washington's sphere, and firmly opposed others in the US delegation who feared that watering down the Dumbarton Oaks proposals too much would jeopardize the establishment of an integrated and effective world security system.⁹²

Given the Rockefeller connection, it is thus perhaps not surprising that in addition to American criticism the greatest opposition to the proposals emerged from within the Latin American delegations themselves. However, European nations also voiced their dissent, though for quite different reasons. Concerned at the possibility of a renewed threat from Germany and wishing to retain the right of immediate retaliation without prior Security Council assent, Turkey, Belgium, Czechoslovakia, the Soviet Union and France all proposed amendments. Eventually the Big Five agreed to an exception in the case of the aggression by the former enemy states of WWII, but that then only intensified demands by the Latin Americans that their own regional arrangements should be similarly treated. By then, however, Vandenburg and Rockefeller had devised a solution to their problem which also satisfied their opponents in the US delegation. Rather than adding another exception to the prior authority of the Security Council, they advocated an entirely new article. With slight modifications it was picked up by the British, and Article 51 was inserted into the Charter, affirming the inherent right of a state or group of states to take measures necessary for self-defense if the Security Council failed to prevent aggression.

The cost to the new international system was not insignificant. United Nations historian Evan Luard noted that the changes to the Dumbarton Oaks proposals embodied in Article 51 "made it substantially less likely that the new UN enforcement machine would ever come into use, and more likely that conflict situations would be dealt with in the traditional way, as for hundreds of years before."⁹³ In other words, the new guardian of global peace had had its teeth pulled in what was essentially an exercise in American anti-Communist hypocrisy. The other great powers could of course see the advantages, with the Soviets in particular no doubt happy that any security arrangements they might care to one day make in their own sphere would also be safely shielded from western interference. But that didn't seem to have occurred to Americans like Vandenburg, who at the same time as hanging onto the Monroe Doctrine were championing hard at the bit to teach the dirty Bolsheviks a lesson in Eastern Europe. In the words of historian Walter LaFeber, "when he and Rockefeller finished with Article 51, they thought they had obtained the best of both worlds: exclusive American power in the New and the right to exert American power in the Old."⁹⁴ Which was, no doubt, one of the main reasons why the Soviets were happy to agree to it in the first place.

Thus, with the global security mechanisms of the United Nations virtually neutered, it was perhaps no surprise that a similar fate should befall trusteeship proposals. First, however, the United States had to satisfy itself further on the question of its own security. When on the eve of the Conference discussions on trusteeship arrangements eventually began, the US proposed a two tier system. The "normal" trust territories would be supervised by a new trusteeship council, and 'strategic' trust territories would be supervised, if at all, by the Security Council, where each permanent member had a veto. Whoever exercised control of the territory would say which of the two it would be. No-one else agreed, but a determined US saw its position eventually win out. Britain pointed out that the aim of international supervision – protecting the interests of trust territories' inhabitants – applied equally to strategic territories as to others, and that a separate scheme was unnecessary, while the Soviet Union, backed by China, argued that it was for the Security Council to decide which territories were to be designated security areas.⁹⁵

A MATTER OF TRUST(EESHIP)

However, the big questions centred on the scope and powers of supervision to be granted to the Trusteeship Council. In opposition to Britain and France, Roosevelt had hoped that the Council could be given responsibilities for exercising watch over all dependent territories, not only those under League mandates, and assisting their progress to independence. Now, however, the situation had changed. Already in late April Roosevelt's strongly held policy of an international trusteeship and eventual independence for Indochina had been abandoned by the State Department, who now opposed the strong communist element in Indochina's nationalist movement and wanted to strengthen relations with France as a bulwark against Soviet influence in Europe. The decision was actually made against the strong opposition of the State Department's own Division of Far Eastern Affairs, which argued that the Authority of the European colonial powers in Asia had been damaged to the point where nationalist forces could no longer be stifled. However, their views were overruled by those of the Office of European Affairs.⁹⁶ At San Francisco the US therefore swung in behind the European colonial powers in their bid to protect themselves from undue interference in their colonial affairs. All attempts to extend the trusteeship system to include colonial dependencies were opposed by the Big Five, and all effective control over trust territories was firmly kept in the hands of the administering powers. Nevertheless the US insisted on a general non-discrimination undertaking, to prevent the establishment of preferences like those given in colonies.⁹⁷

Moreover, having accepted that there would be another section of the Charter dealing with the 'civilizing' responsibilities of colonial powers in all non-self-governing territories, Britain and France, this time against opposition from the Soviet Union and China but with support from the United States, succeeded in having any reference to eventual independence kept out. Instead, a US compromise proposal on the declaration on non-self-governing territories which was eventually accepted referred only to the goal of 'self-government', while the objectives of the trusteeship system were broadened to refer to independence, the protection of human rights, and of course, the wishes of the people concerned.⁹⁸

But while all that was being debated in the rarefied atmosphere of the San Francisco Opera House, France was providing a timely reminder of just what it all still really meant. In 1941 France and Britain had jointly declared the independence of the former French mandated territories of Syria and Lebanon, and since the French were not about to forego their privileges lightly, with British backing they sought treaties to define France's position in the post-independence states. However, neither of the newly independent states was keen to start negotiations, which had not begun until after Yalta, and by early May no French proposals had yet been forthcoming either. French reinforcements were on their way to the Levant instead. That did not suit the British, who had enough problems in the region as it was, and feared that such provocation would lead to disturbances that would draw in their own troops stationed there and disturb communications lines to the Far East. However, Churchill's rather disingenuous protestations to de Gaulle that Britain had no designs on the area and that British troops would be withdrawn as soon as new treaties were in operation fell on deaf ears, and on May 17 French troops landed at Beirut.

What followed, as Churchill later put it, was "an explosion." The Syrian and Lebanese Governments immediately broke off negotiations and declared that all foreign troops would be asked to leave. Disturbances rapidly escalated, and by the end of the month the French, with air and heavy artillery support, had occupied the Syrian Parliament, the fighting resulting in over two-thousand dead and injured. On May 31 the British were asked to intervene, a cease fire was arranged, and on June 3 the French garrison at Damascus was withdrawn from the city. On that basis, treaty negotiations resumed.⁹⁹ So much for independence, the protection of human rights, self determination and the wishes of the people concerned. It was business as usual.

STICKING TO UNCONDITIONAL SURRENDER

As the British were busy trying to patch things up between the French and their former Levant minions, another attempt at reconciliation was also in progress in Moscow. On May 28 Harry Hopkins arrived for some straight talking with Marshall Stalin. A frank and confident tone was soon established between the two men, and where Hopkins identified Poland as the issue most troubling for the United States, Stalin made known the major sources of Soviet concerns, particularly Poland, the admittance of Argentina to the UN, and the cut-off of Lend-Lease aid. He stated categorically that if the termination of Lend-Lease was “designed as pressure on the Russians in order to soften them up then it was a fundamental mistake.” If the Russians were “approached frankly on a friendly basis, much could be done...reprisals in any form would have the opposite effect.”¹⁰⁰

With that warning on the table, talks proceeded fruitfully over the next ten days. Stalin quickly promised that Russia would enter the war against Japan by August 8 if the Yalta agreements were kept, but stated that no troops would be committed until final agreement on the detail of the Yalta accords was reached with China. In addition, he again gave his assurance that he favoured a stable China united under Chiang – making clear his skeptical attitude to the Chinese Communists and the USSR’s limited interests in the region. He also assented to a four-Power trusteeship for Korea. Ominously for the Americans, but no doubt shrewdly from his own point of view, Stalin also expressed an interest in a share of Japan’s occupation – a useful lever in the diplomatic tug-of-war over Eastern Europe. In response to an urgent cable from Washington, Hopkins also broached the subject of the impasse over the Security Council veto at the UN Conference. In an evident display of unconcern at the significance of the UN, Stalin cleared it up on the spot in an impromptu debate with Molotov, conceding the Soviet position.¹⁰¹ A date was also set for the Big Three conference, to begin at Potsdam in occupied Berlin in mid-July. When advised on June 1 of the proposed date, Churchill was almost beside himself in exasperation at the lateness of the conference. He wanted it a month earlier, but Truman was adamant.¹⁰²

However, the big issue was Poland, and in a complete reversal of all that had gone in the months before, days of strenuous discussion produced a preliminary agreement. Four representatives from the London Poles and the internal resistance, including former premier Mikolajczyk, would travel to Moscow to negotiate a new cabinet formula with representatives of the Lublin government. Despite the fact that no agreement was reached on the timing of elections, it appeared that the stalemate had been broken.¹⁰³ By June 21 the Poles had agreed upon the make-up of a new cabinet heavily weighted towards the Lublin group – a satisfactory outcome for the Russians, but hardly for her allies. Nevertheless, on July 5 the new government was recognized by the United States and Britain, despite the lack of desired guarantees on elections or pluralistic democracy.¹⁰⁴

Given the attitude demonstrated by the western powers in the previous months, it was an amazing turnaround. It is possible that Britain and the United States, after pursuing the issue to the brink, had decided for the sake of post-war cooperation with the Soviet Union that it was better to cut their losses and accept the inevitable. Then again, perhaps they believed that negotiations at the forthcoming Potsdam conference would somehow help tilt the balance sheet back in their favour, and that the Soviet Union could be made to see the advantages of bending to the West’s point of view.

There was certainly one United States official whose thoughts on ‘cooperation’ ran along those lines, and he was convinced he had the tools to make it happen. James F. Byrnes, Truman’s Secretary of State-designate, took office on July 3, two days before the decision to recognize the Polish government. But well before then he had involved himself extensively in high level policy-making on issues surrounding the bomb. As Truman’s close confidante and personal representative on the Interim Committee set up by Stimson and the president after their April 25 meeting, he was perfectly placed to influence thinking on the use of the new weapon. And as Secretary of State-designate it was Byrnes who would be dealing with its foreign policy implications.

WHAT USE FOR A BOMB?

So it was quite appropriate when on May 28 three scientists from the Manhattan Project, Leo Szilard, Walter Bartky, and Harold Urey, met with Byrnes at his South Carolina home to discuss atomic-bomb related issues and Byrnes revealed his thinking on the bomb’s usefulness. According to Szilard, Byrnes “did not argue that it was necessary to use the bomb against the cities of Japan in order to win the war. He knew at that time, as the rest of the government knew, that Japan was essentially defeated...[His view was] that our possessing and demonstrating the bomb would make Russia more manageable in Europe...”¹⁰⁵

However, the question of the bomb was not unrelated to the war in the Pacific, as Byrnes was of course also well aware. Though Japan’s defeat might have been inevitable, there was still the question of how to go about securing it. That involved issues of time as well as cost, both of which had been brought into sharp focus when on May 25 the Joint Chiefs of Staff had approved the next stage of military operations in the Pacific War – the invasion of Japan. A directive was issued to Pacific Commanders for a landing on Kyushu, set for November 1, as a preliminary to a final invasion of the Tokyo Plains set for late the following year. However, that first date was still more than five months away, leaving plenty of time to explore alternative means to end the war. Of much greater significance was Stalin’s re-confirmation that Russia would enter the war by August 8 – approximately one week after the end of the meeting of the Big Three – provided agreement could be reached with Chiang. That date not only imposed a tighter deadline on decisions, it left the exact price to be paid for Russian assistance unknown.

So while Hopkins and Stalin were proceeding with their tête-à-tête in Moscow, others were busy in Washington seeking the President’s ear on the subject of a negotiated end to hostilities in the Pacific. On May 28, as Byrnes met with the atomic scientists, former president Herbert Hoover met with Truman to urge a clarification of surrender terms, as did Joseph Grew, the Undersecretary of State. Grew in particular used more than one reason in advocating a negotiated end to hostilities. As former ambassador to Japan he believed that the war had resulted from failed diplomacy, and he wished to avoid the prospect of the country being devastated either by invasion or atomic weapons. He was also among the administration’s most hard-line anti-Soviet alarmists, and he was sure that a devastated and alienated Japan could be of no use to anyone but the Soviets. Both Hoover and Grew stressed what the Joint Staff planners and various American intelligence analyses had already concluded, that the greatest obstacle to surrender was the belief on the part of the Japanese that it would involve the removal of the Emperor and the institution of the throne. In addition Grew suggested an immediate statement of modified terms to capitalise on the psychological impact of the firestorms that had again been unleashed on Tokyo by American Superfortress bombers on the 26th and 27th.¹⁰⁶

According to Grew, Truman indicated that his thoughts had been “following the same line.” If so he was in good company. The following day US diplomatic intercepts picked up a message to Molotov from Japan’s Ambassador Sato stating that “as a result of America’s attitude, we have no choice but to continue to fight.” From Moscow, Hopkins also reported a similar sentiment from Stalin. According to the Soviet leader, “if we stick to unconditional surrender, the Japs will not give up.” The Americans understood that Stalin was in a position to know – as the Soviets had told them, Japanese representatives were at that very moment in Moscow making offers which they hoped would keep the Soviets out of the war.¹⁰⁷

In the event Grew’s advice was rejected, and in a scheduled speech on June 1 Truman gave no hint of Grew’s proposals. On the contrary, he reiterated that nothing would force the United States “to settle for some compromise short of unconditional surrender” – a tougher line than that displayed in his statement of May 8 where at least some indication a been given of a humane fate for the Japanese people.¹⁰⁸ Given the earlier moves towards softening the meaning of unconditional surrender, as well as the intercepted message from Sato and the advice from Stalin, the turnaround is difficult to understand. However, other events which had occurred over the preceding couple of days cast an interesting light on the matter.

After meeting several times in May, the Interim Committee had met on the weekend of May 31– June 1 for some final deliberations on the crucial questions of how the bomb should best be developed, used and controlled. Its conclusions, first conveyed to Truman by Byrnes on the 1st, were that while the US went full steam ahead in developing its own atomic energy and weaponry programs, work on the bomb should not be disclosed to any other country until it had been used against Japan.¹⁰⁹ In other words, no attempt at cooperation with the Soviet Union should be initiated until after the bomb had been dropped.

Just what connections exists between Truman’s speech – which Byrnes is known to have had a hand in drafting – and the conclusions of the Interim Committee, if any, are unclear. It is apparent, however, that the circumstances of each show a remarkable and suggestive symmetry. In short, the decision to issue an uncompromising statement to the Japanese was one which would virtually guarantee that the Japanese would fight on until the bomb had at least been tested. It may of course be argued that it was too early to tell whether a statement of modified terms would have the desired effect, and that it was felt that any such statement would be better issued in conjunction with either the bomb – either before or after its use – or a Soviet declaration of war, or perhaps both. However, that argument must be balanced against the fact that the statement which was issued actually retreated from even the minor elaboration of terms included in Truman's May 8 statement on unconditional surrender – the significance of which would not have been lost on the psychological warfare experts. And just as importantly, it also must be seen in the light of fact that the Interim Committee's deliberations are known to have been influenced decisively by Byrnes – whose attitude has already been documented.¹¹⁰

Three aspects of the Committee's deliberations bear elaboration. First, it is clear that in tackling a number of crucial and interlocking questions – how the new weapon and the new source of energy behind it was to be internationally controlled; how much technical knowledge about the bomb should be revealed to the world; and when – or if – such disclosure should be made – the Committee's answers were made dependent on the response to another: namely, how long it would take the Soviet Union to produce a bomb if secrecy was maintained. In other words, the historical new source of energy and power was – to some members of the committee at least – first and foremost an opportunity to squeeze competitive advantage over America's chief rival.

Secondly, in estimating the lead time over the Soviet Union it is also clear that Byrnes for one was decisively influenced by General Groves' efforts to corner the world market on fissionable materials and thereby ensure an Anglo-American monopoly on atomic weapons regardless of any system of international control. Where members of the Committee's Scientific Panel and two the administration's most senior scientific advisors projected that the Russians could develop a bomb in three to five years, General Groves thought 20 years. As recorded in his memoirs, Byrnes concluded that "any other government would need from seven to ten years, at least, to produce a bomb" – by which time, as Robert Oppenheimer had told the Committee, the United States would have advanced to the next stage of atomic weaponry – the thermo-nuclear or hydrogen bomb.¹¹¹

Third, in deciding how to use the bomb against Japan – an issue which had not been on the Committee's original agenda – it is clear that no thought was given to the question of whether it should in fact be used. The main consideration was how to make the maximum impression. For that reason the ideas of a demonstration and prior warning were discarded, without any real attempt to separate the two. As one member rather numbingly reasoned, the "number of people that would be killed by the bomb would not be greater in general magnitude than the number already killed in fire raids [on Tokyo]." Thus, despite the Committee's agreement that the bombing would not concentrate on a civilian area, the most desirable target was identified as a vital war plant employing a large number of workers surrounded by worker's homes. And to top off an afternoon's work, it was also decided that the two bombs which would be available in August would both be used – thus condemning the destruction of two cities with a single decision.¹¹²

On June 6, at a meeting to discuss the recommendations of the Interim Committee, Stimson and Truman also briefly discussed the quid pro quos that might be extracted for taking the Russian's into atomic partnership. They agreed that a fitting exchange would be the settlement of the Polish, Rumanian, Yugoslavian and Manchurian problems.¹¹³

Nevertheless, many of those whose work had made the bomb possible were at the same time working to reverse the emerging thrust of US atomic policy. On June 12, Manhattan project scientists in Chicago forwarded a memo to members of the Interim Committee registering their opposition to its recommendations. Disputing the assumption that the United States could maintain a substantial lead over the Soviet Union in atomic technology, they argued that the only security against nuclear attack could be through effective international control, which would be all but impossible if sudden and unannounced use of the weapon was made against Japan. Therefore, they argued, a demonstration in the presence of representatives from other countries including Japan should first be attempted. If Japan failed to heed the demonstration, United Nations sanction could be obtained for its use, to better conscience and better effect.

In response, the Interim Committee directed its Scientific Panel to consider the memo. The panel, whose views on the likely lead-time over the Soviets had already been given, in reply stated that "we can propose no technical demonstration likely to bring and end to the war; we can see no alternative to direct military use." At the same time, however, it also suggested that "before the weapons are used, not only Britain, but also Russia, France and China be advised that we would welcome suggestions as to how we can cooperate in making this development contribute to improved international relations." However, in stating it views the panel members stressed that they had "no claim to special competence in solving the political, social and military problems which are presented by the advent of atomic power." And, of course, their statement was made without any knowledge of the current strategic situation or of intelligence reports on intercepted Japanese diplomatic cables.¹¹⁴

THE RIGHT PRIORITIES

While US administrators were digesting the Interim Committee's recommendations in Washington; the Japanese government was digesting Truman's speech in Tokyo; and Hopkins, concluding his meetings with Stalin in Moscow; Generals Eisenhower, Montgomery and de Lattre de Tassigny met with Marshall Zhukov in Berlin in early June to confirm arrangements regarding the occupation of Germany. Zhukov made it clear that the Soviets would not allow the four-power control machinery to go into operation until all troops had been removed to their respective zones, thus effectively ending Churchill's attempts at postponement.¹¹⁵ With agreement reached on that issue, on June 5 a series of proclamations were issued dissolving the old German government and creating the Allied Control Council, giving supreme authority to the Allied Commanders-in-Chief. All decisions on matters of common policy were to require unanimity until Germany was again a single unit.¹¹⁶

However, with only broad agreements on four-power policy having been reached at Yalta concerning the dissolution of the armed forces and denazification, each zone commander thus had considerable leeway in governing his zone, and differences in approach quickly emerged.

While Soviet soldiers busily organized social activities and sporting events with their former enemies as part of a concerted propaganda campaign to foster goodwill towards the Soviet Union – as well as to counter the effects of their earlier atrocious behaviour in raping and pillaging their way across Germany – the Western powers in contrast showed little desire to woo the defeated Germans, or even treat them humanely. Instead, they banned political activity, promulgated strict non-fraternization orders, and in a magnificent display of selective historical amnesia and denial undertook a concerted propaganda campaign to reinforce the notion of ‘collective guilt’ for Germany’s crimes – a special kind of guilt which, of course, magically disappeared at Germany’s borders. The first two were quickly reversed, however – it soon became apparent that non-fraternization was unenforceable as well as counterproductive, and the ban on political activity was lifted when fears were raised that it was leading to the strengthening of underground communist movements with links to the east.¹¹⁷

At the same time as Allied policy in Germany began to diverge, a more ominous note was also beginning to be heard in Moscow where the Reparations Commission proposed at Yalta was attempting to come to an agreement on the single matter of greatest importance for Germany’s future under four-power occupation. With the gung-ho American commissioner Edwin Pauley leading the charge, and the British also insisting on the ‘first-charge’ principle for reasons similar to the Americans but particularly so as to avoid further drain on their financial resources, discussions soon broke down completely.¹¹⁸ Aggravating the atmosphere of division were denunciations of the Soviet Union by the Americans in particular for not even bothering to wait for the commission’s findings. The accusations were of course correct: Soviet dismantling teams had started removing plant and equipment straight after surrender, targeting coal-mining installations, railway repair shops, power stations, electrical works, locomotive factories and similar technical plants, in many cases crating and carting off entire factories from Berlin as well as their own zone.¹¹⁹

However, what the Americans ignored in taking their high moral tone was that the Soviets weren’t the only ones engaging in such practices: as former US Ambassador Davies later noted in his diary, “the French are carrying off everything but the kitchen sink”, while the Soviets themselves later tartly pointed out at Potsdam that American and British units had removed from the Soviet zone more than 10,000 loaded railway cars plus expensive industrial equipment.¹²⁰ But what made a complete mockery of their stance was the fact that a ‘reparations’ program on a much vaster scale had been going on under the cover of utmost secrecy since the Allied landing on Normandy – one which would have enormous world-wide repercussions for decades to come.

Indeed, had they been aware of it, the sordid and sorry tale of Allied attempts to grab as much scientific and technical loot from Germany as they possibly could would have been enough to make the Reparations Commission representatives blanch in embarrassment. Or perhaps not – after all, they might have seen a fine distinction between the removal of physical property and the mere appropriation of materials for their intellectual content, which of course happened to include the people whose brains contained the richest loads of all.

The roots of the massive grab operation that eventually saw thousands of Allied personnel scouring the ruins of Europe for the jewels of German scientific and industrial prowess in hot competition with the Russians – as well as each other – had grown initially from a belated recognition by Britain and the United States that German technical advances were in many ways superior to their own.¹²¹ In response to a burgeoning demand for access to German scientific and technical know-how to further the war effort and provide for post-war defense developments, the Allied Command in Europe had, in July 1944, established special units known as ‘T-Forces.’ Responsible for capturing and defending technical intelligence targets, they were directed by the Combined Intelligence Objectives Subcommittee (CIOS), a joint Anglo-American body controlled by the military which sent out experts to assess and exploit captured targets.¹²²

THE SCIENTIFIC GRAVY TRAIN

However, the military weren’t the only ones interested in German science and technology. As it had after WWI, industry was also keen to jump on the gravy train, and by October 1944 a CIOS subcommittee had been established to draw up a “grey-list” from requests by British and American government departments for economic and industrial intelligence targets of “vital post-war interest.” At the same time, Washington had formed the Technical Industrial Intelligence Committee (TIIC) as a civilian feeder organization to CIOS, empowered to receive, approve and administer all governmental requests for information on processes, patents, inventions and engineering know-how. The TIIC quickly organized sub-committees in the fields of rubber, metals and minerals, chemicals, building materials, war utilities, railroads, forest products, machinery, textiles, aeronautics, medicine and communications, and by January 1945 300 TIIC specialists – newly commissioned as Army officers and often drawn from the ranks of the very corporations which had initiated requests for intelligence from the TIIC – were awaiting shipment to Europe. In the same vein, the British established an Industrial Objectives subcommittee, but their efforts to coordinate an industrial intelligence campaign were amateurish beside the Americans.¹²³

Indeed, as in so many other respects, the British had surrendered an early lead in the field of technological plunder as well. Fearful of being left behind, the better organized and resourced Americans had cranked up their vast bureaucratic machinery to virtually swamp the British effort, and the nominally cooperative program had increasingly taken on the tone of an out and out competition for the spoils.¹²⁴ However, the hottest competition was with the Russians, whose attitude had been clearly signalled by September 1944. As Russian troops had advanced towards the Blizna missile centre in Poland Churchill requested to have a joint Anglo-American team inspect the site in the interests of ‘Allied cooperation.’ The request had been granted, but Soviet stalling tactics had resulted in the site being almost totally cleared before the inspection team arrived. What remained was packed in crates, which on arrival in London were revealed to contain rusting aircraft parts – obviously, the Soviets thought about as much of ‘Allied cooperation’ in matters of cutting-edge military technology as Churchill did.¹²⁵

So with the competition hotting up, each of the US armed forces soon acquired its own intelligence groups to add to the T-Forces. The Army had its Enemy Equipment Intelligence teams, the Naval Technical Mission was established to collect information useful in prosecuting the Pacific War, while the Air Force – late to join the game – established in April 1945 the aptly named ‘Operation Lusty’, with several hundred mobile teams to target aviation medicine, rocket and jet propulsion, air photography, radar and communications systems. For their part, the British had to make do with the 30 Assault Unit, the equivalent of the US Naval Technical Mission.¹²⁶

With all these groups and more running around at the front madly hunting for German technology and the German technologists who could explain its secrets to them, it was hardly surprising that the situation got completely out of hand. Not only did they get in the way of front-line activities, an almost cut-throat rivalry developed as everyone competed to make sure that their country – and their organization – got the goodies, despite the official CIOS policy of sharing the spoils. Similarly, the US and Britain both found themselves in competition with the French, who were taking steps of their own to maintain a hold on ‘their’ Germans or the military and industrial secrets they had left behind.¹²⁷ In addition, everyone accused the other of private plundering as representatives of Allied industrialists attempted, often with government support but outside government channels, to sew up deals with German and other European companies with ties to the Nazi war machine – in some cases within weeks and even days of the Normandy landing.¹²⁸ And everyone found themselves in competition with the Nazi hunters of the Allied war crimes investigations units, who wanted many of the scientists and technicians for their part in suspected war crimes.

But the greatest rivalry was with the Soviets, and in the days immediately prior to surrender and the weeks immediately after, opportunities to capture targets – and particularly the personnel who were the key to the exploitation program – had increased. The Alsos mission, responsible for Allied intelligence on the German atomic bomb program, after following the US 7th Army into Heidelberg had dashed across the front of the 1st French Army and on to Munich – 20 miles in front of US forces – and on the way rounded up the leading figures of German physics including Otto Hahn and Werner Heisenburg, while at the same time confirming Germany’s failure to make any meaningful progress on the bomb. The Air Force’s ‘Operation Lusty’ had taken control of the Hermann Göring Aeronautical Research Institute, including the scientist responsible for the swept wing, as well as experts in jet and rocket fuels and the use of wind tunnels. Even more staggering had been the discovery of the IG Farben scientists responsible for developing a previously unknown German nerves gas with the capacity to kill in minutes.¹²⁹

But the biggest treasure of all was found in Bavaria, deep within the intended Soviet zone of occupation. Indeed, while Eisenhower’s decision not to cross the Elbe and instead head south to Hitler's mythical 'national redoubt' had frustrated Churchill, it had delighted the scientific intelligence specialists. Secreted in the Bavarian Alps was the vast underground V-2 rocket construction complex at Nordhausen, and first on the scene had been a group from the US Army Ordnance Department's Enemy Equipment Intelligence Service working as part of the Department's top secret rocket and missile program, 'Project Hermes.' Arriving on April 11 on the heels of the US 1st Army, they had found what one member described as a "magician's cave", filled with precision machinery and V-1 and V-2 rockets in various stages of assembly. Nearby in the town of Oberammergau they found the leading scientists of the rocket project, including Werner Von Braun. They also found the wasted human remnants of Camp Dora, the SS controlled slave labour camp attached to the complex, where at least 20,000 prisoners had been killed through starvation, disease or execution either in constructing the mile long underground cavern from an abandoned salt-mine or in subsequent work on the assembly lines.¹³⁰ The intelligence men weren't concerned with that, of course – that was the concern of the pitifully under resourced seven member war crimes team that arrived days later, and who would soon forget about the patchy and inconclusive work they had done at Nordhausen by the time they reached their next investigation.¹³¹

With the Soviets due to take over the area in July, time was short, and on May 22 the order for mass plunder had arrived. In a spectacular operation the newly liberated slave workers were hired to salvage 400 tons of equipment, and over an eight day period requisitioned trains and trucks moved the material to Antwerp for shipment to the War Department's White Sands firing range in New Mexico.¹³²

Of course, the Americans weren't the only ones doing it: the British and French stole from the Russians, each other and the Americans as well. But the game of beggar-thy-neighbour's-Germans had soon shifted from the technology to the technologists themselves, and with the arrival of the Soviets imminent, the usual practice of on the spot exploitation of the scientists was abandoned in favour of their 'safe relocation' to the Western zones. For the most part this was accomplished in a hurried and disorganized way, and often without clearance, in spite of considerable uncertainty about the legality of the procedure. Nevertheless, a rich harvest of talent numbering in the thousands was taken, and by the time the Russians arrived in early July, they found the entire region virtually bereft of university and industrial staff. From the Junkers plant at Dessau CIOs teams took, among others, the entire staff of engineers; from the Zeiss optical works in Jena they took six professors and eighty three doctors of science. From Nordhausen alone, the Americans directed the evacuation of more than one thousand technicians and their families. In addition, Lasby notes that others were taken from the Technical Academy of the Luftwaffe in Bas Blankenburg, the Siebel Aircraft Company at Halle, the Telefunken Electronics facility at Eisenach, the Askania Aviation works at Morrsleben, the IG Farben Factory at Bitterfield, and the Leuna fuel plant at Merseburg.¹³³ Bowers notes that 1,300 technicians and their families were transported from Leipzig and Jena from the optical instruments works.¹³⁴ Not all of the German scientists were keen on leaving their homes and families. More than a few were persuaded at gun point. Others showed a strong desire to avoid capture by the Russians, fueled in part by Hitler's anti-Communist propaganda and tales of Russian brutality. Some like Von Braun even assisted in the selection of personnel to be removed, while others directed the British and Americans to hidden caches of documents and equipment and wholeheartedly participated in debriefing sessions. Often these caches had been prepared for this very purpose, to be used as bargaining tools and to be sold to the highest bidder.

With the scientists from the British and American as well as Soviet zone now safely in custody and crowded into specially designated camps, the question of what to do with them became pressing. The answer, of course, was obvious. Already an unofficial bidding war had broken out in the field to counter official French and Soviet offers of employment and emigration, and by early June a program of recruitment had been informally approved by the US Joint Chiefs of Staff. Similar moves were underway in Britain, where taking the scientists back to England was seen as the only way to combat the American vacuum cleaner tactics.¹³⁵ Neither country had in fact waited. The Americans had already imported a number of Germans useful for their contribution to the Pacific war, while dozens were already in England under 'indefinite interrogation.' Still, the appearance of cooperation was maintained: the British were informed of American plans and assured that the scientists would be screened to eliminate war criminals and undesirables, and the British Chiefs of Staff approved the plan in principle, with the conditions that only Germans useful in the Japanese war would be recruited, and the two countries establish a negotiating committee to eliminate competition.¹³⁶ None of those conditions, including the screening out of war criminals, quite came to pass.

Indeed, while the hunt for scientists had been proceeding apace another hunt had also been going on, often in competition with the first but with far fewer resources at its disposal. In comparison to the massive scale of the technical plunder operations, the war crimes effort can be described at very best as pathetic, with the contrast offering an illuminating commentary on the real priorities of the western powers in their prosecution of the war. Despite repeated Allied declarations of firm resolve to hunt down and prosecute war criminals, by the end of hostilities only slightly more than a handful of war crimes investigations teams had been formed.¹³⁷ And until May 12 the American teams did not even possess official authorisation to pursue crimes against anyone but Allied personnel.¹³⁸

Behind such apathy, of course, lay a long history of official neglect – a tale well chronicled by author Tom Bowers in his book Blind Eye to Murder. Only in late 1944 had a comprehensive plan along with an investigative agency emerged from within the US War Department – where the American buck had eventually landed – and only at the instigation of a number of senior officials who were motivated in large part by the fate of the Hungarian Jews, as well as anger at the State Department for colluding with the British in denying Jewish refugees entry into Palestine.¹³⁹ In contrast to the British approach, which was restricted to war-time crimes against Allied personnel and German nationals – and thus excluded Jews, whose German nationality had been revoked – American policy was now to prosecute all crimes committed in Germany since 1933, including atrocities committed on racial, political, and religious grounds. To enable this, new international crimes based on the concept of natural law such as 'crimes against humanity' and 'waging aggressive war' would be declared, and national laws would no longer be a defense against conviction under international law – they would simply be declared unlawful. In addition, each of the Nazi organizations e.g. the party, the SS, the SA and the Gestapo, would be prosecuted at a proposed tribunal as organizations, and on conviction each of their members would automatically become convicted as criminal co-conspirators.¹⁴⁰

The triumph of US policy was made a fait accompli when on February 1 1945 it was announced to the public. Having been forced into accepting the American initiative, however, the British continued to fight a desperate rearguard action to limit the damage, and on March 23 Lord Wright announced in the House of Lords that the target of the United Nations War Crimes Commission was to prosecute ten per cent of war criminals.¹⁴¹ His action was probably redundant because half-hearted moves to establish a British investigative agency had only begun the week before, while the American military, as reluctant as the British to take on the task, had already restricted the number of personnel to be assigned to the American agency and were refusing to approve any sort of directive until the issue of an international trial of Germany's leaders had been sorted out.¹⁴² That only occurred on May 5, when the War Department's plans for such a trial were approved by Eden and Molotov in San Francisco.¹⁴³ By then, however, the investigative agencies with their puny resources were already positioned well behind the eight-ball, and with the glamour job of preparations for Nuremberg taking up most of the time and attention of Washington and London, little effort could be spared for the effort of finding collective evidence against less celebrated war criminals. As it was, organization was virtually non-existent,¹⁴⁴ and many of the culprits simply took advantage of the chaotic postwar conditions to simply melt into background mass of uprooted humanity that was by then drifting around the shattered ruins of Europe or collecting in Allied DP and POW camps, soon to be released.¹⁴⁵

If the Allies had taken a less apathetic approach to the issue at the time, the controversy that erupted in later decades over the belated prosecution of war criminals could have been lessened, if not averted. Of course, the whole issue would have been a lot simpler if the West itself had a better record on war crimes, both in terms of its own breaches of international law and its WWI behaviour in using the issue as propaganda, and had it not, in fact, been waging war largely for reasons other than those given in its propaganda. But the fact is, the Western Allies often showed more endeavour in recruiting ex-nazis and fascists than in examining their records for evidence of war crimes and atrocities, and in due course the effects of that policy would extend far further than having to fend off accusations of harbouring war criminals. Recruiting German scientists and technicians was only the beginning. In their desire to get an edge on the Russians, the Western powers also recruited hundreds of ex-nazis and fascists to work as anti-Communist intelligence operatives. In doing so they naturally fell prey to the Soviet counter intelligence system which took the opportunity to penetrate western intelligence by placing double agents who compromised it for many years.

But the Allies' failure to pursue war criminals and bring them to trial showed that there was no real change from the attitudes which had enabled Hitler to pursue his Final Solution in the first place and the Jewish community was in no mood to simply forgive and forget on the basis that some 'higher purpose' dangled before them. Increasing world wide realization that reports of the number of Jewish victims in the Holocaust were correct and belief that the Christian democratic countries could have done much more to save Jews coupled with the lack of action in bringing war criminals to justice and fueled the growing mood of militancy in US Zionist ranks. On June 14 a report to the State Department from the Office of Strategic Services noted that these factors contributed to a prevailing movement towards extreme Zionism. Its authors concluded that the perception of a need for emigration and rescue was growing, along with disillusionment with the United States Government, and that the pro-Roosevelt Jewish public was taking its revenge at the ballot box. The authors also noted that leadership of the American Zionist Emergency Council could pass from Rabbi Wise to the more militant Rabbi Silver.¹⁴⁶

Reflecting that mood, a Conference of the Mizrahi, Zionism's religious wing, in early June demanded that the American Zionist Emergency Council be reorganized to include the militants and that Rabbi Silver be returned to political leadership. Rabbi Fishman told the Conference that two former British High Commissioners for Palestine should be prosecuted for war crimes for keeping Palestine closed to the Jews. Within weeks Ben Gurion informed the State Department that the Jewish Agency could no longer accept anything less than the granting of all their demands, including the immediate establishment of a Jewish State.¹⁴⁷

Zionist pressure on Christian members of Congress and on the administration from sympathetic American Christian groups increased at the same time. On May 18 United States Senators Taft and Wagner circulated a letter in the name of the American Palestine Committee, a Christian body, asking Senators to sign a letter to president Truman urging that immediate steps be taken to open Palestine to Jewish immigration in preparation for a democratic Jewish Commonwealth. Another member similarly petitioned members of the House of Representatives. They emphasized the humanitarian benefits of such a policy, sought to place the two houses of Congress on record as recognizing the "Hebrew nation" as one of the United Nations, and urged all "Hebrews" who wished to do so to "return to their national territory of Palestine" and to "reconstitute this territory within its boundaries as a free state."

Acting Secretary of State Joseph Grew was made aware of the petition and immediately attempted to head off Truman. Disputing its humanitarian effects, he emphasized that it went beyond any previous US commitments and that it might have embarrassing results, particularly since the Arabs were united in opposition to French policy in Syria and the Lebanon, and the US was urging restraint on the French. A moderated version of the letter was finally signed by 54 senators and 250 representatives. It asked that the president use his influence with Britain to open Palestine to unrestricted immigration and colonization, and urge all interested governments to join the US in moving "toward the end of establishing Palestine as a free and democratic commonwealth at the earliest possible time."¹⁴⁸ At Truman's request it was kept out of the press and not made public. Their American counterparts were being just as compliant as Chamberlain's press barons and Britain's press lobby.

A SINGLE COUNTERSTROKE

However, in the build-up to Potsdam it was the behaviour of the Soviets which was commanding the attention of the western Allies, although that, too, was beginning to throw a spotlight on the Middle East. In June the Turkish ambassador met with Molotov in Moscow for talks on a new treaty. Both the Turks and the British were aghast at hearing the Soviet price: the return to Russia of areas yielded to Turkey in 1921; agreement between the two governments on revision of the Montreux Convention prior to any international agreement; and Soviet bases on Turkish territory in the Straits within range of the Bosphorus. In addition Molotov hinted that if Turkey broke its alliance with Britain those conditions could be softened or even abandoned.

The Turks, with British support, firmly rejected the Soviet proposals. When the British asked the US to join them in a protest to Moscow, the Americans, having their own agenda, preferred to wait, judging the talks to be 'exploratory' and believing that such a show of support for the Turks would be regarded by Moscow as provocative. However Eden saw the Soviet demands as the first stage in an attempt at outright subjugation, and he was convinced that a firm line in Turkey was necessary to avoid similar demands elsewhere in the Middle East.¹⁴⁹

The country uppermost in the British Foreign Minister's mind was Iran. At Yalta the Soviets had refused to discuss future relations with Iran, and in the months that followed the chief concern of the Iranian government was possible Soviet interference in the north. Under the 1941 Tripartite Treaty internal security against pro-German subversion was Iran's responsibility, and on May 19 the Shah, being reluctant to ask Soviet permission to move troops into the Soviet-occupied area to quell disturbances for fear of establishing a precedent, asked that all foreign troops be withdrawn.

However that produced more dilemmas for both the young Shah and his American backers. Troop withdrawals were not technically required under the Tripartite Treaty, and while Iran still desired the presence of US forces, the Americans wanted to move their troops to the Pacific theatre, but Britain wanted to keep troops in south-western Iran to protect the oil fields and the refinery at Abadan. But unless both the British and US troops were removed the Soviets would stay, and the Shah feared that if they stayed much longer the north might be brought under permanent Soviet control, or worse, that the Soviets might intervene to install a new government loyal to Moscow.

In the event, the US Persian Gulf Command was terminated on June 1, and the Shah and his American allies were faced with an even more acute dilemma. Disastrous economic problems were fuelling popular disaffection, and corruption and poor administration were compounding difficulties in stabilizing the new government in the face of competing British and Soviet backed factions in the Majlis. The Shah then complained to the US Ambassador, immediately prior to Potsdam, that he was afraid to install a vigorous Prime Minister because the Soviets would accuse him of fascism, but if he didn't, administration would become even less effective and Soviet supported groups would gain in influence.¹⁵⁰

This dilemma was simply the first of a type which would become commonplace over the next forty years, as a succession of more or less unregenerate and undemocratic regimes, backed to the hilt by Western powers and competing vested interests, were forced by popular discontent and the threat of leftist, communist or communist-backed takeovers into ever tighter boxes of their own making. Indeed, it was a dilemma already being faced by Britain's puppet regime in Greece, where civil conflict had continued in spite of an agreement in February which ended the conflict between the leftist ELAS and the British and their rightist allies. As in Iran, the Greek conflict was linked to disastrous economic conditions, administrative incompetence, and gross corruption in the British-backed government, but the basis of it was that the rightists had sought to continue as if the (Varkiza) agreement had not even existed. Between February and July, as royalists, including many nazi collaborators, gained increasing control of the army and bureaucracy, as many as 20,000 members of the left and centre were arrested or executed.

Despite the repression, however, the leadership of the Greek Communist Party, the KKE, fell in with their Western European comrades in June and tactically chose to purge the party's militants, to pursue a parliamentary role, and to publicly recognize British dominance in the eastern Mediterranean. At the same time, the KKE joined with other Greek leftist and centre groups in demanding that planned elections be postponed because the state machinery was controlled by the right. Thus arose the Greek version of the dilemma: stability could not be assured until an elected government had the moral power to enforce it, but the British-backed government lacked the moral credibility to hold elections. Making the situation worse was the fact that many former ELAS members had fled into the mountains and some had crossed the border into Yugoslavia where Tito was providing training camps for the KKE.

If full-scale civil war was to be averted something had to be done, so on July 13 Britain and the US made a proposal to the Greek Prime Minister: joint US, British and Soviet supervision of elections. For the Americans, who had previously declined to get involved in Greece, their confrontation with the Soviets at last provided the motivation. Free and fair elections in Greece were necessary if they were to gain similar assurances for Eastern Europe, and thus not only prevent the solidification of a Soviet sphere of influence there but also prevent the Soviets from creating a precedent for recognizing unrepresentative governments elsewhere.¹⁵¹

Those aims were hardly consistent with the West's own behaviour in consolidating its own sphere of influence in Western Europe and the Americas, but the West did not want to debate that. Nor did it matter that the Soviets, in line with their agreement with Churchill, had studiously avoided having anything at all to do with Greece, or that their actions in Turkey and Iran were motivated by Great Power interests little different to those of the West: access to a warm-water port, oil, and border security. Nor, apparently, did it matter that the Soviet's methods in Turkey and Iran were no different to those of any other Imperial power. From the Western point of view, what mattered was that these disparate crises could all be shown to be expressions of one underlying factor: Soviet communist expansionism. Indeed, Soviet-fueled fires seemed to be burning on almost every front – not only in Greece, Turkey, Iran, and the whole of Eastern Europe, but Germany, Italy, Yugoslavia, and the Far East as well. Palestine, at any rate, seemed removed from the general conflagration, at least for the moment. The problem was, however, that there were simply not enough powerful diplomatic hoses to go around. So, faced with an awkward and demanding negotiating partner whose actions threatened their own plans for post-war peace and order, US political leaders were looking to another means to help neutralize the amorphous threat of Soviet expansionism in a single counterstroke – the atomic threat – masked as an offer of atomic partnership.

Of course an attempt to use control of the bomb as a diplomatic lever did not require that it be used in combat, but US political leaders believed that the credibility of that threat would be immeasurably enhanced if it was. However other people were pursuing policies with the potential to end the war before the bomb was ready or required. On June 9, the Joint Chiefs of Staff approved the final draft of a proposal for an “Immediate Demand for the Unconditional Surrender of Japan” which was prepared following its earlier May 9 decision to pursue modified surrender terms. Arguing that uncertainty over Russia’s future actions might lead Japan to sue for peace within a few months in order to prevent occupation – a correct assessment – the proposal was designed partly to preempt any such initiative. Addressed to the Imperial Japanese government, the proposed statement called for the “unconditional surrender of all Japanese armed forces under the authority of the Imperial Japanese Government and High Command.” This effectively acknowledged the continued legitimacy of the Imperial regime, and thereby removing the primary obstacle to Japanese surrender. The JCS recommended that the demand be made at a time when “the Okinawa operation has progressed sufficiently to insure its success.” ¹⁵²

Okinawa fell on June 21, but the proposal for an early statement was rejected by Truman, despite the fact that many of his advisers were arguing that time would be needed for its full meaning to be understood. ¹⁵³ The president’s reasoning, according to his memoirs, was that a statement issued later from Potsdam “would clearly demonstrate to Japan and to the world that the Allies were united in their purpose [and that] by that time, also, we might know more about two matters of significance for our future effort: the participation of the Soviet Union and the atomic bomb.” ¹⁵⁴

That retrospective “explanation” is more notable for what it omits than what it contains. In the first place, of course, it sidesteps the central issue of whether a later statement would contain a modification of terms. It sidesteps the issue of whether the Soviet Union would be included as a signatory, and thus fails to take into account the deep ambivalence felt by US officials towards the participation of the Soviet Union in the Pacific war. Both of those had a great bearing on the decision to drop the atomic bomb.

However, another statement in Truman’s memoirs highlights a crucial aspect of his understanding of these relationships. Noting that his “immediate purpose” in going to Potsdam was “to get the Russians into the war against Japan as soon as possible”, he further explained that “if the test [of the atomic bomb] should fail, then it would be even more important to us to bring about a surrender before we had to make a physical conquest of Japan.” In other words, Truman by his own account was well aware that Russian participation could end the war without an invasion and without the use of the atomic bomb.

That fact had again been highlighted by General Marshall at a crucial White House meeting on June 18 at which military plans for the proposed Kyushu invasion were finalized and approved with the Joint Chiefs. Assessing developments which might bring the Japanese to capitulate, Marshall advised the president that “an important point about Russian participation in the war is that the impact of Russian entry on the already hopeless Japanese may well be the decisive action levering them into capitulation at that time or shortly thereafter if we land in Japan.” In other words, as intelligence analyses were less cautious in arguing, Soviet entry into the war would in all probability end the war altogether. At the very least it would make a lengthy and costly invasion unnecessary. A pre-conference ‘Estimate of the Enemy Situation’ prepared by the US-British Combined Intelligence Committee noted that “an entry of the Soviet Union into the war would finally convince the Japanese of the inevitability of defeat”, and that “to insure the survival of the institution of the Emperor, the Japanese might well be willing to withdraw from all the territory they have seized on the Asiatic continent and in the southern Pacific and to the practical disarmament of their military forces.”¹⁵⁵

Marshall’s analysis, however, unlike the intelligence reports, made no mention of any clarification of the surrender formula which was by now widely regarded as being indispensable to securing Japanese capitulation. For example, a State department memorandum presented to the president around this time concluded:

*Every evidence, without exception, that we are able to obtain of the views of the Japanese with regard to the institution of the throne, indicates that the non-molestation of the person of the present Emperor and the preservation of the institution of the throne comprise irreducible Japanese terms....We are disposed to agree with the view that failure on our part to clarify our intentions in this regard, or the proclamation of our intention to try the emperor as a war criminal and to abolish the institution of the throne, will insure the prolongation of the war and cost a large number of human lives.”*¹⁵⁶

To that end, by late June almost all top US officials around Truman were in agreement that some clarification of terms should be attempted at Potsdam, and by the eve of the US delegation’s departure in early July, a draft surrender proclamation had been drawn up and approved by the Secretaries of War, Navy and State. The proclamation followed the Joint Chiefs’ proposals in explicitly calling for the unconditional surrender of the Japanese military under the authority of the existing Japanese government. It called on the Japanese government to permit the occupation of their country in order to ensure its complete demilitarization, announced the intention to restrict Japanese sovereignty to the four main islands, and threatened inevitable and complete destruction if they failed to accept. On the other side, it assured the Japanese that they would not be exterminated as a race or destroyed as a nation; that they would be permitted industries needed to sustain a reasonable standard of living; and that occupation forces would be withdrawn once their objectives had been accomplished and a truly representative and peaceful government had been instituted. It also added an explicit assurance that the Imperial institutions could be maintained. The initial draft stated that any postwar Japanese government “may include a constitutional monarchy under the present dynasty if the peace loving nations can be convinced of the genuine determination of such a government to follow policies of peace which will render impossible future development of aggressive militarism in Japan.” This was later changed at Potsdam on the advice of the joint Chiefs of Staff to read “subject to suitable guarantees against further aggression, the Japanese people will be free to choose their own form of government.” ¹⁵⁷

The option to include the Soviet Union as a party to the proclamation was left open and the draft was written without any dependence on the use of the bomb. The proclamation could be changed if and when the atomic test proved successful, although just how remains unclear, probably by toughening the warning of imminent destruction. As Stimson noted in a covering letter when he delivered it to Truman on July 2, the draft proclamation would have to be “revamped to conform to the efficacy of such a weapon if the warning were to be delivered, as would almost certainly be the case, in conjunction with its use.” Whether he intended the proclamation to contain a warning explicitly referring to the bomb, and even whether the proclamation containing the warning would be issued prior to an atomic attack, rather than after, is not specified. ¹⁵⁸ It is highly unlikely, however, that any such warning was intended to refer explicitly to the new weapon. Along with a demonstration, that had already been ruled out.

However another matter previously ruled out was included. In response to the concerns of the atomic scientists and the suggestion of its Scientific Panel, the Interim Committee on June 21 reversed its earlier decision about not informing the Russians on progress with atomic weapons. It recommended unanimously that the president tell Stalin that the US government was working on the atomic bomb and expected to use it against Japan, and that he broach the subject of international control for later discussion. That was not the only decision reversed at the meeting. It was also recommended that clause two of the Quebec agreement on atomic energy signed by Roosevelt and Churchill be revoked. Under that clause Britain and the US had agreed not to use atomic weapons against a third country without the consent of the other. Clearly, the United States wished to retain the unilateral right to use the bomb after the war as it saw fit. Nevertheless, on July 4 the niceties were preserved and formal British consent to use the bomb on Japan was obtained. ¹⁵⁹

CHURCHILL REJECTS A PROPOSAL ON PALESTINE

On June 25, two months after it opened, the San Francisco conference closed with the signing by delegates of the new UN Charter. Ratification by each of the member nations was scheduled for the following weeks, with the UN's first official session to open in New York in early 1946.

With Zionist militancy rising in the United States, a report was received in Whitehall on July 1 from Ambassador Halifax in Washington outlining his analysis of American attitudes towards the Palestine issue. He noted the widely held belief that Britain's wartime adherence to the White Paper had impeded the salvation of many Jews, and he argued that Zionists would be able to carry with them both liberal humanitarians and anti-Semites. In Halifax' view, "the average citizen does not want [Jewish Displaced Persons] in the United States and salves his conscience by advocating their admission into Palestine." In addition, he also noted that Zionists would be able to play on anti-imperialist sentiment, adding that killing Jews would "violently inflame" public opinion, but as there was no Arab constituency to counter the Jewish vote, violence against Arabs would not. He also emphasized the position of Jews within the administration, as well as the extent of the Jewish vote in New York which could be decisive in election years. He suggested, therefore, that while the State Department might be inclined to the Arab case, US sympathy for British interests in the middle East would be greatly prejudiced, and he proposed that Britain offer to share its mandatory responsibility with the US, or at least attempt to associate another great power with Palestine.

Churchill's response is instructive. In an incredible display of bitter resignation, or perhaps blind weariness, the man who had battled so long and hard to keep the Empire intact wrote to the Colonial Office and Chiefs of Staff, "I do not think we should take the responsibility upon ourselves of managing this very difficult peace while the Americans sit back and criticize...I am not aware of the slightest advantage which has ever accrued to Great Britain from this painful and thankless task. Somebody else should have their turn now." In sum, it was an indictment of Britain's entire Middle Eastern policy.

However, while the Secretary of the Colonial Office sympathized with Churchill's sentiment he acknowledged some likely effects on Britain's strategic interests, the analysis of which he left to the Foreign Office and Chiefs of Staff. Between them they prepared a long list of disastrous consequences: Palestine was a bottleneck of land communications and a main centre of air routes for the Empire, as well as the location of a key oil terminal, and US control of Palestine would mean British dependence on them for maintenance of its vital strategic interests in the area; there would be no direct access to Transjordan, British bases in Iraq would be isolated, and land routes through the Persian Gulf would be subject to US consent. The Foreign Office also noted that politically the US would regard any such offer with suspicion and would be unlikely to accept. Moreover, the Russians would demand a share, and the Arabs would consider the move a victory for Zionism.

In sum, the FO suggested, "abdication on Palestine would be regarded in the Middle East as symptomatic of our abdication as a Great Power, and might set in train a process which would result in the crumbling away of our influence throughout this region." The CoS concurred. Handing over the mandate would lead to a loss of Britain's "predominant position" in the Middle East and "the psychological effects of this on world opinion are incalculable."¹⁶⁰

But whatever the desires of Whitehall, other developments suggested that keeping the Americans out of affairs in Palestine was not going to be a simple matter. Already President Truman was taking steps which would soon have a profound effect on Britain's position in the Holy Land. On June 22, in response to Zionist pressure, he had directed America's representative to the Inter-Governmental Committee on Refugees, Earl Harrison, to pay special attention to the situation of Jewish displaced persons in his investigation into the conditions in all DP camps in the US zone in Germany,¹⁶¹ and Senator Wagner discussed the American Palestine Committee resolution with the President on July 2, and also wrote urging him to raise the issue at Potsdam. In reply, Truman referred to the matter as a "problem of profound significance in world affairs", and promised "early consideration of the issue."¹⁶²

Truman's actions weren't the only ones presaging trouble for the British. In mid-June, agents of the Jewish Agency's immigration office, Mossad, arrived in Italy and, linking up with Zionist groups which had begun to spontaneously organize in the camps of Europe, began systematic planning for large-scale illegal Jewish immigration to Palestine.¹⁶³ Similarly, while in the United States, Ben-Gurion was also making practical arrangements to meet the main challenge he foresaw as eventually facing the Yishuv – war with the Arabs. On July 1 in New York he met with seventeen Jewish millionaires sympathetic to Zionism and asked them to set up a special fund to meet the Yishuv's defence and immigration needs. A committee headed by businessmen Henry Montor and Rudolph Sonnenborn was formed to establish a fictitious company called the Sonnenborn Institute. Ostensibly set up to deal in agricultural and medical equipment, it was also intended to commission experts to buy up, at bargain prices, obsolete military equipment and machinery from munitions factories closing down at the end of the war. According to Cohen, the Institute eventually became, in effect, the American arm of the Hagana.¹⁶⁴

POTSDAM

On July 6, with a draft surrender proclamation in hand, the US delegation to the Three-Power peace conference embarked on the USS Augusta on its ten-day journey to occupied Germany. Unknown to those aboard, however, a dramatic new development had been set in train which cast all preceding deliberations on the Far East in an entirely new light. On July 12, as the Augusta reached mid-Atlantic, US intelligence intercepted a cable from Japanese Foreign Minister Togo to Ambassador Sato in Moscow which stated: "we are now secretly giving consideration to the termination of the war." The next day another intercept confirmed that the move was coming from the highest possible authority: "His majesty the Emperor, mindful of the fact that the present war daily brings greater evil and sacrifice upon the peoples of all belligerent powers, desires from his heart that it may quickly be terminated." The second cable also confirmed the assessment that continued insistence on unconditional surrender was blocking Japanese capitulation: "so long as England and the United States insist upon unconditional surrender the Japanese Empire has no alternative but to fight on with all its strength for the honour and existence of the Motherland." The cable concluded: "it is the Emperor's private intention to send Prince Konoye to Moscow as a special envoy with a letter from him containing the statements given above. Please inform Molotov of this and get the Russian's consent to having the party enter the country."¹⁶⁵

Just what Konoye was to propose remained unknown. He never went to Moscow. Sato was forced to leave his message with a Soviet Deputy Minister of Foreign Affairs under the pretense that the Foreign Minister was busy preparing for his departure for the Big Three meeting. Though the Japanese did not realize it, the Soviets had no interest in what they might have had to say. A request to mediate in surrender negotiations would have interfered with the Soviets' wish to enter the war and thus to stake a claim in the occupation of Japan, as well as consolidate whatever gains could be had in Manchuria and Korea. There was little Japan could offer them that they hadn't already been given or had it in their power to take. However neither the Japanese nor the Soviets were aware that the American delegation on board the Augusta was also in possession of the contents of the cables, thus laying the basis for a complicated two-way charade when the Allied heads of Government finally met at Potsdam a few days later.¹⁶⁶

At 5:29:45 am on July 16, at roughly the same time as the US delegation arrived at Potsdam in the outer suburbs of Berlin, the first atomic explosion in the history of humanity took place at a test site in the New Mexico desert 200 miles south of Los Alamos and 60 miles from Alamogordo. The test site was code-named Trinity. Though those who chose it were no doubt unaware of its appropriateness, no better name could have been found to represent the issues which had been the direct reason for the project coming into being – Hitler's persecution of the Jews – and which had decisively shaped the great hostilities of which the project was a part. In his first words of reaction to the event, however, Robert Oppenheimer eschewed the biblical images of his Jewish heritage in favour of a quotation from Hindu scripture: "I have become a destroyer of worlds."

First brief news of the successful test reached the president and new Secretary of State Byrnes in Potsdam on the evening of July 16. At noon on the 17th Stalin called on Truman and stayed for lunch. The conversation touched on various subjects which were on the conference agenda, but of primary interest to the Americans was the situation relating to the Far East. Truman received Stalin's assurance that the Soviet Union would enter the war on August 15, regardless of the outcome of the conference. Stalin also reported that he had not yet reached agreement with Chinese Foreign Minister T.V. Soong, who had arrived in Moscow on June 30 for negotiations over the implementation of the Yalta Far Eastern accords. Talks had now been suspended for the period of the Potsdam Conference. No mention was yet made either of the bomb or of the Japanese request for Soviet mediation.

DON'T LET THEM STOP NOW!

Significantly, however, the Americans already knew the status of the Soong negotiations, since Soong had reported everything to the US Ambassador in Moscow and had sought guidance on how the accord was to be interpreted. Just as significantly, the Americans also knew that Stalin would not commit Soviet forces to the Far Eastern theatre until final agreement was reached with China. Thus arose the opportunity for another game to be played out. Having received Stalin's assurance that Russia would enter the war, the Americans were now going to do their best to make sure that it didn't.¹⁶⁷

Later on the afternoon of the 17th official discussions began. Uppermost on the agenda were the major outstanding issues of the European peace. Seizing the offer to chair the conference's plenary sessions, Truman ran through the United States' proposals. Regarding Eastern Europe he immediately went on the offensive, demanding the immediate reorganization of the governments of Bulgaria and Rumania to include representatives of all significant democratic elements, with the Big Three to consider how best to assist any resulting interim governments in the holding of free and unfettered elections.¹⁶⁸ The president also outlined proposals for the normalization of relations with Italy, which envisaged the eventual release of Italy from Allied custody and its admittance into the United Nations, as well as free elections to install a new government with popular support that could attend to the rapid improvement of the by now disastrous domestic economic conditions. That, of course, was an attempt to consolidate Italy's position within the Western fold – a policy guaranteed to warm the heart of the Vatican. Proposals were also presented for the Four-Power administration of occupied Germany which reflected a decisive shift in US policy away from a repressive approach towards rehabilitation. A moderately strong and united Germany was now considered essential to stabilise Western Europe economically and politically and to act as a bulwark against further Soviet encroachment on the continent.¹⁶⁹

Among other US proposals, the most important was for the creation of a Council of Foreign Ministers to include China and France as well as the Big Three, which would be responsible for preparing peace treaties with ex-enemy states prior to a general peace conference, as well as any other matters referred to it. In part the proposal was motivated by desire to avoid the disorder of Versailles, where too many voices had reduced peace negotiations to a bickering shambles. However, it also had another significant dimension – the first Foreign Minister's conference would occur only after the demonstration of the bomb. The proposal received relatively speedy endorsement. London was chosen as the permanent seat for the Council, and the first meeting set for the September 1, 1945.¹⁷⁰

Prior to that decision, things also began to move in relation to the Far East – which was not in fact on the official conference agenda. Following the first plenary session Stalin had informed Churchill of the Japanese peace overtures, asking him to raise the matter with Truman on the grounds that he did not want the president to think that the Soviets wanted to act as an intermediary. Churchill obliged the next day. Truman and Byrnes then met with Soviets, and Stalin gave them a copy of the letter presented by Sato with the message from the Emperor. Truman, of course, gave no indication that he had already seen it. Stating that he had no regard for the good faith of the Japanese, he suggested Stalin should decide how to reply. Stalin stated that in view of the fact the Soviet Union was not yet at war with Japan, he should reply that the letter was vague and that he could not give a conclusive reply. Truman agreed. That night in Moscow the Japanese received the Soviet response.

That effectively gave the Americans the green light to proceed with the finalization of their proclamation to the Japanese. Significantly, Admiral Leahy, head of the JCoS, submitted a memo to Truman suggesting that the existing text relating to the retention of the constitutional monarchy be changed on the basis that it could be construed as a threat to the present Emperor. The memo read in part: "From a strictly military point of view consider it inadvisable to make any statement or take any action at the present time which would make it difficult or impossible to utilize the authority of the Emperor to direct a surrender of the Japanese forces in the outlying areas as well as in Japan proper."¹⁷¹

While matters related to the Far East appeared to be proceeding cordially, it soon became apparent that there was little on the official conference agenda that the Three could agree on, including the most important issue on the agenda: Germany. Before any proposals could be considered another matter had to be dealt with – namely, what was meant by Germany? Was it to be divided, and where were its frontiers? Those questions inevitably dragged in the hotly disputed issue of Poland's borders, which despite the political agreement reached between Stalin and Hopkins was yet to be resolved. Eventually after two days of heated argument assent was given to Truman's suggestion that Germany should be defined by its pre-1937 borders, not including Austria, and without much ado the idea of partition was dropped once and for all. The important aspects of the American proposals dealing with the political and military control of occupied Germany also received general assent. Four basic principles were agreed to, providing for: disarmament and demilitarization; denazification; education of the German people to accept their total defeat and responsibility for their position; and preparation for Germany's democratic reconstruction and the reintegration of a peaceful Germany into international life. In addition, the US also proposed that all weapons and facilities for their production should be seized or destroyed. After brief discussion, with no mention of the cut-throat competition for technological spoils which was well underway, it was decided that specialized research facilities should be held at the Allies' disposal or destroyed, and the Three agreed to share in their use.¹⁷²

That last issue had been effectively swept under the carpet, but there were others not as easily ignored. Recalling a few days later the agreement to divide Germany according to its 1937 borders, Truman suggested that it seemed that the Soviets had given the Poles a zone of their own, which had vastly complicated matters. He was friendly towards the Polish Provisional Government, and full accord could be reached on what the Soviet government wanted, but it ought to be achieved by consultation. Stalin argued that a final decision could be left to the Peace Conference, as had been agreed at Yalta. Truman was happy to agree, but Churchill was adamant, and no agreement was reached.¹⁷³

As the stand-off on Poland emerged among the three leaders, an equally heated argument was going on elsewhere at the conference over the economic principles which would govern

Germany – particularly reparations policy. Discussion of that had been soured by the acrimonious breakdown of the Reparations Commission in Moscow and the dispute over Poland made it worse. Having repudiated the Morgenthau Plan, the Americans were now in favour of the economic as well as political rehabilitation of Germany, and the British were in substantial agreement. At the same time, neither Britain nor the United States wished to be forced to pay for German reconstruction, and thus also indirectly subsidize the Soviet Union. Both were thus committed to the ‘first charge’ principle, which required that German export earnings pay for essential imports before reparations could be considered, as well as to the idea that reparations be allocated to each of the powers according to an overall percentage of an unspecified total to be drawn from Germany as a whole.

The Soviets, however, wanted Germany to meet its reparations obligations first and have imports restricted to what was left, and they wanted a fixed sum to be exacted to ensure the outcome and prevent the Germans from cheating on their responsibilities – as the Americans had agreed at Yalta. The United States and Britain in response argued that too many elements of Germany’s future could not be forecast – too much German property had been destroyed to meet Russian demands, there was the question of frontiers, and, of course, they did not want to pay. So discussions got nowhere.¹⁷⁴

However, the tangle of issues centred on Germany and Poland was not the only one causing a deadlock. The Foreign Ministers had also reached a stalemate over American proposals for Eastern Europe. Molotov wanted immediate recognition of the countries of Eastern Europe on the basis of their contribution to the war against Germany, and claimed that Allied supervision of elections was unnecessary. More attention needed to be paid to the chaotic and anti-democratic situation in Greece, he said. Eden and the British were incensed. The Russian charges were a travesty of fact! Soon afterwards the issue became entangled with Italy, with Molotov demanding that the Eastern European states be included in the proposals, but only after the Americans had attempted to compromise by restricting their proposals to a request for Allied supervision of elections, now also to include Hungary. None of these positions were acceptable to everyone, and another impasse had been reached.¹⁷⁵

The conference appeared to be stalled. However, on the afternoon of July 21 reports were received of the very successful atomic test, and these caused a significant change in attitude among the American delegation. The results were immediate.

At the plenary session immediately after receiving the reports, Truman markedly stiffened his attitude towards Eastern Europe, repeatedly refusing to discuss the matter further. After reading Grove’s report the following morning Churchill admitted to Stimson that he could now understand why the president had appeared a “changed man” the previous afternoon. He stated that he now felt the same way and, told Stimson he was inclined to “use it as an argument in our favour in the negotiations.” Similarly, as Alperovitz puts it, “Stimson... was momentarily so moved by the initial indications of its [i.e. the bomb’s] power that he advised Truman that the weapon might enable the United States to force the Soviet Union to abandon or radically alter its entire system of government.”¹⁷⁶ However, the Americans weren't yet prepared to put the bomb on the table. Instead, they pulled down the shutters.

On the same day as Groves' report, Stimson received a message that the bomb would be ready for use in the first clear weather period of August. The next day Truman wrote the order for its use and the following day a cable carrying Truman's signature was sent from Potsdam to Chinese Foreign Minister T.V. Soong advising that he should return to Moscow to continue negotiations with the Soviets, but stand firm and make no further concessions. Though Soong was unaware, his negotiations were to be used as a delaying tactic to prevent Soviet entry into the war. A draft of the surrender declaration was also cabled to Chiang Kai-shek for his approval. The assurances for the status of the Emperor were omitted and no mention was made of the bomb. That same day, July 23, it was confirmed that the bomb would be ready between August 1 and 10, probably August 4 or 5.¹⁷⁷

Also on the 23rd Byrnes floated a new proposal on Germany. Instead of all three sharing in what could be had from all of Germany, as had been agreed at Yalta, each would draw from its own zone, with possible barter between them. There would be no fixed target and the idea of percentages was dropped. The implication was that because the Russians occupied predominantly agricultural areas, the West would get the lion's share. Molotov knew that if the Three failed to reach agreement, the result would virtually be the same. There was almost nothing for the Soviets.

Throughout the war, policy on Germany had been dictated by the need to cooperate with the Soviets to ensure that Germany could be kept down. The bomb had now changed that and, from the American point of view, cooperation was no longer needed. Referring to the bomb in the security context of reparations, Byrnes told former Ambassador to Moscow Joseph Davies, “in the last analysis, it would control...”¹⁷⁸ The Americans made it clear that they were prepared to leave the conference if no further agreement could be reached. It was a case of take it or leave it.

Or not quite. Before anything further could be dealt with, the conference was suspended while the British delegation returned home to await the outcome of the 1945 general election. Prior to his departure Churchill made a further attempt to secure agreement on the issue of Poland's western borders, and it was reluctantly decided to invite the Poles to the conference. Their presence on the 24th changed nothing and on the 25th after one last attempt to change Stalin's mind, Churchill departed for home. He did not return. The Conservatives were voted out of office. Labour was in power.¹⁷⁹

Prior to the departure of the British Truman had taken steps to deal with another delicate matter. Following the plenary session on the 24th he casually informed Stalin, in private, that the United States had recently come into possession of “a new weapon of unusual destructive force.” Stalin, according to Truman, merely replied that he was glad to hear it and hoped that the Americans would make good use of it against the Japanese. Those observing felt that he clearly did not understand the import of Truman's advice. They were wrong. As documents released from Soviet archives have shown conclusively, Stalin not only knew about the successful test of the bomb, he had known almost as soon as Truman – and in almost as much detail.¹⁸⁰ Truman's motives in approaching Stalin in that manner were, however, clear. Telling Stalin too much about the bomb risked the possibility that the Soviet Union would rush to declare war against Japan. In the event, however, Truman's lack of candour failed to prevent an early Soviet attack. What it did do was effectively kill the prospects for postwar international cooperation on atomic weapons controls before any proposals had even been tabled.¹⁸¹

On July 26 the Potsdam declaration was issued. The conference resumed on the 28th with Churchill's wartime deputy, Clement Attlee, as the new British Prime Minister and former trade unionist and Minister for War Production, Ernest Bevin, as Foreign Minister. Pending their arrival, Byrnes had busied himself on a new set of proposals. On the 30th he put them on the table. What he proposed was a package deal, comprising three papers dealing each with German reparations, the Polish frontier, and the positions of Italy, Bulgaria, Finland, Hungary and Rumania. They comprised the final US position. If they weren't accepted as a whole, the Americans would leave on August 1. The era of the atomic bully boy had arrived.

With respect to German reparations, Byrnes maintained his earlier offer. Each power was to satisfy its claims by removing capital equipment from its own zone. In addition, the Western powers would agree to transfer to Russia a fifth of the surplus capital plant located in their zones, half of which would be exchanged for food and coal delivered from the Russian zone to western Germany. The issue of what constituted total available surplus capital was left to the Allied Control Commission to work out. With respect to Poland, the western border was to remain as it had been assigned by the Russians on an interim basis, pending a final German peace treaty. With respect to Italy and the states of Eastern Europe, peace treaties would be left to the Council of Foreign Ministers. The question of recognition was papered over with a vague formula which asserted that "the three governments agree to examine each separately in the near future, in the light of conditions then prevailing, the establishment of diplomatic relations with Finland, Rumania, Bulgaria and Hungary to the extent possible prior to ratification of peace treaties with those countries."

The Soviets had little choice but to agree, and following a final four hour plenary session on July 31 in which minor changes to reparations percentages were agreed, the package received assent. In effect, it was an agreement to postpone agreement. All the major decisions had been left for the future.

There is only one possible explanation as to why the Western Allies might have believed it worthwhile to postpone the major decisions of the conference: they thought that a significant new factor would be introduced into the international equation between the time the conference ended and the time when the issues would again be picked up. And there was only one thing which would have provided such a factor: the atomic bomb.

CHAPTER 27

WE'VE MADE IT ... THANKS TO HITLER'S GENTLE PERSUASION

The war was over. The bomb had been dropped. It need not have been. The leaders of the United States, Britain, the Soviet Union and Japan all knew that. But the leaders of the United States, Britain and the Soviet Union each had their reasons for not disclosing it. It would have totally undermined their justification for their conduct in the closing stages of the war. And none of those three could afford to let the Japanese be heard saying it. So Gog and Magog set about disentangling themselves. The people of Gog (or was it Magog?) in Germany and Japan were in a state of total shock, abject and total subjugation after total defeat, totally demoralized and in disgrace because the victors said the whole fiasco had been their fault right from the start. But the partners of Magog (or was it Gog?) were also in a state of disarray, squabbling between themselves over the spoils of victory and over whose socio-economic system was to prevail.

As after World War I, so after World War II: the great European colonial powers wanted a return to the prewar situation and an assurance of control in and over their rightful overseas 'possessions' which they had expected to regain from the dastardly aggressors – plus a share in the colonies, dependencies and mandates of the defeated powers which formed part of the bounty of war – and all without too much of a struggle from their restless subjects. One question had to be resolved: for the purposes of colonial largesse was Italy to be counted as one of the victors or the vanquished? There was soon to be some degree of disappointment all round. Their churches knew that there was a lot of bridge building to be done, but they hoped to be able to return to all of the areas from which they had been expelled – in collaboration with the returning powers of course – and the Vatican nurtured its aim of Catholicizing each of Russia, China and Japan in the process. The churches were also to be sorely disappointed.

In sharp contrast, America wanted none of that European pipe-dreaming. As it had made clear in setting its preconditions for joining the Alliance and in the negotiations about how to win the war, the great 'New Israel' wanted those European powers to stay out of Asia, Central America, Latin America and Africa so that it could fill those enormous power vacuums by one means or another – preferably without armies – exploit their resources and take advantage of the other economic opportunities which its dominance of the world capital market would ensure under its proposal for a world free trade system. But, because of its fear of possible Soviet influence in South East Asia, it had been cornered into agreeing to the return of the European powers during the closing stages of negotiations for the establishment of the United Nations and the Trusteeship Council at the San Francisco Conference. (Chapter 26) The war in the Pacific had started as Britain's dual purpose war to maintain its place in the Far East and to distract Japan from intervening in favour of Germany in a move against Russia which would have further weakened Britain's security. But when Britain became dependent upon US support to maintain its position and was forced to disclose how weak its position was, the emphasis changed distinctly. Then when Churchill refused to consider a negotiated peace when Japan was in front, and forced an expansion of the war it had become, in reality, America's war against Japan for the status of top dog in Asia.

Naturally the US administration was happy to retain its working relationship with the Vatican which had become very intimate and had developed a degree of mutual dependence during the previous six traumatic years. It was also happy to recognize a working relationship with the other wings of the church as well, but they were not very well organized. They were fragmented and they didn't really have much political clout. However they could all be very helpful in its struggle with Socialism and Communism and they could be ignored when their influence was not vital or when their interests in human rights might even be an embarrassment or a distraction. And there was the matter of the Christianization of Japan. Its resistance had been so great that this was a task barely started. Now was the time. This was the opportunity. Japan could be occupied for as long as it took, and the churches would certainly have a role in that.

However Russia wanted nothing to do with either of those grand plans. It had its own grand plan. A world of centrally planned and coordinated national economies in which resources would be used more or less uniformly for the benefit of all people, under the guidance of the Soviet Union as senior partner, of course, and it would look after the church in its own way. And the countries of Asia, Central America, Latin America and Africa wanted nothing to do with any of the European, American or Russian plans. They simply wanted their independence and they wanted to determine how they would develop, how (and with whom) they would trade and how they would worship for themselves. They couldn't have it. The great powers said that everything should be the same as before the war. Or most of them, anyway. That swirling, highly agitated mix of conflicting interests guaranteed that there would be no easy transition from war to peace. Not everyone could have everything that they wanted. There were too many conflicting interests. The power brokers in all three sectors of the victors' camp were quick to realize this and there was deep seated mistrust between them.

TIME FOR A BIT OF PLANNING

One thing was certain. Every country which had been physically, economically or socially affected by the war would need a greater degree of planning – and government participation in the planning process – than had previously been the case. With the exception of the Soviet Union, the general practice had been for governments to concern themselves only with the provision of basic infrastructure such as roads, port facilities, water supply, sewerage, education, allocation of land, a system of currency exchange, a system of civil and criminal law and justice, defence, and a system of taxation to finance these things. There was no such thing as a uniform approach to any of these things. Systems and practices had evolved on the basis of local communal or cultural customs, perceived needs, the availability of finance and technology, the level of demand related to total population density, the physical and climatic environment, religious belief, and the extent of isolation or foreign contact and intervention. Change had been taking place gradually and at an accelerating rate in response to population growth and increasing density, the development of technology and, in particular, more extensive foreign contact and intervention due to developments in transport and communications. From the occurrence and impact of some of these matters during the previous four hundred years it is apparent that change was circumstantial and not spontaneous, that no one pattern suited every situation or every community's needs and self-understanding, and that the larger and more complex a society became, the greater its needs for social and economic organization became.

For example, a 'simple' rural community generally had little need for organized welfare or support services because extended family cohesion and support was strong. With urbanization such cohesion and support began to breakdown and the need for organized services became greater. This was illustrated by the way in which colonies of people suffering from communicable diseases which were (at that time) incurable, notably leprosy, were left to fend for themselves on the fringes of urban areas. The need became greater still as modern transport made freedom of movement and relocation easier and weakened the extended family still further. Population growth made the need for organized health services greater, but it was Europe's devastating wars, starting as early as the Crusades, which led to the organization of hospitals. Then its ghastly high-tech wars from the mid-nineteenth century prompted the establishment of regular professional nursing services. But even when the need for a particular service was well established, the way in which it should be provided was subject to great debate. Education and the roles of the church and the state illustrate this. So do transport, power generation and supply, and communications. Some countries, in each of Europe, the New World and Asia, left these to individual initiative, and where the profitability of an enterprise was likely to be good, private investors were eager to grasp the opportunity to introduce and sell the service. But where population density or likely profitability were low, the government was expected to fund and administer the same services as a national obligation. Then there was the matter of land allocation and the exploitation of resources.

LAND, RESOURCES AND COMMUNITY

Systems of land ownership and rights, or tenure, and the way in which agricultural production was organized evolved slowly until the fall of Constantinople and the push for colonies, but the tempo then changed and at the end of the Second World War the situation was very complex and confused. A brief review of those years helps put the matter in perspective.

As humanity progressed from a nomadic to a settled lifestyle the matters of land use and land tenure became fundamental to the idea of 'community,' and then, as systems of government also evolved, the allocation of land and rights to use it became a primary function of community leaders or 'government.' In many, many cases the 'ownership' of land fell into the hands of a few wealthy and powerful families, and oppressive feudal systems came to dominate much of Europe. This led from social tension to crisis, to revolution, and, with the church heavily involved and benefiting from the system, the situation became complex indeed. In other cases, when mechanization began and techniques such as irrigation required a lot of planning, effort and money for development, the fragmentation of land holdings led to inefficiency, low production and equally serious social problems. This meant that reform to their land tenure systems could never be far from the minds of government, and the first serious attempts at reform can be traced to six or seven hundred years before the church even came into existence, in biblical Judah, Greece and, later, Rome.

The church can claim that Jesus did not draw up a program for a new world order, that he did not give directions for the administration of justice, or overturn the system of masters, slaves and hired workers, and that he did not demand either the total surrender of personal property to the community or the state, or a more just distribution of property. On that basis it can claim that it had to use its own corporate judgement in exercising the authority which it claims to exercise on his behalf. But it is the land use philosophies and regimes of Rome and Greece which it subsequently became involved in, and it did have the guidelines of Jesus' teaching ministry to work from. Jesus' advice to one wealthy young man was to sell everything and give the proceeds of his property to the poor if he wanted to inherit eternal life. He then remarked that it was easier for a camel to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich man to enter the kingdom of God. [Mark 10:17–27] One of the early fathers of the church, Gregory of Nazianzus, who had a key role in defending the Nicene Creed against attack at the Council of Constantinople, probably had that in mind when he maintained that private property and covetousness contributed to the 'Fall,' but he did not advocate the abolition of private property. He pressed instead for the sharing of property and wealth, saying that Christians should contribute to communal property and acts of charity. Thomas Aquinas (chapter 8) later maintained that private property was rooted in positive law through human reason and that the common good was served by everyone having disposition of his own property. However he qualified that by saying that private property exists to serve the common good, and superfluous property should be distributed as alms to the needy. In fact the church also had the precedent of Judah to which it should have paid more attention.

The system of land use and tenure which the Prophet Ezekiel laid down for the Hebrew people to adopt when they returned to Judah from their exile in Babylon was logical, practical and fair. It provided for the allocation of land on a tribal or community basis, with hereditary transfer and use on a needs basis; for the needs of the dedicated religious community; for the urban needs of the community-at-large; and for foreign settlers and refugees as well. (See Ezekiel chapters 45, 47 and 48.) That regime provided stability and the basis of a system which could have been adapted to allow for population growth while avoiding the capitalization of land and the inequities and problems which soon became apparent under alternative regimes. If the church wanted to get involved in the socio-economic systems of the empires with which it became enmeshed and to provide for the stability of its religious organization – which it did – it could have taken that Judaic system into the big wide world with it. And if it wanted a ready made basis in theology for its decision, this was it. But it did not. It wanted to make up its own as it went along. It wanted to distance itself from Judaism.

Outside the Holy Roman Empire during the centuries which followed there was continuing movement and change in first one direction, then another. However within the Holy Roman Empire there was no real movement for reform, because of the intimate relationship between the church and the empire, until Luther and his colleagues became embroiled in disputes between the peasants and the princes. (Chapter 10) Subsequently, while the Age of Enlightenment blossomed during the century between the English and the French Revolutions, a number of great thinkers began to raise issues relating to the land tenure and land use to cope with, or to lead, social and economic development. Public debate became a complex mix of religion, law, land rights and politics as they sought to make sense of the oppressive feudal and urban landlord and tenant systems as a first step. In fact an important trigger was water and floating property, not land.

THEOLOGY GETS IN THE WAY AGAIN

A Dutch Calvinist lawyer and theologian, Hugo Grotius, was asked to write a legal opinion for the Dutch East India Company in defence of an action brought against it for the seizure of a Portuguese vessel. In a treatise On the Law of Prize and Booty he stated the defence that the operations of the kingdom of Spain and Portugal had deprived the Dutch of their trading rights and were contrary to free access to the oceans for all nations. That would hardly seem to be a controversial stand to take, but the Arminian controversy over Calvinist understanding of predestination was building up, and to imply free access to anything and the right of seizure of property ran counter to some interpretations of predestination. He was asked to write another paper for the Province of Holland which was in dispute with the Calvinist majority of the States General for the Netherlands over related issues. A fine point of theology was again dividing a nation. Grotius was seen to be a part of the opposition to the dominant Calvinist understanding so in 1618, together with provincial leaders, he was arrested. Some lost their heads. He was only thrown in gaol for life. The following year the States General convened the Synod of Dort (chapter 12) which resolved the debate in favour of the dominant Calvinists. 'Election' was pronounced unconditional. Free will was on the outer. Grotius could stay where he was. He did, for another two years. Then he escaped. While in gaol he had started drafting an introduction to the jurisprudence of Holland which he finished in exile and published in 1631. It was so influential that it became the basis for the laws of South Africa. On the matter of land, Grotius insisted that it was lawful for the state to expropriate private property, provided its action was for a public purpose and that just compensation was paid. That was contrary to the prevailing Calvinist view that if a man was predestined to own property it could not be taken from him.

Thirty years later a German Lutheran professor who had trained in theology but turned to law, Samuel von Pufendorf, built on the work of Grotius and refined the theory of property rights and their origin. Property, he said, was founded in the physical power put into effect in the seizing or occupation of property, but to convert the fact of physical power into a recognized right required the sanction of the state. Both occupation and state approval were therefore necessary, in his view, to make a property legitimate. Then, turning to the question of people as social beings, he said that every individual has the right to equality and freedom on the basis of human dignity and there is no such creature as a 'natural slave.' Master-servant relationships could exist only on the basis of an agreement between them. The Synod of Dort's pronouncements on predestination were taking a beating, but he didn't stop there. In 1687 he published Of the Power of the Christian Religion in Relation to the Life of a Citizen in which he set out the civil superiority of the state over the church, the freedom of conscience of the individual and the need for tolerance, although he supported the church's authority in ecclesiastical matters. The churches took him seriously. His views became the basis for revised church council structures and, eventually, church-state relations in Germany. However he did not have any success in another direction. Like Grotius, he was among the very first ecumenists. When Grotius led a trade embassy to England he took the opportunity to discuss with King James I the need for reunion of all the Christian churches. Von Pufendorf was not quite so adventurous, but he pressed for the formation of a United Protestant Church through the merging of the Reformed and Lutheran Churches.

Eighty years later, during the 1760's, realizing that England's laws were in no shape to cope with the pressures of increased population and social tension, Sir William Blackstone, the first person to offer lectures in English law at an English university, decided to codify its existing laws in a four volume set of commentaries. One volume, Things, dealt with the law of property. Property was, he said, along with life and liberty, an absolute right of an Englishman. By an Englishman he appears to have meant an English new businessman. The nobility had already lost their right to demand money from freehold tenants. The point of tension had therefore shifted away from the relationship between the lord and the free landowner and towards the relationship between the landed gentry and the growing number of wealthy urban businessmen who wanted to acquire land. Blackstone was certainly not a reformer. If anything, the effect of his work was to maintain the status quo. He was consolidating the trend towards possessive individualism which was peculiar to the Western World and away from recognition of communal needs and rights. He was in tune with the idea that a state could declare 'title' to land, regardless of its existing use or the interests of other parties, and without considering that the granting of such title was, in fact, the appropriation of common land or land on which other peoples may have roamed, grazed or enjoyed unspecified benefits. He was therefore in tune with the sordid 'age of discovery' triggered by the papal bull Rominus Pontifex (chapter 9) which was based on the idea that a European monarch could simply declare sovereignty over territory unseen, and then deliver personal 'title' to it – complete with the minerals or other sources of wealth which lay on or beneath the surface. Perhaps that is why his Commentaries were eagerly accepted as standard references and some of his ideas were taken up, in due course, in amendments to the constitution of the United States.

But some thinkers disagreed with Blackstone's approach and Jeremy Bentham promptly wrote a critique, referring to "the antipathy to reform" as the "grand and fundamental" fault in Blackstone's work. Later he took a distinctly different approach, supporting usury, broadening the understanding of property and legislation, and saying that any conduct or legislation could tend to produce pleasure and happiness for the common good or help to avoid the pain, misery and unhappiness which mischief may cause. It follows from that, that conduct of legislation may also have the opposite effect and tend to cause unhappiness and misery instead. In property matters, he said, the object of legislation must be "the greatest happiness for the greatest number."¹ Two of the other great philosophers of the age – Immanuel Kant and Georg W.F. Hegel – also entered the property debate to some extent although they are better known for their influence in other areas. When Kant stepped from morality, law and physical geography into religion, he was soon in dispute with the Prussian authorities on the right to express religious opinions. He was charged with misusing his philosophy to the "distortion and depreciation of many leading and fundamental doctrines of sacred scripture and Christianity." In contrast, Hegel's philosophy was so firmly grounded in Christian belief that he saw the idea of Godhead as having passed through nature worship and art before it reached full expression in Christianity so that religion was approaching the stage of absolute knowledge and the authoritarian stance of the church was justified by its role.

RELIEF FROM FEUDALISM

However, Bentham's comments show that the pace of change had not satisfied everyone. Within months of the publication of his Introduction to the Principles of Morals and Legislation the National Constituent Assembly in France had decreed the abolition of feudalism (August 4, 1789) and introduced the Declaration of the Rights of Man and of the Citizen (August 26); the king had refused to ratify it; the Parisian mob had marched on Versailles, and the French Revolution was in full swing. (Chapter 13) Two months later the new regime had forced through the abolition of the feudal system, nationalized the lands of the Catholic Church to pay off the public debt, and begun the redistribution of land. Three years later Bentham was honoured with French citizenship. But civil peace was still some years away and among Napoleon's early moves after he assumed power was the codification of the abolition of feudal rights under the Napoleonic Civil Code of 1804. From that point, the countries of Europe lurched from one change to another and the industrial revolution, accompanied by the early stages of the world wide population surge, made mineral and petroleum extraction and urbanization in a colonial and imperial environment issues of major importance alongside the use of land for agricultural production. The pressure for land tenure reform increased dramatically.

So did the range of motives which drove the movements for reform. The abolition of feudalism was joined by conflicting pressures to change the mix of private, communal or cooperative, and public ownership; demands for rights of access to extract resources; the need to protect the farming classes or the remaining peasants from subjugation by (and dependence upon) those who might be in a position to exploit them; the right to alienate agricultural land for non-agricultural purposes, urbanization, and the need for transport and service easements; the allocation of areas for public access, recreation and protection of the environment; and, in the overseas colonies, the establishment of 'reserves' for indigenous populations. In America the Spanish had simply 'segregated' the indigenous population – that means pushed them off their lands; the Dutch authorities had entered into formal treaties with the Indian populations; the French had introduced a modified feudal system; and the British had simply 'bargained' with who ever appeared to be the rightful owners, and in due course their resistance had led to indigenous Indians being forced onto reserves in some regions such as Virginia, New England and Plymouth. It was not until 1763 that the concept of Indian land title was introduced to reduce the encroachment onto those reserves by land speculators and miners.

Property rights for married women were established in the United States in 1839. Easement rights which ended the idea of absolute or exclusive rights of ownership, were introduced in England in 1848, but these weakened the rights of existing property holders so their rights had be clarified in a series of acts during the later years of the nineteenth century. And at the same time Marx and Engels' Communist Manifesto (chapter 14) delivered a resounding attack on the basic concept of private property. They maintained that private property was nothing but a device in social warfare between the capitalist classes and the proletariat which enabled the proletariat to be kept in subjection through the exploitation of their labour. Soon after, in 1861, Russia took its first imperial step to reform by allocating land to emancipated serfs on a collective or communal basis, and a series of further steps were taken from 1905, progressively converting and dividing the collective farms into individual private holdings. In due course the enormous demands placed on land as a physical asset and as the primary factor in human industrial settlement became so great that various Western governments realized they had to intervene more systematically. The first of many comprehensive town planning and housing acts was introduced in England in 1909. Then, with the Bolshevik Revolution, Russia went through a crash program of disastrous peasant land takeovers which led, during the 1920's to the compulsory introduction of huge collectives.

THE DEPRESSION AND 'TEMPORARY' PLANNING

The situation then changed dynamically with the impact of the Great Depression. The collapse of the United States and world economies at the end of the 1920's drew attention to the lack of consideration given to economic planning during the Versailles Treaty negotiations. Right through that period Western government involvement in domestic economic planning had been generally limited to providing agreed public works and essential services; basic education; the minimum social and welfare services to satisfy the basic needs of the population; and an environment in which the private sector could function as it wished. The system of taxation was supposed to provide those essential services (in addition to a justice system, civil policing and national defence) with minimal interference in the monetary system. But the extent of social dislocation and trauma made it necessary for governments to take steps to increase employment through public works programs and import controls to protect local industry, and to strengthen the welfare support systems. The most dramatic government intervention took place in the United States under Roosevelt's New Deal. (Chapter 18)

At the same time Americans began to realize that the idealistic definitions in their constitution were not appropriate for a situation of land saturation in the modern industrial world. Under Roosevelt's New Deal in the 1930's (chapter 18) they reluctantly accepted the first Restatement of the Law of Property in the United States. Whereas property rights had been sacrosanct and state interference or regulation had been vigorously opposed, the law was changed so that federal and state regulation of the economy could no longer be challenged on the simple ground that it constituted a deprivation of property rights. The courts began to uphold direct restrictions on the use of property which were imposed under zoning and planning regulations.

Then the Second World War required quite dramatic government intervention in economic planning. At first the need to recruit men for the armed services provided some social relief and tightened national economies in a number of countries by soaking up the unemployment which remained as the world climbed out of the Depression. But that pattern was short lived as the continuing need to recruit led to a shortfall in manpower available for industry and the introduction of manpower planning and direction, and the recruitment of women into the Western world's work forces for the first time. Then the management of resource supplies became necessary so that raw materials were channelled preferentially into military supplies, armaments and munitions rather than domestic consumer goods. This was followed by direction of manufacturing capacity, tight controls on housing and non-essential construction, and measures to stimulate food, fibre and other agricultural production. Public works virtually came to a standstill. Tight monetary controls were complemented by savings campaigns; and the rationing of foodstuffs, clothing and petroleum fuels – even the introduction of daylight saving – had both a resource management and a finance management aspect.

So: when the world found itself moving into a post war era the victor nations knew exactly what they had to deal with in national economic plans including currency control, resource supplies, welfare services, infrastructure – and land tenure. They were geared up to deal with them in their own domestic economic planning, even if it meant a lot of disputes and financial restraint. And having identified the land tenure arrangements which best suited them from their long experience in an evolving industrial pressure cooker atmosphere they knew exactly what land tenure system they wanted to impose as they asserted, or reasserted, their imperial authority in their colonies, dependencies and trust territories. They were all geared up to slip into their new neo-colonial roles.

RADICAL CHANGES

However many of the countries outside of Europe, notably the smaller countries in and around the Pacific, had for a long period enjoyed well established and well understood systems of traditional communal land tenure which were equitable and stable in an agricultural environment and which they saw no reason to change. Others had systems of traditional feudal land ownership which were certainly not equitable. But under both of these systems ownership of extractable resources usually lay with the holder of the land and the payment of royalties was a matter for negotiation. The first colonial era had therefore opened up a whole new area of debate. The land being commandeered or 'acquired' and settled was assumed to be vacant, or at least subject to the whims of the colonial power in those areas in which it could impose its will. In areas where colonial administration had not yet become effective it was 'finder take all.' But once colonial administration took effect, exploitable resources were regarded as the property of the crown to be allocated as it wished. The concept of title to land took on a whole new meaning with the systems of the imperial power being imposed, possibly with virtual absolute title, various forms of leasehold, and mining rights subject to crown allocation, fees, taxes and perhaps royalties. In countries in which the colonial power had been able to expropriate only part and not all of the land, traditional and new Western systems operated side by side.

In all cases the dice was loaded heavily in favor of the foreign 'developer' who held the weapons, the technology and transport to markets or processing plants, the wages sheets and all the goods which the meager wages paid might buy. That fact ensured 'peace,' or at least acquiescence and what passed as political stability. There was no great debate about the provision of infrastructure and services under non-representative colonial government, partly because the church missions were always there alongside the government, eager to demonstrate through the provision of schools and basic health care that they were doing God's work and to take advantage of those services in either evangelism or proselytizing (depending where they were) with the full protection of the colonial government. But once either elected representative government or self-government was achieved, real debate about whether infrastructure services were a national responsibility, a church responsibility or a commercial opportunity gradually surfaced – enmeshed in the question of whose land it was all taking place on and what compensation would be paid. Then when the war came and for a time it looked as if Japan's plan for a New Order in East Asia was about to be realized they sat it out and waited for better times. They were to be disappointed. When the victors prepared to resume their roles as (neo)colonial powers they did all they could to camouflage or suppress the expectations of a new order, and they did not take account of the fact that until midway between the two world wars, a mere fifteen years earlier, they also had much simpler economic and planning arrangements themselves.

Naturally, with the end of the war everyone, whether they were in Europe, the New World or the colonies of Asia and Africa, wanted an end to controls and rationing, and in the Western World this implied an end to centralized planning. But breaking the links between planning and controls was not easy. Rationing could not be lifted until consumer goods supplies returned to normal, otherwise the inflationary pressures would have been excessive, and considerable re-investment was required to enable a return to consumer goods manufacturing. Public works and housing had run down so that resources and manpower made available by the discharge of service personnel had to be channelled into those areas. In the case of housing, the planning emphasis had to be on providing adequate numbers of houses rather than their size and quality, and deficiencies in domestic production had to be offset by increased imports which then required increased exports to balance foreign exchange. Government intervention in economic planning could not be avoided. The need to balance the demand and supply of goods and services, savings, manpower and foreign exchange was as great as ever.

The private investment sector was therefore perfectly happy to support economic planning – when it suited its purposes. It was happy to have regional development which was aimed at a better urban-rural relationship, provided that it was stimulated by tax incentives, grants, concessions, depreciation allowances, assisted migration, and public housing to encourage such settlement – if it did not compete with the private sector. It was also happy to have government investment in non-profitable transport extensions to service the regions, and in communications which required high investment with uncertain short term returns. But it was not happy to have controls on its activities which were planned to avoid the side effects of those activities or to ensure responsible balanced investment in the national interest. Its argument ran that market forces would look after the national interest by filling any gaps as these widened and naturally become “attractive.” Things like pollution controls, land clearing, timber felling and mineral extraction controls to avoid environmental degradation and undesirable social impact were unacceptable. So were employment policies designed to avoid social pressure on disadvantaged groups such as those suffering disabilities, and minority indigenous and other ethnic groups facing isolation and rejection because of either blatant racism or language difficulties. The churches and charities were supposed to provide for such groups.

But the thing which the private sector opposed most was continuing direction of resources, production, finance and manpower: the basis of a socialist planned economy. It was not very difficult to merge the concepts of centralized planning and state ownership in the public debate, and in a very short time anything which looked like rationing, control or direction was labelled ‘communist,’ and the pattern of political campaigns was set for years to come. And in the international arena the Bretton Woods institutions (chapter 25) would ensure that any country which was tempted to ‘stray’ away from the free enterprise Capitalist track would be suitably discouraged – especially dependent territories and those in the trusteeship system. In the area of planning there was therefore very little which the Western Allies and the Soviet Union could agree upon.

HEADS OF AGREEMENT

There were, however, a couple of things they could agree on.

The first was that the Jews would have to go without their own state. They, too, were expected to return to their pre-war status. They could share Palestine with the Palestinian Arabs and call it their 'homeland', but they would have to be content to have most of their surviving people resettle in the countries of Europe from which they had been displaced, or in other countries around the world. But not Palestine. They had to realize that it would be too disruptive for a completely new state to be carved out of the limited territory occupied by Arab peoples under a mandate agreed to after World War One. But the Zionist organizations around the world did not see it that way. They believed they had received a promise from Britain; that their suffering at the hands of firstly Christian Europe and secondly Hitler, entitled them to preferential treatment. They also believed that the Allies, because of their non-intervention at critical times, had a responsibility to make good Britain's promise and the preferential treatment to which they were entitled.

The second thing that the great powers could all agree on was that there was a greater need than ever for an international body which could help to regulate world affairs to the extent that it prevented wars, maintained stability, and in a vague sort of way protected human rights and ensured development. They certainly could not agree on what defined 'stability', 'human rights' or 'development.' Everyone had their own perceptions. Everyone expected the world to agree to their definitions and aspirations. And everyone hoped to either retain their favoured positions or to use the mechanisms provided by international agreement to slough off their disabilities and attain a favoured position also. Under the stimulus of a series of earlier discussions and declarations a total of 51 'Original Members' therefore adopted the Charter of the United Nations on June 25, 1945, two months after the conference opened in the San Francisco Opera House (chapter 26) while most of them were still at war with Japan.^{2,3} The UN Charter then came into effect on October 24, 1945, when a majority of the signatory countries had ratified it. The aims, principles and proposed organs were indeed good. To save succeeding generations from the scourge of war ...to reaffirm faith in fundamental human rights ... the equal rights of men and women and of nations large and small ... self-determination of peoples ... justice and respect for the obligations arising from treaties and ... international law ... social progress ... tolerance ... armed force shall not be used ... economic and social advancement of all peoples ... sovereign equality of all its members ... all administered through a General Assembly, a Security Council, an Economic and Social Council, a Trusteeship Council, an International Court of Justice and a Secretariat. However the built-in facts of life, the dominant influence of the major powers and their presumption that whatever was best for them was, by default, best for the whole world ensured that (irrespective of the complications of veto powers) the fulfilment would not match the dream.

DECOLONIZATION? PERHAPS.

The influence of the American campaign for decolonization which Roosevelt had pushed so hard during the lobbying which brought the US into the war, was evident in the drafting of the Declaration Regarding Non-Self Governing Territories, the International Trusteeship System and the composition and functions of the Trusteeship Council. That push was motivated by three basic factors. One was America's sympathy for people under colonial rule as a consequence of its own colonial experience and its struggle for independence. Another was genuine humanitarian concern for the human rights of non-European peoples. And another was the want, or perhaps determination, of dominant financial and industrial leaders in the United States to get the European powers out of Asia and Africa and to keep them out in order to open their markets for US 'participation' - 'decolonization' - and to do this in such a manner that there would not be a power vacuum which could be filled by Soviet-style communism.

But the intention of the European powers to stay put and to regard the colonial control of non-European countries as the norm was also evident in the drafting of the declaration. It states: "Members of the United Nations which have or assume responsibilities for the administration of territories whose people have not yet attained a full measure of self-government recognize the principle that the interests of the inhabitants of those territories are paramount, and accept as a sacred trust the obligation to promote to the utmost, within the system of international peace and security established by the present Charter, the well-being of the inhabitants of these territories ..." The members undertook to respect the culture of the people concerned, to ensure their just treatment, to develop self-government, to take account of their political aspirations, and to make no distinction between the rule of their metropolitan regions and the territories. However a number of facts were being conveniently ignored. Colonial status was not 'normal'; all such 'territories' had at some earlier stage been self-governing even if their forms of government were very elementary; they had either been invaded and subdued or annexed; they had deliberately been made dependent upon the administration of the occupying powers; and the rights of many indigenous populations within the 'great powers' had been suppressed even more than the rights of people in their colonies and territories. The same circumstances also applied to a number of other countries which now gloried in the status of independent members of the United Nations.

The people of the great powers very conveniently forgot the circumstances in which they had become colonial powers and the motives which had driven them, or their forebears, into that status. In earlier chapters we noted the ebb and flow of waves of people across Europe, each of which contributed to the evolution or the development of the racial and ethnic mix of the continent. Some of those waves were invasions for the purpose of extending imperial boundaries to acquire tribute (taxes), to improve imperial security, to secure supplies of resources or simply to trade. The government of the invaded areas sometimes involved the appointment of a provincial governor supported by an imperial garrison, but more often it involved a tribute-paying suzerain or vassal relationship. In some cases the invasions were basically large scale migration for resettlement and did not involve the imposition of foreign government or suzerainty. There was usually continuity of contact by land between the imperial power and the subordinate power. In fact the extent of an empire was determined by the limits of direct physical contact and the empire's ability to secure its perimeter, or its boundaries. The exceptions were when the territories were on opposite sides of the Mediterranean or when only elementary short-distance navigation was necessary to maintain contact by sea. And there was usually little difference in the primary racial composition of the populations. If we apply the accepted primary terms for the Euro-Afro-Asian land mass of 'white' for the populations of the Europe-Near East ecosphere, 'black' for that south of the Sahara, 'yellow' for China and East Asia, and 'Dravidian' for the Indian sub-continent, then there were substantial invasions or incursions by yellow peoples, but little contact with, or influence from, either Dravidian or black peoples.

A UNIQUE SYSTEM ...

This means that the European colonial era began in unique circumstances. The European powers were prompted by papal reaction to the Muslim occupation of Christian Constantinople; they were responding to domestic population pressures and the need for either food or space, or both; and they were able to take advantage of developments in sailing ship design and navigation technology which were then taking place. (Chapters 9, 10 & 11) Thus, when they burst through the boundaries of their ecosphere and made incursions into the ecospheres beyond, there were several factors which had not applied when other peoples invaded Europe. First: they were going into areas with which they did not have continuous land contact. This mean that if they were going to stay and settle they had to establish systems of government or administration different to those which applied when there was unbroken land access. Second, the people with whom they came in contact were racially distinctly different. Third: those people did not have the firearms technology with which to oppose them. To the Europeans they were therefore regarded as backward. That 'backwardness' was then linked, in the European mind, to their racial difference to suggest to the Europeans that the people they had "discovered" were of an inferior race. The European "discoverers" then related this to a fourth factor: religion. Their church had always insisted – and made them repeat it regularly in the Athanasian Creed – that anyone other than a Christian was inferior. (Chapters 2 & 3) They needed no more proof than that. These people, apart from some in the Indian sub-continent and the islands of Indonesia where Islam was already established, were not even from one of the other Abrahamic faiths. They were therefore to be treated as subjects, or chattels, or to be dispossessed, or to be simply disposed of if they were a nuisance, according to the degree of their inferiority which the Europeans assessed. Such policies were implemented forthwith.

The factor which determined whether a 'new' territory would be governed as a colony, with the governor backed by a regiment or two, or under suzerainty as a 'protectorate' maintained by the threat of naval intervention, depended partly on the primary purpose of the settlement, the degree of difficulty to be faced in imposing control from Europe, and on the likely competition for control from other European powers – the ‘security’ factor. If it was a reasonably strong community with some military capacity of its own, and if expanded trade was the primary concern, then a protectorate was fine. But if resource extraction, large scale primary production and settlement, or the establishment of a penal settlement were the main aims, then colonial governance was essential. It was also essential if there was likely to be a takeover bid by another of the European powers, and at times that ‘threat’ was used as the justification for the establishment of small private armies by wealthy colonial settlers when their real purpose was the suppression of indigenous communities or security from other squatter settlers.

However the situation had not been static before the colonial era burst and it certainly was not static afterwards. The establishment and control of the new-style colonies and protectorates which were beyond the unbroken and secure land perimeter of an empire was made possible because of the availability of long-distance ocean-going sailing ships. Thus it was the same factor – sailing ships enhanced by the addition of navigation aids and mobile firepower – which changed the concept of ‘empire’ from a continuous land mass with a secure perimeter into a cluster of scattered and disparate communities which had only one thing in common: they were all controlled from a distant central point. Gradually a second factor emerged as they were all progressively ‘settled’ or occupied and controlled by an elite minority community which had either migrated, sought refuge, or been transported from the imperial heartland or “home country.” These people imposed and entrenched the administrative, legal and commercial practices and trade restrictions of the imperial power, and, with them, the ethics and religious beliefs, practices and self-understanding of the people who happened to control the empire at the time of occupation. That second factor was a sense of cohesion or affinity with other units of the empire, coupled with a corresponding acceptance of the need to defend that connection against intrusion by competitors and an inevitable sense of animosity towards anyone who was not part of that empire. Europe’s bigotry and hang-ups were exported en masse and these soon built new barriers between adjacent communities. These became particularly important in the case of small enclaves which assumed particular religious character when these were sandwiched between larger states which were aligned with an empire of a different religious persuasion. Quite unwittingly a series of triggers were being placed which would contribute to massive explosions in the current phase of the trouble in the triangle. Thus the European Colonial era introduced considerations into world affairs which had not been present in earlier phases of imperial expansion and competition.

... FULL OF BENEFITS

The value of a colony or a protectorate and the benefits from retaining control of it, changed progressively with advancements in technology, especially in transport, communications and industrial chemistry. With those changes went massive commercial investment which, if it had been made at home, would be regarded as a commercial risk. In the atmosphere of an overseas adventure the investors anticipated bigger gains from their investments than they normally could expect at home, and while they knew there was greater risk involved, they were not prepared to see their investment as a risk venture, and the imperial governments were expected to provide security as well as opportunity. Security, protection of privilege, or defence against competitors became an ever increasing burden. Then another spiral began. As additional colonies were established further and further afield, the primary purpose of some of them became security and service for the trading fleets or defence for others which had become very attractive take-over targets for other colonial powers or overthrow and ejection by the host countries or their neighbours. Aden became, for Britain, a service and security post on route to India and beyond; Singapore became, likewise, a security base for the Far East, and additional posts were needed to secure the privileges which it had extracted from China. The European colonial powers – and Britain in particular – were re-learning the lessons of ancient Rome. The costs and problems of securing a multitude of colonial outposts were even greater than the costs and problems of securing an unbroken imperial land perimeter. A weakness in the middle of a network, as in the case of Palestine and the Suez Canal, meant that the entire network may unravel. The greater the level of colonial investment became, the greater became the home country's dependence on the production and profit from it, and the greater the security required to sustain it.

The concept of a benign colonial presence is nonsense. A colony exists only to serve the interests of the imperial power. If it no longer provides a benefit, whether direct or indirect, the imperial power can, and does, walk away. Even if it goes of its own free will and accord and then provides support or development assistance from a distance there is always a price tag. Strings attached. But at the same time, although colonial rule and exploitation generate antagonism and nationalism within the subordinate country, it builds an elite and a middle class which benefits from the imperial presence and investment, becomes dependent on it, and is reluctant to see a reversion to independence or a cast off. If there has been a reasonably enlightened policy of infrastructure development, especially in education, health and transport, the colony can have experienced a greater rate of real economic growth and community development than would otherwise have been the case. But that is not necessarily the case. Nor is it justification for either the original colonial intrusion or continued colonial status. So: when the United Nations planners set out to prepare guidelines for the management of colonies, trust territories and dependent territories, the question of decolonization was not at all straightforward. The war had complicated matters considerably.

The great powers all confirmed, by wanting to hang on to their colonies and dependencies and by being prepared to fight to stay, that the benefits of being there far outweighed the costs of colonial administration. Their want to stay was even greater than before the war. The emphasis in back room politicking over how to win the peace shifted heavily towards integrated economic planning and forward strategic defence. The devastation left in the wake of the war made it absolutely essential to think planning instead of accepting that free market forces would put everything right. Governments had to be involved as well as private enterprise.

Reconstruction and further development to ensure employment for the repatriated armies as well as the growing population would require far greater quantities of raw materials than had previously been required or readily available. It was well known that many of those raw materials – resources – were more readily available in the non-Western world – the continents of Africa, Asia and the Americas – than in Europe. That required consideration of several big issues: how to ensure access to them; how to stop the central planners of Soviet style economics from getting control of them first; and how to maintain the momentum of the overheated production capacity which had been built up in the United States to cater for the needs of the war, so that the US economy did not collapse into another heap of unemployment. As the war drew to a close there were already people in the West saying that Europe could only be rebuilt without another social catastrophe with careful integrated planning. Without it there would be political upheaval and demands for Soviet style economic control and centralized ownership of resources and direction of production. But such central planning was anathema to the free enterprise operators of the Western world. The United States had got on famously without it, due to the massive resources available almost without scratching the surface, and it was not about to change now.

These issues provided the backdrop for discussions about decolonization and which classes of territories should come under the direct supervision of the United Nations Trusteeship Council. The big issue was whether all non-self-governing colonies and dependencies should be subject to the authority of the Council in addition to territories held under mandates from the League of Nations which were still in operation, and those which would be declared trust territories as a result of the Second World War. The division of non-self-governing territories into two or more groups was as Ross points out, artificial, lacking any rational foundations and solely due to accidental historical circumstances.⁴ They were all products of the European colonial era and the philosophy and self-understanding of the amorphous Christian gel. The ‘accident’ was whether they were unfortunate enough to have been colonized by one of the powers which had been defeated in war from the time that international intervention (or government) in such matters began to take effect through the League of Nations and its successor the United Nations. Those which had been colonized by powers which were defeated in war prior to that time had simply changed hands as a part of the bounty of war.

A QUESTION OF DEVELOPMENT

The non-self-governing territories all fell within the so-called under-developed areas – those in which circumstantial technological development had not taken place at the same rate as in the more ‘advanced’ countries, even though some, notably India, had a very rich heritage and extensive commercial systems. They had not concerned themselves greatly with the technology of warfare and this contributed to the ease with which they were subjugated. They included 750 million people,⁵ or close to one third (31 per cent) of the world population of about 2,405 million at the end of the war, but this figure fell by approximately half to an estimated 395 million people, or about 16 percent of the world population when India was belatedly granted its independence in August 1947, two years after the end of the war. If one accepts the proposition that integration into the economic and political systems of the dominant powers is either desirable or necessary and that it can and should be carried out at the fastest possible speed, then it follows that a certain level of economic and social development is "a necessary precondition for a satisfactory transition to self-government."⁶ However that proposition is debatable and will in due course bring us back to the question of human understanding of the relationships between humanity and God, and the rights and responsibilities which flow from that relationship. But in the circumstances of the close of the Second World War debate tended to polarize between those of the anti-colonial group who argued strongly in favour of increased technical and financial assistance to the remaining colonial areas, and those who argued that political independence is the best stimulus to economic progress and that every colonial administration should be ended. There was an overriding assumption that whatever form of government was decided upon, the developed world retained the 'right' to exploit the resources of the under-developed world and that the governments of those territories had to be 'advanced' enough to accept that 'right' and to manage the fruits which were supposed to flow from it and the development of their domestic economies.

The framework for the trusteeship arrangements was basically determined between the United States and Britain, and the right to exploit the territories was not at issue – only the form of government, the extent of international supervision and the role for the prewar colonial powers. Roosevelt and Hull pressed for all non-self-governing territories to be subject to United Nations supervision, and that provision was included in a preliminary draft proposal by the State Department in 1943. However Churchill resisted the proposal, claiming that it was interference in Britain's affairs, and the US Army and Navy Departments did not like it either. The issue was therefore left open during the four-power negotiations at Dumbarton Oaks late in 1944 and the final arrangements were agreed at Yalta in February 1945, leaving only two months for the other 47 governments to consider them before they met in their rubber stamping exercise at San Francisco in April. The non-mandate territories would be subject to UN supervision only if the colonial powers voluntarily agreed.⁷

The position which was eventually adopted in drafting the trusteeship arrangements, (chapter 26), was that the arrangements which Britain and France had negotiated in the heat of battle with the mandated territories of the former Turkish Empire, (Lebanon, Syria, Palestine, Transjordan and Iraq), were allowed to stand and they moved towards independence; and the remaining twelve territories which were still governed under League of Nation's mandates became trust territories administered by the mandatory powers, subject to the oversight of the Trusteeship Council. There were some exceptions. Territories which had been administered by Japan were to be transferred to the victorious powers. Italy eventually retained trusteeship only over its portion of Somaliland, and it was reluctantly acknowledged that South West Africa would continue to be administered as a mandated territory by South Africa which refused to acknowledge the role of the Trusteeship Council. The other non-self-governing territories, the colonies and dependencies, were to continue under existing arrangements except that the colonial powers were obliged to foster their greater well-being, as distinct from independence, the UN gained limited powers to supervise that obligation, and the colonial powers were invited, but not obliged, to report on their administration to the Trusteeship Council.

The net result was that twelve countries gained United Nations authority to administer a total of 88 non-self-governing territories which included eleven trusteeships and one continuing mandate. They were: Britain 49 (including 3 trust territories); France 27 (2); Portugal 8; United States 8 (1); Netherlands 4; Australia 4 (2); New Zealand 3 (1); Belgium 2 (1); Spain 2; Italy 1 (1); Denmark 1; South Africa 1 (a continuing mandate, not a trusteeship). But even the 'right' to administer particular trusteeships involved disputes. The prizes were worth arguing over and the process of approving trusts was long drawn out. Eight trusteeship agreements were approved by the General Assembly in December 1946, two during 1947 and one, Somaliland, hung in an occupied limbo until December 1950: five and a half years after the war ground to a halt.⁸ Two trust territories each remained split between Britain and France instead of being merged: Togoland and Cameroon. One, Nauru, involved a three-party trust because three countries (Australia, Britain and New Zealand) were jointly reducing it to a rugged mound of exposed rock as they carted away its phosphate resources. And one, the Italian sector of Somaliland which had been cut into three sectors by Britain, France and Italy as they contested control of the Horn of Africa, was not resolved until Italy's 'rights' as the former colonial power (victor or vanquished?) had been resolved at the expense of its sparring partners. Twenty million people lived in those trust territories.

There was an underlying implication that the colonial powers should not only strive to achieve good colonial government in the sense of taking a paternal and human interest in the needs and aspirations of the 'native' peoples, but that they should eventually end their colonial rule. It was also generally agreed that good colonial rule was not a substitute for self-government and that the long term aim should be self-government. However this was not written into the agreement and at first it looked as if little had changed, in terms of attitudes and philosophy, since the days when sailing ships anchored off sandy beaches and governors, backed by a posse of soldiers armed with single-shot muzzle loaders, parleyed with local chiefs for the rights to settle and drive them off their land. Leaders who had never experienced the complexities of Western political and economic systems and whose people had never held a telephone hand set or signed a cheque were expected to negotiate over the future of their resources and the welfare and way of life of their people with high-powered executives from the board rooms of the Western world.

The appearance of little change was reinforced by the fact that even though the United States – the Western World's champion of decolonization – was concerned that the European powers had been so weakened by the war that they may not be able to reimpose their authority in South East Asia, it agreed to support their return. It was more concerned that Communist groups were gaining a strong position in Indochina and that the door for American access to markets and resources might be shut, first there and then elsewhere, and this led it to pursue a strategy of forward defence, or virtual encirclement of its perceived philosophical and economic enemy, by declaring that the Pacific was an area vital to its defence. It was confident of retaining bases in the Philippines, Alaska and Hawaii, but it wanted additional bases as well. The United Nations promptly obliged. Having declared the Pacific an area of strategic significance under its own direct supervision, in 1947 it awarded trusteeship over the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands (Micronesia) to the United States, with the exception of the key island of Guam. This was excluded from the trust territory and designated an unincorporated territory of the United States.

NO GREAT HASTE

The principle of decolonization was thus being honoured in the breach, but few people expected that there would be significant change in the foreseeable future. About one third of humanity was expected to continue living without self-government in spite of the acting out of the parody of Mein Kampf. The signatures of the delegates of fifty⁹ UN founding member states were barely dry on the charter on June 26, 1945, before some members sought to reimpose or to consolidate their power over their colonies and territories which they had been relieved of during the war. When popular opposition to their return began to gather momentum, member governments used fierce reprisals to suppress them and turned to the politics of anti-Communism to justify them. Some of the colonial powers retained codified cultural differences so that the indigenous peoples of colonies were prevented from rising above the status of second class citizens, and some sought to delay the process of decolonization as long as possible. Typical of such situations were the French 'reprisals' in Algeria in 1945 (in which 45,000 Algerians were killed compared with 108 Europeans) which kept the country in submission for ten years; efforts to reimpose British rule in Burma and Malaya, and Dutch rule in the East Indies. In addition there was Australia's effort to avoid the prospect of a resurgence of Aboriginal influence and indigenous territorial claims, and to avoid such matters becoming a focal point for Asian interest in settling and developing Australia's vast northern and western regions, after it had rejected approaches by Jewish organizations for such settlements during the war years. (Chapter 25) Its efforts centred on a policy of forced social and economic integration and the removal of half caste (mixed race) children from their families.

Only four countries in the Near East and South East Asia gained their independence and were admitted to the United Nations between 1945 and 1948 when the issue of the partition of Palestine had to be resolved. They were Thailand (1946), Pakistan (on the partition of India) and Yemen (1947), and Myanmar (formerly Burma, 1948).^{10 11} Except for Egypt, Ethiopia and Liberia, the only African country to achieve 'independence' prior to 1956 was Libya (1949, admitted 1955). The circumstances of those countries clearly establishes that what was acceptable as 'independence' and what was an acceptable criteria for admission to the United Nations were matters of the strategic interests of the major powers and the way in which each country could be expected to vote on important issues in the UN General Assembly. All of the fine and noble words in Roosevelt's first inaugural speech about international neighbourliness (chapter 18) had been ditched in favour of realpolitik. The ditching process started when strategic considerations for the United States made it necessary for the Roosevelt administration to prop up Britain as a buffer for America against potential Nazi expansionism and to use deception to draw its own people into the war against Japan. (Chapter 24) It was firmly in place and virtually irreversible from the time that Churchill opted to reject a negotiated peace while Japan was ahead and to expand the war.

Egypt had been nominally independent since 1922 and was admitted as a founding member of the UN in 1945 in spite of the fact that it was still effectively an occupied British protectorate. Similarly Ethiopia had been nominally independent since 1906 and was admitted a founding member of the UN in spite of being occupied first by Italy in 1936, then by Britain, in 1941, and remaining under Britain's control until 1948 when it regained autonomy. Liberia was no more than a satrapy of the United States and a convenient base for international commercial manipulation. Quite clearly, as the war finally drew to a close and control of the Middle East assumed greater significance for the United States with its self-imposed strategic dependence on Saudi Arabia, matching Britain's dependence on secure control of the Suez Canal – neither of them wanted a new major power block developing in North Africa any more than France wanted to relinquish its grip on the region. Independence for the countries straddling the Aegean, Greece and Turkey, on the northern perimeter of the Mediterranean was fine as long as they could be persuaded to remain at peace with each other and were both aligned with the countries of the Western Block. But independence for the countries on the southern perimeter was quite a different matter. They were clearly at loggerheads with France, Britain and Spain, and they had a common Muslim heritage which made the potential for regional cohesion very real.

There was no great haste to proceed with decolonization, but there was more urgency in making reforms to land tenure systems – to facilitate development, of course, not foreign investment and resource exploitation. Japan was first, in 1946; then came South Korea, 1949; Taiwan, 1949–53; and South Vietnam, 1955. Reform followed in other countries as political change occurred.

However the impact of the parody of Mein Kampf and the negative responses to it by the colonial powers was such that the process of decolonization, once triggered, could not be reversed and the division and antagonism between the Western powers and the Soviet Union ensured that the Soviet Union would use every initiative it could to undermine the colonial powers and accelerate the process. The 'Cold War' was not officially in place, but every move which the Western bloc made to restrict the Soviet Union was countered by a move to weaken the Western position. That deep antagonism camouflaged that fact that although the Soviet Union was intent on encouraging communist systems wherever it could, the Russians had a long standing history of opposition to colonialism which possibly stemmed from their reaction against attempts to colonize them. (Chapter 8) Whatever the reason, the Russians never seriously undertook colonization in the New World, and when Peter I the Great sent Vitus Jonassen Bering into the northern sea that bears his name, interest was in scientific discovery, not overseas territory. Later, when the problem of protecting and perhaps expanding Russian occupation was placed before Catherine II the Great in 1769, she declared: "It is for traders to traffic where they please. I will furnish neither men, nor ships, nor money, and I renounce forever all lands and possessions in the East Indies and in America."¹² Now, in the mid 1940's, the Soviet Union was just as good at being two-faced, talking up and talking down matters of principle on the basis of realpolitik, as were its wartime allies. It actively promoted independence and self-government in Asia, Africa and Latin America while it suppressed it with brutality in Eastern Europe where it needed its buffer.

THE POWER VACUUM ... AND JAPAN

So: the Zionist organizations set about planning how to achieve a self-governing Jewish State while the great powers settled down to regulate the world's affairs. And as they did so the US President, Truman, had one particular concern: to keep the Soviet Union out of Japan and Asia. At Potsdam he used some slick foot work in a bid to keep the Russians from having any part in the control of post war Japan even though that had been agreed as its right in return for entering the war to help subjugate Japan. America's changed attitude was consistent with its competition with the European powers in Asia during the nineteenth century and with its prewar aim of replacing them and 'containing' Japan. US officials aimed "to fill the Pacific power vacuum, to forestall potential Soviet aggression, to assure American supervision over the occupation of Japan and to restore regional stability as rapidly as possible." They pressed for decisive action knowing very well that each of the victors would have to use every means available to them to persuade both their own people and the people of the countries which they had "relieved" or occupied that their particular plan was the only one to pursue and that they had to get behind it as if their lives depended upon it. Their pressure, coupled with Truman's dogmatic attitude at Potsdam, contributed to two decisive actions. The first was Russia's invasion of Manchuria between the two bomb drops to ensure that it could have a say in the Japanese settlement. The second was Truman's decision to entrust leadership of the occupation of Japan to General Douglas MacArthur; to designate him Supreme Commander for the Allied Powers (SCAP) on August 14, 1945, the day of the Japanese surrender; and to direct that he be given complete command and control in Japan. The United States Initial Post-Surrender Policy for Japan was foisted on the Allies on August 29, the day before the major forces of occupation landed and three days before the formal surrender was signed. It was to be the basis of all occupation policies.

The Allies were assured by American officials that the development of those occupation policies would be a cooperative effort, but they were told quite firmly that when there were differences in approach the policies of the United States were to apply. That was certainly the situation during the following three or four months. Then, in response to clear dissatisfaction among the Allies, the United States took the initiative to establish a Far Eastern Advisory Commission (FEAC) in Washington in October, and the decision was subsequently taken on December 27, 1945, at the Moscow Conference of Foreign Ministers, to reconstitute FEAC as the Far Eastern Commission (FEC) with a statutory role instead of a merely advisory role. The commission was organized during the first two months of 1946 and met for the first time on February 26. In reality the establishment of that commission made little difference because, as its terms of reference show very clearly, with the United States providing the chairman and being the occupying authority, and with the commission based in Washington and not Tokyo, the US still directed and dominated the occupation of Japan.¹³

The Far Eastern Commission was to “formulate the policies, principles, and standards in conformity with which the fulfilment by Japan of its obligations under the Terms of Surrender may be accomplished.” Those terms had already been laid down by the US. It was to “review, on the request of any member, any directive issued to the Supreme Commander ... or any action taken by the Supreme Commander involving policy decisions within the jurisdiction of the Commission.” ‘Review on request’ is hardly the same as authority to direct. The Supreme Commander was already being directed by the top US officials on the authority of the president. It was also to “consider such other matters as may be assigned to it by agreement ...” The commission was not to make recommendations concerning military operations or territorial adjustments and its activities were to “proceed from the fact that there has been formed an Allied Council for Japan and (it) will respect existing control machinery in Japan, including the chain of command from the United States Government to the Supreme Commander and the Supreme Commander’s command of occupation forces.”¹⁴ What ‘activities’? The functions of the United States Government included preparing directives “in accordance with policy decisions of the Commission and shall transmit them to the Supreme Commander through the appropriate United States Government agency.”¹⁵ The US government could issue ‘interim directives’ on any matter it wished and the process of review and determination of policy upon which the US government was then to act was such that it was hardly worth the trouble.

REPARATIONS

However before there could be any transition from war to peace, or at least at the same time, there was the matter of retribution. Everyone knows – because history tells us – that the victor always take his spoils in imposing a peace settlement or during the course of a period of occupation. This ‘peace’ was to be no different. And everyone knew – because the Allied governments and their media kept telling them so – that the war in the Pacific was entirely Japan’s fault and that the vanquished must pay for the cost of the victor’s war and be tried for all his war crimes. Out of 41 policy decisions reached by the FEC between February 1946 and August 1947, 17 dealt with reparations, or how the bounty was to be carved up; nine dealt with other economic and financial affairs; six with constitutional and legal reform; four with aliens in Japan; two with war criminals; two with strengthening of democratic tendencies; and one with disarmament (actually, atomic research).¹⁶

But in addition the US and its allies had to justify the use of atomic bombs against Japan. Not just one, but two. At the time of the occupation only those at the highest levels of government of the Big Three knew that initiatives had been taken by Japan to submit to the Allies' demands prior to the Potsdam Conference, that the Russian reply to the Japanese overtures had been drafted after they had been discussed by the Big Three, and that the Japanese government was only haggling over the details of the terms of surrender: not over the fact of surrender. Only those few people knew that the negotiations had been deliberately obstructed by the US to give it the time to drop a bomb or two. Neither did anyone else know that the timing of the actual surrender was not determined by either the dropping of the bombs, or the fact that when the Soviet Union abrogated its pact with Japan and launched its invasion of Manchuria, the Moscow channel (which the Japanese Government looked to for negotiation of the terms of surrender) was closed. They could not know, because the fact was concealed, that the emperor had disregarded his personal position, personally overruled his divided cabinet, and insisted upon the surrender. But, given the circumstances, if they had known they probably would still have accepted the US line that the cabinet decision was further justification for the use of the bombs. They would not have seen the US circumvention of discussions as a simple tactic to enable it to use the bombs and, by a demonstration of its power, gain what it believed would be an unchallengeable position in negotiations with the Soviet Union. (Chapter 26)

On August 10, 1945, the day after the second bomb, the Japanese Government demanded from the United States a declaration clarifying the future position of the Emperor and confirmed its willingness to surrender on the understanding that the Potsdam Declaration was not a demand which prejudiced the prerogatives of the emperor as Sovereign Ruler. The Japanese government then gave the world an even clearer indication of its intention next day when Sukarno and Hatta, leaders of the Partai Nasional Indonesia, who had been imprisoned by the Dutch before the war and released by the Japanese in 1942, were invested with full powers to establish an autonomous government. However, that was treated by the Allies as a bit of side play before the European powers would return to take back what was rightfully theirs and the Americans certainly wanted no distraction from the plan in hand. Their response that day to the Japanese demand was vague. It required that the emperor and the government follow MacArthur's orders, and that the future form of Japanese government would be decided by the free expression of the will of the Japanese people. With cabinet still not able to agree, the Emperor determined that the surrender would proceed.¹⁷ It was formalized on August 14, and that day, while the United States prepared to reconstruct another defeated country, the flag of Indonesia was raised by Sukarno and Hatta as they prepared to reconstruct their own newly independent one. But in view of the 'managed' information available to them, the people of the West still saw that as a bit of side play, (perhaps expanded just a bit), and waited to see how the US would treat the dastardly Japanese.

ALLIED CAMOUFLAGE AND SELF-JUSTIFICATION

The only justification for the dropping of those bombs which the majority of the world's ordinary people would understand was that the Japanese were so depraved and barbaric that they had to be taught a lesson. The Americans therefore had to demonstrate that the Japanese were about to be dragged into compliance with the standards of the morally vastly superior Western Christian World without the West having to suffer enormous casualties in a drawn out invasion. It was a case of the white man's burden all over again.

The victors therefore set about several parallel programs all at once: war crimes trials; domestic economic reconstruction; international political reorganization; international economic reorganization; the competitive exploitation of personnel and resources from the occupied vanquished countries, and the competitive intelligence networking which that required. Overlaying the whole network was a constant stream of well orchestrated propaganda, integrated with the war crimes trials program, to maintain the myths and beliefs which had been built up during the war about the exclusive responsibility for the war of that depraved, sub-human race. Sometimes material, new and old, was deliberately fed into the system by people in key positions. Very often ordinary lower level leaders and the ordinary media simply perpetuated the misinformation and attitudes which they had already been fed and had absorbed during the period of the war. In due course, for reasons of politics, commerce or both, many of them would want to reverse the bigotry and hatred which they were helping to perpetuate but, as after World War One, it would be a long, slow and painful process. That process would be made all the more difficult by their unwillingness to admit to the mass manipulation and injustices which had been carried out, the perceived need to show that it was the Japanese ethic which had changed for the better during the post war period, the political need to play down the international consequences of the use of the atomic bombs while they sought to justify their development, and the very personal need to preserve the image of their own integrity and their own self-understanding. But very few people think about how the consequences of their actions may warp relationships, rebound on them, or expose their motives to critical judgement by future generations, so in 1945 the prevailing US and Allied response to rumblings of discontent and minority judgements was to suppress them or to ride roughshod over them. The future could look after itself.

There was a marked difference between the way in which German atrocities in Europe and Japanese atrocities in Asia were handled by the Allied governments and their media manipulators. By coincidence the Allied Declaration on Punishment for War Crimes (chapter 25) was issued on January 13, 1942, one week before Heydrich's Wannsee Conference on Hitler's Final Solution which had been deferred from December 9 in view of the outbreak of the War in the Pacific. Subsequently every ounce of propaganda value was squeezed out of every atrocity by Japanese forces, but, as we have noted, there was deliberate suppression of reports of German atrocities against the Jewish communities of Europe for some time, even after the operation of the gas chambers had been confirmed, in order to accommodate British and American domestic political considerations. The BBC broadcast a report from the Warsaw Ghetto while it was under crushing siege on June 2. On September 9 Pastor Marc Boegner's effort to end the deportation of Jews from Vichy France was rebuffed by Premier Pierre Laval with the words "I do not want a single foreign Jew to remain in France. Some countries take a high moral tone with me, but when I say to them, 'All right – you take them', they back out of it ...". Some weeks before that exchange, in August, both the British and US governments had received confirmed reports – which the US State Department sought to suppress – of gas chamber mass killings. It was then that the US State Department refused to provide funds to assist refugees to escape or to finance an exchange of prisoners for Jewish refugees, giving as one of the reasons that it would relieve Hitler of the need to finance 'support' for part of his population. And in spite of having those confirmed reports in their hands it was not until December 17, 1942, that the British and US governments formally acknowledged that the mass murder of Jews was taking place in Germany and the occupied European countries. Later, when it mattered, the Allies could not bring themselves to recognize that in July 1942, at the height of all that 'activity' the Japanese government had refused point blank to bow to German demands that, as a treaty partner, it should introduce the techniques of the Total Solution in occupied China, and that it was not until February 18, 1943, that Japan finally buckled to German pressure and introduced ghettos for 'stateless (Jewish) persons' in China. (Chapter 25)

Only a few months later, in mid 1943, following a meeting of the Big Three in Cairo, a UN War Crimes Commission was set up in London. It published a white paper with a recommendation that suspected Japanese war criminals should be arrested for trial before an International Military Tribunal for the Far East. Two years later the objectives or principles on which the occupation of Japan was to be based were incorporated in the Potsdam Declaration which was issued on July 26, 1945, together with a statement foreshadowing trials for war crimes and crimes against humanity. That declaration was actually issued two weeks before the London Agreement which provided for the establishment of the Nuremberg International Military Tribunal to try Nazis for crimes committed during the war in Europe which had already ceased three months earlier. The declaration and the agreement were drafted concurrently and were intended to serve broadly the same purposes, but there are distinct differences and their implementation was quite different. The first objective of the occupation of Japan, as drafted in Washington prior to the Potsdam Conference, was to eliminate Japan's ultranationalism and militarism so that it could never again "become a menace to the United States and to the peace and security of the world."^{18 19} A more honest statement of that objective would have been to ensure that Japan never again "become a competitor of the United States for the domination of the Asia-Pacific region." Two consequential objectives which flowed from that related to religion: the elimination of ultranationalistic and militaristic ideas and movements, and the establishment of the principle of religious freedom.²⁰ We shall come to those matters shortly.

THE ROUND-UP AND WAR CRIMES TRIALS

A Military Government under General Douglas MacArthur was established in Japan on September 2, 1945, three days after the major forces of occupation landed, and the pressure to get the process of justifying US action and aims under way was so great that the round-up and arrest of suspected war criminals began the same day. Within two weeks 39 key political and military figures had been arrested, including Prime Minister Togo and his entire 1941 cabinet, but a directive with detailed instructions for the establishment of an International Military Tribunal (IMT) and procedures for the prosecution of suspected war criminals was not sent to MacArthur by the US Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS) until September 22, three weeks after he took over. MacArthur was directed to prepare and promulgate a charter for the IMT and that the responsibility for prosecutions was to be placed in the hands of an International Prosecutions Section (IPS) of SCAP. Specifically he was instructed that no action was to be taken against the Emperor for war crimes; three classes of war crimes were to be defined; and charges could be laid relating to any crimes committed since the Mukden Incident in China on September 18, 1931.²¹ That was in spite of the fact that the crimes did not exist in international treaty at the time of the Mukden Incident, nor had they even been defined at the time that MacArthur was instructed to act on such crimes. At least it was consistent with the decision that charges could be laid against Germans for any of these newly defined crimes committed from the date that Hitler assumed power in 1933.

The Nuremberg trials of German war criminals began early in November. They were conducted before a tribunal for which each of Britain, the US, the Soviet Union and France were involved in the appointments of judges and prosecutors, and three classes of crimes were jointly defined. Then on November 30, Truman, not the Allies jointly, appointed a chief prosecutor, Joseph B. Keenan, for the key Tokyo trials. The IPS was established, by MacArthur, on December 8. Then, in accordance with the JCS directive that all trials of major war criminals were to be held before an IMT, MacArthur approved directions for the establishment of the IMT, and its charter, on January 19, 1946. But the charter and the definition of the three classes of crimes were subjected to amendments until April 26, one week before the Class A trials began on May 3. The three classes of crimes were, broadly; class A, crimes against peace; class B, 'conventional' war crimes; class C, crimes against humanity. Two of the classes were newly defined, viz., 'Crimes against Peace' and 'Crimes against Humanity.' Crimes against Peace related to the "planning, preparation, initiation, or waging of a declared or undeclared war of aggression, or a war in violation of international law treaties, agreements, or assurances, or participation in a common plan or conspiracy for the accomplishment of any of the foregoing." Crimes against Humanity were defined as "murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation or other inhumane acts committed before or during the war, or persecution on political or racial grounds in execution of or in connection with any crime within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, whether or not in violation of the domestic law of the country where perpetrated." ²²

COMMAND RESPONSIBILITY: A PRINCIPLE TO ESTABLISH

In the meantime, in contradiction of the directive that all major crimes were to be tried before an IMT, General Yamashita who had circumstantially found himself Commander of all of the Japanese forces in the Philippines at the time of the surrender, was charged as a war criminal on September 25. That was three days after the directive had been issued. He was arraigned on October 8 and his trial (which is best described as a 'world media event') began three weeks later. That was before the Nuremberg trials began, before the charter and definitions of three classes of crimes for the Far East had been approved, before the IPS had been established, and even before a chief prosecutor had been appointed. He was tried before a US military commission of five officers, none of whom were trained lawyers, accused of being responsible for 113 crimes (each of which would later be classified as 'class C' crimes) which had been committed by forces in the Philippines, none of which he was alleged to have committed personally or even condoned, and many of which had been committed before he had even taken command. He was found guilty and sentenced to death on December 7, 1945, the day before the IPS was established. On February 4, 1946, two weeks after MacArthur approved the charter for the IMT under which he, himself, was appointed the sole authority for review of decisions by the tribunal which was still being established, MacArthur confirmed the commission's findings and the sentence. Yamashita was hanged on February 23, after pleas for commutation had been rejected first by the Supreme Court of the Philippines and finally by the US Supreme Court. Why the US Supreme Court? The Philippines was firmly back under US control as a colonial possession. The grounds for the pleas included: that the military court which heard the case was not properly constituted; that the hearing had been rushed (it was said, under pressure from MacArthur); that evidence was accepted without regard for the rules of admissibility; and that the conduct of the trial contravened the intention of the Fifth Amendment to the United States Constitution. The death penalty was carried out while amendments to the charter were still being made and it was still more than two months before the trials of alleged class A criminals began. That was the classification under which many authorities believed a person in his position ought have been tried. A precedent of enormous international importance had been set by unprecedented methods. But the US was desperate to show the world, especially allies such as Australia and the Asian countries which were being 'relieved,' that they were acting against such barbarity.

The principle of command responsibility, previously accepted in international law in certain circumstances, had been applied at a level at which it had never been applied before. Its application at the very highest levels of national responsibility was fait accompli – by courtesy of a court of very dubious jurisdiction in very dubious circumstances. Decisions in the major Nazi War Crimes Trials, then in progress at Nuremberg before a tribunal with impeccable legal credentials, were not handed down until October 1. In those trials, of the twenty two persons charged, twelve were sentenced to death, seven to terms of imprisonment and three were acquitted. Yamashita had indeed received rough justice.²³ His show trial had been arranged in haste, it was conducted in a pressure-cooker political atmosphere in which the Allies' determination to establish a precedent which could be – and was – applied subsequently in the Philippines and elsewhere was a key factor, and it reeked of injustice. But it gained the massive world wide publicity which was the intention of US authorities. Every drop of media sympathy for the superior Western Christian ethic was milked relentlessly, and this had the effect of justifying US action against the ‘depraved, inhuman Japanese’ – at least in the eyes of most of the citizens of America and its Allies – and helped to satisfy the lust for revenge in those countries which had been whipped up by the propaganda machinery as an instrument of the war effort.

It is especially significant that the precedent-setting trial was conducted in the Philippines. The US was desperate to hold on to its colony to use it as a spring board to fill the temporary power vacuums in Europe's turbulent Asian colonies. The Yamashita show trial, being an initiative of the United States, had, by any normal standard of reasoning, also committed the US legally and politically to accepting the application of the command responsibility precedent in future cases involving its own forces. How could it initiate such a trial if it were not prepared to have its own leaders tried on the same basis if the circumstances arose? It had taken the moral high ground. But in due course it would want to distance itself from that precedent when leaders whom it had placed in power and sustained in power through corrupting intervention were tried on the basis of that principle. And when its own political leaders ordered actions which would have devastating and most inhumane consequences for civilian populations there would be no talk of the application of such a principle.

Trials of Japan's major Class A war criminals finally began on May 3, 1946, eight months after MacArthur's arrival. The verdicts were handed down on November 12, 1948, thirty months after the trials began, and of the twenty eight persons charged, seven were sentenced to death, eighteen to terms of imprisonment, one was declared unfit to stand trial, two died before their trials, but none were acquitted. During the entire program of Japanese war crimes trials about 2,200 trials were conducted. They involved about 5,700 accused persons of whom about 920 were condemned to death and 3,000 to terms of imprisonment, although some sentences were commuted on review.³⁴ Apart from Tokyo, major programs of trials were conducted by the American Eighth Army at Yokohama (about 30 Class B and 950 Class C); in the Philippines by both the US army and the Philippines government; in the Marianas; and by Nationalist China, Britain, Australia, the Netherlands and France.

Russia apparently kept few records of trials concerned with the war on its Pacific front, although some trials were conducted at the border town of Khabarovsk following the invasion of Manchuria and, in spite of having been in the war against Japan for only eight days before the unconditional surrender, it took more than 375,000 Japanese prisoners, both soldiers and civilians, including almost the entire Kwantung Army. Unknown thousands were killed but the bulk were transported to forced labour camps to speed up reconstruction and get production moving – much in the manner of the labour camps for which the Japanese were being tried.³⁵ That situation was allowed to drift into the background – until its former Allies wanted to use the information against the Soviet Union. In the first instance heavy emphasis was placed on the statistics that out of 132,000 prisoners captured by Japan 27 percent (about 35,500) died in captivity compared with only four percent of the 235,000 prisoners of war (about 9,500) taken by the Germans.²⁶ The figure was certainly not flattering or one which the Japanese people were proud of, but why not compare it with the millions who were killed by other means?

POLITICAL DRIVE

However statistics alone do not tell the story of the Japanese war crimes trials. Neither does the statement that after the horrific show trial of Yamashita the Allied leaders, military personnel and court members “proclaimed before and during a trial their own, and their government’s deepest resolution to secure and maintain the highest standards of justice” and that “demonstrations of even handedness and compassion by far outnumber recorded instances of palpable injustice.”²⁷ They were conceived as an exercise in politics rather than justice. They were designed to establish, in the public mind, that responsibility and guilt for starting the war lay with Japan; to extract retribution; to provide a deterrent against countries wanting to rock the boat in future and against large scale physical abuse of people; and to demilitarize and democratize Japan along western lines to restore ‘stability’ (or Western domination) to East Asia as quickly as possible.

The political drive behind the trials is demonstrated by the fact that the Allies knew that only a “symbolic handful” of senior Japanese leaders could be brought before an international tribunal.²⁸ It was eventually agreed that to keep the trials within practical limits, the Allies and the countries which Japan had occupied, making up the International Military Tribunal for the Far East (IMTFE) should each indict two Class A suspects to stand trial. Most of those who were considered but not ‘nominated’ to stand trial in that top leadership class went free, because they had not committed crimes for which they could be prosecuted under either Class B or C. But then neither, on the evidence submitted at their trials, had General Yamashita or those who were tried as Class A criminals.²⁹ Even so, there was much debate about the final list. Some countries, notably Australia, wanted Emperor Hirohito indicted because of his symbolic authority for all of the nation’s affairs. However Truman had already determined that he would not be tried and MacArthur supported that position for very practical reasons. He warned that Japan would disintegrate and be ungovernable if the Emperor was tried, and that an additional one million troops would be required for the occupation, possibly for an indefinite time. In addition the administration regarded the existing form of Japanese government as necessary so that it would act as “executor” of American policy.^{30 31}

The judgement in the trial of the 28 Class A prisoners – the top leaders whose trials were to be ‘symbolic’ of justice – was flawed because it was prepared by seven judges working in collaboration and not preparing individual judgements, and the dissenting judgements by three other judges were deliberately suppressed.³² They were not read in open court;³³ the full proceedings of the trials were not published for many years and eventually they were only published because of private efforts. Under the tribunal’s charter technical rules of evidence were not applied and in some trials even hearsay evidence could be admitted;³⁴ ³⁵ dubious translations of official documents were tendered by the prosecution at times ³⁶and official records of cabinet meetings over fourteen years which undermined prosecution claims of a conspiracy were discounted on the basis that they may have been prepared in such a manner as to eventually suggest the innocence of cabinet members involved. ³⁷ The definition of crimes against humanity was changed only days before the trials began at the 'suggestion' of the US Chief Prosecutor in order to widen the range of circumstances in which prosecutions could be launched,³⁸ but defence evidence of war crimes by the Allies was declared inadmissible. ³⁹

Each of these were indeed very serious matters, but one of the facts which discredit the United States most and questions the motives behind the war crimes trials more than anything else is the deliberate decision that persons involved in human guinea pig biological warfare experiments were to be exempt from prosecution. A fact which discredits the United States is the way in which US officials and Zionist figures colluded in aborting plans for trials of large numbers of Nazis involved in similar crimes against humanity and, in particular, genocide. But that revolved around events in the United States in November, 1947, which helped to determine the future of Palestine and the establishment of the State of Israel, more or less coincidental in time with these events in Japan. They will be discussed later in this chapter.

NO QUESTION OF PRINCIPLE

The world had been outraged by reports of prisoners of war and civilians being used, tortured, killed and even dissected alive without anaesthesia in biological warfare and so-called 'medical' experiments. Such matters were given considerable prominence in the early stages of the Nuremberg trials and it was expected that the same would apply in the Japanese trials, especially in the case of the Harbin experiments in China. In these, more than 3,000 Chinese prisoners of war and Chinese, Korean and Russian civilians were killed in appalling circumstances in experiments carried out by Japan's special purpose 731st Regiment directed by Lt. General Shiro Ishii. When the Russian invasion began the regiment tried to destroy its facilities, gas the remaining prisoners and conceal or destroy the on-site evidence of its work – but not its research records. A few of the Japanese surrendered to the Russians and were tried, but most of the 3,600 troops were able to return to Japan. The research workers took their results with them and General Ishii made a deal with the American occupation authorities: immunity from prosecution in return for the research papers. ⁴⁰ There was to be a blanket of silence over the matter. That deal is essentially the same as many made as the Allies swept through occupied Germany and seized (if they could) or 'recruited' and arranged deals where necessary for both research reports and the scientists who had prepared them. (Chapter 26)

The blanket of silence was so effective that when evidence of biological warfare trials was tendered by a prosecutor at the Class A trials (whether deliberately or inadvertently is not clear) it was withdrawn when the presiding judge pointed out that it was not part of the indictment. ⁴¹ Only one officer, Medical Captain Hisachiki Tokuda, was subsequently charged with a category

8 offence (medical experiments carried out on prisoners of war). Facing a Class C trial at Yokohama, Tokuda was actually charged on a series of counts in five of the eleven categories in Class C and found guilty on six counts. He was sentenced to death, but when his case was reviewed by SCAP the sentence was commuted to life imprisonment.⁴² Thus, in spite of the great hullabaloo about dastardly biological warfare experiments not one person was actually charged, tried, found guilty and executed on the basis of such offences. General Ishii's deal with the American authorities did not become public knowledge until after his death by natural causes, but the story of the regiment was published in 1982.⁴³

What use the US authorities or any commercial operators made of the research results which the US had bought at such a damning human cost has never been officially disclosed. However allegations were later made by China that some of them were applied against North Korea during the Korean War. Chinese authorities claimed that US planes dropped quantities of bacteria and bacteria-laden insects over Korea and North East China between January and March 1952 and gave much publicity to the testimony of captured US airmen who purportedly flown the planes, and to photographs which were alleged to be germ bombs. A group of scientists from Sweden, France, Great Britain, Italy, Brazil and the Soviet Union were appointed by China as an "International Scientific Committee" to investigate the allegations. Their report, published in September 1952, concluded that:

*The peoples of Korea and China have indeed been the objectives of bacteriological weapons. These have been employed by units of the USA. armed forces, using a great variety of different methods for the purpose, some of which seem to be developments of those applied by the Japanese during the second world war.*⁴⁴

It was later revealed that most of the airmen had confessed only after being subjected to physical abuse, and the content and authorship of their testimonies has been seriously questioned, but eighteen years later, in 1970, the New York Times reported that the US had prepared quantities of nerve gas at about that time. It reported that during the Korean War, when US forces were overwhelmed by "human waves" of Chinese, "the Army dug into captured Nazi chemical warfare documents describing Sarin, a nerve gas so lethal that a few pounds could kill thousands of people in minutes. ... By the mid-nineteen fifties, the Army was manufacturing thousands of gallons of Sarin."⁴⁵ In any case it can certainly be assumed that someone intended to put the Harbin results to use because it was the American administration's intention to reach or to stay at the front in every field of science and endeavour, including medicine – except if there was likely to be a public backlash because Americans had been used as guinea pigs in the testing involved – and that brings us to another possible reason why the war crimes trials for biological warfare and medical experiments were scuttled.

The US and British administrations and US and British drug companies were, at that time, involved in human guinea pig trials in Australia in the development of drugs for anti-malarial and other uses. Drugs tested during the experiments were later marketed internationally by the giant British chemical company ICI and manufactured by the American chemical company

Winthrop. The experiments began in 1943 and continued until April 1946 by when, six months after the Japanese surrender, more than 850 healthy, injured and convalescing men had been used. They included Jewish refugees from Germany and Austria who had been interned in Britain and forcibly despatched to Australia on the Dunera in 1940 (Chapter 24), alien German and Italian internees in Australia, disabled Australian soldiers and soldiers recovering from illness or injuries as well as volunteer serving Australian troops. While the tests were conducted under close medical supervision by the Australian Army's Medical Research Unit, and it is not clear from published reports whether any of the human guinea pigs died during the actual tests, some were deliberately forced almost to the point of death in tests to determine the remedial capacity of drugs and their toxic side effects, many suffered effects which remained with them throughout life, there was no systematic post-experiment supervision, and some were refused war service pensions or repatriation benefits. US authorities were prepared to use only small numbers of volunteer prisoners in state penitentiaries for such trials and British authorities thought it was "too risky to deliberately infect its own soldiers with recurring malaria", so the Australian Army, the junior partner in the exercise, "trawled convalescent depots and military hospitals for volunteers" when new British and US drugs required testing.

Records of the MRU's three years of experiments at the unit based at Cairns, Queensland, were taken to London after the war and other documents and personal files of the human guinea pigs were "scattered" among several government authorities. Some cannot be located at all. It is ironical that the unit had to be established to find an alternative to quinine when the Japanese gained control of the source of that naturally occurring drug in Java, and that the drug eventually selected for use in its place, Atebrin, was the product of German research in 1931. But the unit was kept operational after the alternative was confirmed and beyond the end of the war at the request of US and British authorities in order to test additional drugs.⁴⁶ Clearly none of the three governments were eager to have their records in experimentation on humans scrutinized in connection with Japanese war crimes trials on the subject.

CRIMES AGAINST HUMANITY

However the big question is not whether the 'right number' of Japanese officers and politicians were tried for war crimes or crimes against humanity, or whether the right mix of crimes was included in the trials. The big question which has exercised a few minds in recent years is the relationship between those who exercise political direction of acts of war, genocide and the use of weapons of mass destruction, and those who have the responsibility to carry out those acts. This has become an issue in the wake of genocide in Africa and Europe, and wars in the Middle East. The Western World, and in particular leaders in the United States and Britain, have made great efforts to pin responsibility for such matters on national leaders and to bring them to justice for crimes against humanity, citing the precedence established by the war crimes trials of the Second World War. Among those targeted have been Africa leaders whose armies have ravaged the helpless rural populations in neighbouring countries, President Saddam Hussein of Iraq for use of gas in the repression of some populations of that country, and Serbian leaders for the unrestrained massacre of Kosovars. Such efforts to highlight and to prevent such atrocities in future are admirable. However they have shown much greater reluctance to pursue leaders in the Western Hemisphere whose links in carrying out such crimes may be traced to the Western powers, such as General Augusto Pinochet of Chile, or former Nazis against whom allegations of war crimes are well documented and who made their homes in the West under Western protection and patronage. Is it because they are concerned that the spot light could drift onto the conduct of the Second World War by the Allies?

Consider: first, the decisions by Britain in 1939–40 to reject a whole series of peace overtures from Hitler, quite early in the war, when death, casualties and destruction on a massive scale could have been avoided if its leaders had been prepared to debate the fundamental issues behind the war and to make concessions to its colonies and dominions. Or: second, the decision by Roosevelt and Churchill in negotiating the Atlantic Charter in August 1941 to insist on unconditional surrender. Or: third, Roosevelt's deception in using his own people as decoys to provoke a Japanese attack in order to take the United States into war in December 1941. Or: fourth, the decision by Churchill to reject the opportunity for a negotiated peace and a review of the colonial structure of Asia when Japan was in front – thus escalating the war and extending it by three years from April 1942 in order to prop up its unsustainable colonial position. Or: fifth, the decision, essentially taken by Truman, to circumvent Japan's overtures for an armistice to enable the real life and death demonstration of a couple of atomic bombs in August 1945.

In the case of the third and fifth situations noted, the deaths, casualties and destruction directly attributable to the decisions taken can be quantified reasonably easily. In the other cases the proportion of total deaths, casualties and destruction which occurred after those decisions were taken can be estimated very approximately. The wider consequences are still unfolding and can be assessed in retrospect. But none of these decisions were regarded in the West as crimes against humanity. At the time, the world-at-large was not even aware of them because of the conspiracy of silence. Eventually, as limited information trickled out, they were justified on the basis of the need, from a Western perspective, to maintain the status quo – a position of privilege and dominance. Together they represent the greatest tragedy of history: the Western World's unwillingness to recognize the parody of Mein Kampf, the unfolding of the Qur'anic Night Journey, or the existence of the trouble in the triangle. Until the West – the amorphous Christian gel – is prepared to recognize that, to work through the significance of it, and to work within a new understanding of the relationships between humanity and God, the world is condemned to live in an ever tightening spiral of crime against humanity.

But that, also, is jumping ahead. We shall come to it soon enough. We are still at the point of the United States occupation of Japan and the conduct of the war crimes trials. A secondary 'cost' of aborting those trials was the forfeiture of an excellent opportunity for America's model Christian politicians and propagandists to exploit the claimed contrast between their exemplary ethics and conduct and that of Japan's depraved Shintoists. That brings us to another item the United States had running on its agenda in parallel with the multi-purpose war crimes trials: the completion of the Christian Reconstruction of Japan which had started in earnest following Commodore Perry's 'visit' in 1853, (chapter 15) only to be aborted ninety years later with the closure of all Christian missions following the outbreak of the War in the Pacific.

MACARTHUR, THE OCCUPATION AND THE EMPEROR

To put the events of 1945 in perspective the key events of earlier history can be restated very briefly as follows. Francis Xavier arrived in 1549, followed twenty years later by the Jesuits whose corrupt trading and intrigue against the Buddhists led to the edict of expulsion in 1587, then a few deaths along the way before a second edict of expulsion in 1614 and the total closing of Japan's borders in 1638. Roughly two centuries passed before the US, jealous of the preferred trading position which the European powers had gained by force in mainland Asia, sent Commodore Perry to visit Japan in 1853 to offset the advantage the European powers had gained by forcing a treaty on Japan. One Catholic and four Protestant missions followed him six years later. But America became distracted by its famous Civil War, withdrew and left Britain to refill the power vacuum by pounding Kagoshima flat in 'retaliation' for the reported persecution of a Christian community. It didn't matter that they were not British. They were Christians. Japan's humiliation led to its own civil war, the collapse of the Shogunate in 1868 and the rise of the emperor in 1871. Britain confirmed again, with great determination and with gun ships at the ready, the normal, formal and strong links between state and church: no Christian missions, then no trade or diplomatic missions either. That linkage could not possibly have been stated any more definitely. Japan's reaction was to formally establish its own state religion. Shinto. Twenty years later, 1889, it strengthened that link further by writing it into the new Meiji Constitution.

Article III of that constitution read: "The Emperor is sacred and inviolable." It appears that the Japanese had simply lifted it straight out of Catholic doctrine on the Divine Right of Kings. They must have felt they were in good company and the words of the constitution did not say that the emperor was divine or a personification of God. However a commentary which was later published to help people understand the new constitution has been translated to read: "The Emperor is Heaven-descended, divine and sacred; He is pre-eminent above all his subjects. He must be revered and is inviolable ... Not only shall there be no irreverence for the Emperor's person, but also shall he not be made a topic of derogatory comment nor one of discussion." ⁴⁷ (Emphasis added.) The church had long claimed divine authority for its Popes by virtue of their being successors to Peter the Apostle and therefore Christ's personal deputy on earth, and by the laying on of (very human) hands. That claimed authority was in turn a substantial basis of the Vatican's policy of Ultramontaniam, or the control of the church in every country under the Roman figurehead, and the authority to invest, and to exercise authority over, monarchs. But by using the expression 'Heaven-descended, divine and sacred' the Meiji commentator had actually jumped ahead of the Vatican – by just a few years. It was not until 1929 when Pius XI was addressing the clergy of Rome on the occasion of the signing of the Lateran Treaty that he caught up with Japan by describing the person holding the office of Pope as "holding the Divine Commission and being the Divine Representative, (who) cannot be subject to any earthly sovereign."

During the 1930's, the nationalistic military leaders of Japan took full advantage of the thrust of that 1899 commentary and the teachings of a particular cult of Shinto, the Kokutai Cult, to inculcate and strengthen the strong devotion to the land of Japan and a high level of personal discipline which had long been a characteristic of the Japanese ethos and self-understanding. They were building on the widely held idea that the emperor was a symbol of the nation itself.⁴⁸ The Allies then attributed the strength of all that was either good or bad in Japan's self-understanding and the rigidly disciplined armed forces to that clause in the constitution and not to the people who had taken advantage of it. Partly for that reason, and partly to demonstrate that by means of their victories they were acting on their responsibility to extend the influence of the church and Christianity world wide, they set out to dismantle the Japanese religious base and to place Christianity in its place. It did not matter that for some of them, such as Winston Churchill, their support for the church was little more than a political convenience and a Constantinian facade. It also gave them another plank with which to support their claims that the war in the Pacific had been all Japan's fault. They could deflect some of the blame onto Japan's national religion rather than its people and its leaders, and the idea of the 'God-Emperor' was played up in the American press.⁴⁹ The religio-political cult that had been built up around the alleged mystical divinity of the emperor was widely recognized in the West for what it was: "a device for securing absolute loyalty and obedience from the people in response to what was alleged to be 'His Imperial Majesty's Will.'" The military leaders had achieved great influence through the supervision of State Shinto and had used it as a political instrument to facilitate Japanese control over the Korean Peninsula.⁵⁰ In doing so they were simply following a well beaten path. The church had been along it many times before.

However, while the conceptual relationship between the Emperor and the nation might ultimately have to be downgraded to suit the Allies' purposes, it was also that relationship which made the emperor potentially of great value to the Occupation forces. As already noted, they wanted to be able to use the very influence which they were hell bent on dismantling. Therefore they could not dispose of, harm, remove, bring to trial or even denigrate the emperor. Their 'management' of him had to be determined on a day to day basis.⁵¹ This was hampered by a fundamental misunderstanding of the nature of Shinto and the relation of Shinto to Japan's ultranationalism and militarism, and that misunderstanding was perpetuated by the way in which SCAP framed one of its major directives to the Japanese government – the 'Shinto Directive.'⁵² The management of Japan's religious affairs and its future relations with the Western powers was then complicated enormously by MacArthur's personal intervention and misuse of his role as Supreme Commander. But his intervention was made easier by the religious self-understanding prevailing in the United States, the uncertainty and diverse attitudes to religion across the Allied countries, and the inability of the Western World's churches to play their traditional missionary roles in the wake of the war.

RELIGIOUS SELF-UNDERSTANDING: THE VICTOR NATIONS

THE UNITED STATES

The religious revival, or dependence on a religious presence, which had been triggered or induced in the US by Pearl Harbour continued when the war ended. It was consistent with America's religious history, with the concept that its founders had escaped from the divisive and restricting influences of European Christianity, the rise of the Protestant work ethic, and the community's self-understanding as the New Israel. When the war ended in victory in 1945, Americans prided themselves that their belief in God set them apart from atheistic communism.⁵³ They felt more than ever that they were God's chosen people, that the result of the war reflected that fact and that it was deserved because of their superior conduct and ethics. The Reformed churches certainly encouraged them to think in that manner and to think that it was their right to determine the course of future world events and to benefit from that course. The Catholic Church was not so arrogant in that respect. Its hierarchy was very conscious of having had a foot in both camps and of the 'promise', or at least the opportunity, for the Catholicization of the Soviet Union and the absorption of the Orthodox Church which had not been fulfilled as a consequence of Hitler's defeat. The number of people joining churches and regularly attending worship continued to rise strongly as both church membership and attendance show. Church membership rose from 40 per cent of the population in 1910, to 63.4 per cent in 1959. Average weekly attendance rose from 37 per cent in 1940 to 49 per cent in 1955.⁵⁴ Evidence suggests (see below) that this attendance rate is well over double the attendance rate for Britain during the late 1940's. Politicians in the US competed to outperform each other in displaying their Christianity. God "was being made into an ally of the United States against communism and in support of (its version) of 'free enterprise'⁵⁵ and also against any regional or commercial competitor of the United States. Business executives would attend worship together, pray together, then adjourn to their homes or to a club to discuss their methods of subverting the policies and laws of other countries. It hardly mattered what policies or personal conduct they pursued. As long as they were demonstrably Christian all else would be forgiven. The Evangelical concept of personal salvation was alive and well.

The United States had not been occupied or torn asunder by mass evacuations, refugee movements or interfaith tension, nor had it been bombed. Thus it did not have a traumatic reconciliation process to work through, nor a massive building reconstruction program to undertake.

When World War II finished the US had what appeared to be unlimited financial resources to either put into foreign church reconstruction or domestic building programs, and personnel available for either local ministry or foreign mission enterprises. Was this not evidence of how good God had been to America's faithful Christians? Their land was secure and flowing with milk and honey. Outlay on new church buildings rose from two percent of residential construction costs in 1946 to eight percent by 1958.⁵⁶ Put another way: if the cost of one church centre was about the cost of three houses, then in 1946 one church was probably being built for every 150 new houses, but by 1958 the ratio was about one new church for every forty new houses.

The flood of people into the pews was such that in places where individual denominations did not yet have, or could not afford to build and staff their own churches, people got together and sponsored 'community churches' on a non-denominational or inter-denominational basis and this tended to blur the doctrinal and liturgical differences between them. But at the same time the churches were aware that de-Christianizing influences were affecting the nation and the vigorous home mission movements which the churches had spawned during the previous forty years, concurrently with the ecumenical movement, began to take on new form and gather new momentum and financial independence as evangelical movements. The mainstream churches seem to have been less aware than many of the leading evangelists that those de-Christianizing influences had in turn been spawned as a result of the widespread abuse of the free enterprise system to which the churches had tied themselves so effectively. In fact they enjoyed that 'partnership' so much (benefiting from large grants by prominent business identities) that the power brokers of business and politics were able to exploit them and their 'alliance' with God, quite deliberately and quite cynically, to help entrench and extend their system universally. It was a little more subtle than the paraffin marketing ventures of the missionary era in China. A little.

There were some churches which stood against the tide of exploitation, which sought to put principle before expediency by placing a strong emphasis on social responsibility. Prominent among them were the Society of Friends (Quakers) and the Jehovah's Witnesses. The witnesses had shown quite strong growth in adherents in the three years since the establishment of their first Bible College (chapter 25), being able to claim a 40% increase in the number of preaching witnesses spread around the world. A few years later the more progressive mainstream churches would begin to distance themselves from the abuses of the free enterprise system by carefully monitoring their own investments and developing programs to offset some of the abuses. But that was still a matter for the future when the Allies were occupying Japan and the vigour of Christianity in the United States was in sharp contrast to the state of the churches in other occupying countries and in the European countries which had previously been the powerhouse of worldwide missionary movements. We shall consider Britain, Holland and France (the major European powers bidding to return to Asia); Australia (America's biggest Pacific ally in the war against Japan), the Soviet Union (numerically the biggest ally of all and formerly the dominant Orthodox country), and the two Christian belligerents, Germany and Italy, (one being the seat of the Reformation, and the other, the base of the Roman Catholic Church).

BRITAIN'S MANIPULATION OF RELIGION

In Britain, in spite of programs of church and cathedral building, the development of industrial chaplaincy schemes and the encouragement of men's, women's and youth groups, the church had not recovered from the demoralizing impact of World War I which had badly shaken its complacency and undermined public confidence in it. Attendance and popular support, especially for the officially established Church of England, slumped further during the Depression years and the churches were struggling to recruit candidates for the ministry when they became embroiled in the abdication crisis and then World War II. The demand for chaplains for the armed services meant that parish services were cut and the massive social dislocation of extended industrial working hours, large scale evacuations from urban areas to rural areas because of air raid attacks and the closure of many urban schools each contributed to a further run-down in the life of the churches and Sunday observance.⁵⁷ That run-down was a factor in the timing of the decision to establish the British Council of Churches, in 1942, although it would have been established in due course as the churches moved to cooperate in post-war reconstruction and in religious, social and international concerns through the World Council of Churches which was in process of formation. But at the same time Britain's politicians, military leaders and churchmen had become sharply conscious that the personal discipline and social ethics inculcated in youths through Sunday School and religious education provided a basis for discipline which was absolutely vital in both the armed services and industry in time of war. This led to some interesting decisions when the mass evacuation of youths from urban schools to rural areas revealed the "colossal religious ignorance" of many of them.⁵⁸ And more.

The "religious illiteracy as well as other ignorance and the lack of discipline and decency of many youths who had been reared in slums" and who, if the war continued, would have to serve in the armed forces or work in munitions factories, led directly to the Education Act of 1944.⁵⁹ This raised the school leaving age to sixteen years – in spite of the urgent need for young people to enter the work force – and introduced compulsory religious education in state elementary and secondary schools. These schools were required to open with corporate worship, daily, and to schedule the teaching of religion as a lesson period in the normal timetable. The syllabus was to be based on the Bible and it was to be undenominational, but parents could formally request that their children be given denominational instruction. Religious knowledge was made a prerequisite for teachers' certificates and provision was made for government officials to inspect the teaching of religion. The dual system of state and church schools was retained but the establishment of denominational church schools was encouraged by provision for the state to pay half their construction and maintenance costs. Very soon the Vatican was able to take advantage of that precedent in its bid for state-subsidised Catholic schools in other countries. However in Britain, as in the United States, "one effect of the war was to quicken movements already in motion which made for de-Christianization"⁶⁰ in spite of the government's bid to prop up the church in the interests of national security. It is doubtful whether Nazism (or National Socialism as such) was a major influence in that process because of the steps which the government had taken to ban the Nazi Party and to counter its propaganda, and the fact that the nation was at war with the principal political face of the movement. In any case, attendance at weekly church services continued to fall and recruitment for the clergy fell below the numbers required to maintain parish services at pre-war levels. Reports for the late 1940s (the few years immediately following the war) show that for all denominations only between fifteen and twenty percent of the population attended church “fairly regularly” and another forty percent attended “occasionally.” And a Gallup poll taken in 1957 showed that 14% had been to church the previous Sunday and 28% had been within a month ⁶¹ That must be compared with the 39% attending church weekly in the US in 1950 and 49% in 1955.

During the war years the Church of England had organized a movement called “Servants of Christ the King” in an effort to influence secular industrial and professional communities, and following the war there was some growth in local evangelism, notably among conservative evangelicals, in Industrial Mission work, tertiary student organizations, and group worship in “house churches.” There was also a program to recruit and train pastors to fill the gaps left in the dwindling ranks of the clergy, and some revival within the monastic orders. However attendance figures suggest that these efforts to overcome ‘outmoded’ parish systems had very limited impact. Similarly, vigorous efforts in industrial evangelism were mounted by the Methodists and other Reformed denominations; a limited number of lay training colleges were established by the Student Christian Movement, the Christian Frontier Council and the YMCA working in collaboration; and the Moral Rearmament Movement (MRA) of pre-war US origin had a significant impact in some sectors of the community for a few years, notably among university graduates, but these appear to have had only limited impact in enticing people back into the pews. Overall, even though the MRA was opposed to the excesses of both Communism and Capitalism, and it was widely seen as an ‘anti-communist ally of the church’, the overall effect of these movements may have been to attract people towards social activism and political socialism.

HOLLAND

Holland, having been occupied by Germany and under Nazi administration from an early stage of the war, shows the contradictory impact of Nazism and the world war. Between the two wars the percentage of people who disclaimed any association with religion continued the steady rise which had begun about the turn of the century. The figures were: 1909, 5%; 1920, 8%; 1930 (during the Depression but before the rise of National Socialism and Hitler), 14^{1/2}%. ⁶² That trend suggests that even though the number of confirmed members of the Netherlands Reformed Church was rising steadily and the membership of the Roman Catholic Church had risen by one third (attributed to high birth rates and not conversions ⁶³), by the beginning of the war probably between 20% and 25% of people would have dissociated themselves from any religion. The Netherlands Reformed Church of the 1930s has been described as “without spiritual leadership and without a voice,” a bureaucratic organization “without a clear message or purpose,” “pastor-centred ... often theologically divided, very Bourgeois,” and with a decreasing influence in the country.”⁶⁴ That was a very promising environment in which Hitler’s approach to religion could gain acceptance, and soon after the occupation it was put to the test when the people were required to conform to the anti-Jewish policies and measures imposed by the Nazis.

At first the majority acquiesced. In the face of a very powerful and successful victor they saw little reason to do otherwise. However leaders of the churches spoke out promptly, repeatedly and often with the Reformed and Roman Catholic churches working in collaboration. Key statements including criticism of Nazi policy on the Jews, a new statement of Confession and statements of Christian responsibility in the face of oppression were issued in October 1940, twice in 1941, January 1942, and three times during 1943. These provided a base for the resistance movement, placed church leaders in considerable danger so that many pastors were imprisoned or thrown into concentration camps, and provided a strong stimulus for lay leadership in Holland. That leadership was a major factor in the re-invigoration of the Netherlands Reformed Church and would prove important in the years following the war when it retained its vigour while those in some other countries relapsed under the impact of political reconstruction. At that stage the Dutch Catholic Party declared itself no longer a church party and sought the support of Protestants on the basis of its policies, but very few responded. The Netherlands Reformed Church was playing a leading role in ecumenical affairs, establishing contact with churches in other countries, and it developed new social vigour and a new synod structure which took effect in 1951. At the same time the Reformed churches, together with the YMCA, were involved in the establishment of a Federation of Lay Training Centres in Holland and, as a result, Dutch lay leadership became better informed on matters of theology than their counterparts in many countries. Similarly, several Dutch Protestant theologians were making a major contribution to the restatement of early Reformation thinking and relating this to contemporary foreign mission enterprise in collaboration with the International Missionary Council. In spite of this, and probably because of their preoccupation with the struggle for Holland to reimpose its grip on the Dutch East Indies (Indonesia) the Dutch were not as prominent in foreign mission ventures as several other European nations.⁶⁵

FRANCE

In France, the country which had provided more missionaries for foreign fields from the fall of Napoleon to the fall of the Third Republic than any other country, the Roman Catholic Church was still struggling to recover from the consequences of the disestablishment of the church in 1905, the Vichy Government under Nazi occupation, and probably more de-Christianizing influences than any other country in Europe. The Catholic Action Movement had commanded an extensive network of organizations during the 1930s but it had been virtually inactive during the middle years of the war, after the fall of France, and the church had been shocked by an assessment published in 1943 that only ten percent of the adult population were practicing Catholics, that at least a quarter of the population was effectively atheist, and that the entire working class suffered from almost total lack of religion.⁶⁶ In other words much of the population was simply accepting the policies of the Vichy Government under Nazi direction from a lack of alternative leadership. France could be characterised as worse than either Britain or Holland. Already, in 1941 and 1942, the Assembly of Cardinals and Archbishops and the Theological Faculty had protested about official policy towards the Jews, including the sterilization of Catholics who had married Jews across the banned interfaith (said to be inter-racial) boundary, and they did so again in 1943. One can assume they received much the same response as Pastor Marc Boegner when he approached Premier Pierre Laval in September 1942.

A system of worker-priests was set up, so was a mission to rural areas. The existing orders of the Little Brothers of Jesus and the Little Sisters of Jesus were expanded and in January 1944, in anticipation of post-war social upheaval, the Paris Mission was set up in a bid to reach the urban population through unorthodox programs. Then, in a bid to improve the situation by spreading the work load among the diocesan bishops as well as the Cardinals and Archbishops who had dominated the Catholic system, responsibility for religious education, lay training and Catholic Action was diversified and a secretariat of bishops was established in 1946.⁶⁷ In the meantime there had been a determined effort to reactivate Catholic Action, and in 1945, faced by a very real challenge of Communist influence through trade unions, the church hierarchy had engineered the amalgamation of several church-related political parties into one which had grown out of a student-organized resistance movement in 1944, the Popular Republican Movement (M.R.P.). Thus, as the Pacific War drew to a close and the occupation of Japan became an issue, the church in France was deeply engrossed in its domestic confrontation with Communism and with the expectation of an opportunity to restore its shattered organization in French Indo China. That opportunity would not come for some years, and although the recovery in training for missions would be rapid so that by 1957 France was again providing 20% of all Christian missionaries,⁶⁸ it was certainly not in a position to place much immediate emphasis on missions in Japan in the post war half of 1945.

AUSTRALIA

In Australia, where one of the dominant effects of the 'hate Japan' campaigns of the war years had been to reinforce the White Australia policy, and where troops returning from overseas were either disillusioned with religion or had found new interest in non-Christian faiths, the task of the churches to regroup was complicated by the demands for rehabilitation and re-settlement, rapid industrialization, and mass migration programs which were about to begin. Before the war the Church of England had held a pre-eminent position in the community with about forty percent of the population registered as C. of E. Another forty percent were divided among other Reformed traditions and there was a significant level of mistrust and antagonism between those 'blocks', totalling about eighty percent of the population, and the remaining twenty percent who were Roman Catholic. [The Jewish community numbered less than one percent and there were very small numbers of Orthodox Christians, Muslims and people of other faiths.] Under the influence of its history as a penal settlement, church attendance in Australia had generally been relatively low. Even vigorous recruiting and clergy training programs, local evangelism campaigns, a dramatic increase in home and inland mission programs, and the organization of a massive 'Mission to the Nation' in 1953 by the Methodist Church did little to change that. In 1961 only one person in ten attended religious services "with any degree of regularity." ⁶⁹ That is about one half the attendance rate in Britain or about one fifth of that in the United States.

In the early phase of the assisted migration program there was a very heavy emphasis on migration from Britain in a very deliberate attempt to maintain the ethnic balance and the 'White Australia' concept. However, for several reasons, there was an equally deliberate change in the migration pattern from British to predominantly Southern and Eastern European migrants. That change brought with it a significant change in the pattern of church affiliation and attendance. Of the one and a half million migrants who arrived in Australia between 1945 and 1956, 47.5 percent were Roman Catholic, there were large numbers of Orthodox Christians and significant numbers of people of other faiths. This meant that the relative strength of the major denominations shifted significantly and the strongly disciplined Roman Catholic church developed much greater political and social influence. That process had actually started in 1945 with the National Catholic Rural Movement and the National Catholic Social Movement both promoting Catholic policies vigorously among organized labour and in rural lobbies in close collaboration with the church hierarchy. It was quite consistent with the Vatican's policies on social action which had been spelled out in 1929, but it coincided with the establishment of the International Committee of Catholic Charities which was set up in May 1945 to coordinate relief and resettlement of the victims of war, and with the vigorous push to strengthen Catholic Action world wide which Pius XII initiated at that time. That push provided the main spring for the initiatives taken in Australia. (See below, under references to Italy.)

THE SOVIET UNION

The Soviet Union, America's other major World War II ally, was intent on ensuring that its revitalised Christian church was supportive of the state and that it had good relations with Orthodox churches in other countries. After the rapprochement between Stalin's government and the Russian Orthodox Church in June 1941 at the time of the Nazi invasion, the position of the church had gradually improved. Most Christians accepted the decision of their Patriarch, ignored vigorous Nazi propaganda which was designed to entice them into an underground fifth column in support of Germany – and Divini Redemptoris which had contributed so much to the crises of the previous four years – and supported the Soviet government. There were, as was to be expected, crises when Archbishop Polycarp in the Ukraine broke his ties with Moscow to establish an autocephalous church and when some Orthodox priests in the occupied territories, no doubt anticipating a sweeping German victory, accepted an allegiance with Germany. The Ukrainian church was not recognized by the Nazis and its adherents suffered massacres twice:

first as the Germans moved east and regarded them as subversive elements to be eliminated to make way for German settlements, and secondly as the Russians moved back west and regarded them as traitors. In other occupied areas those priests, and their followers, who had accepted the presence of the Germans, even if they did not actively support them, were also regarded as traitors and massacred as the Soviet troops returned. It was only after a period of great confusion and terror that the Soviet government recognized that many of the Orthodox clergy and Christians in those occupied areas were in fact fighting against the Germans. They were then, somewhat reluctantly, accepted as underground resistance forces and supplied with arms and food.

In September 1943 Stalin agreed to the convening of a sobor to elect a Patriarch for all Russia. Sergius was elected. The church then issued a call for Russians world wide to fight against Hitler in support of their home land; the government discontinued the publication of anti-religious newspapers; established a council to direct relations between the state and the church; and, in June 1944, permitted the opening of a theological training institute. In early 1945, with the end of the war in sight, another sobor was held, this time with a number of observers from foreign churches, including each of the Orthodox churches in Greece, the Middle East, North Africa, the Balkans and even North America. A new statute for the Russian Orthodox Church was approved, providing for a structure of diocese, deaneries and parishes directed through a Council for Orthodox Church Affairs. In quick succession the new patriarch, Alexius, made visits to most of the Orthodox churches in the countries represented at the sobor and the churches of countries then under Soviet occupation were either granted autocephalous status, recognized as exarchates, or brought under the jurisdiction of the Patriarchate of Moscow. Then, in 1946, in spite of protests from the Vatican, the Galician Uniate Church in an area which had been part of pre-war Poland was induced to break its ties with Rome and to renew its association with the Russian Orthodox Church. However the expatriate Russian Orthodox Churches in Western Europe and North America remained independent and did not align themselves with Moscow and, while they established relations with the Russian Orthodox Church, the Greek Orthodox Church and the Ecumenical Patriarch at Constantinople also remained independent.

In spite of the fruitful relations which the Soviet government had established with its own and other Orthodox churches it was painfully aware of the way in which the church had previously been used by both Russian conservatives and Western governments to undermine both its authority and communism generally. It was also painfully aware that the Roman Catholic Church's highest priorities were still to counter the influence of communism and to gain control of the Orthodox Churches in Eastern Europe. The Soviet Union was therefore not at all eager to see an extension of Christianity by missionary activity in Japan or anywhere else, unless it would enable it to gain a bit of diplomatic leverage. It was no different, in that sense, to the other countries in the victorious alliance.

RELIGIOUS SELF-UNDERSTANDING: THE VANQUISHED NATIONS

GERMANY

The churches of Germany, focal point of both the Reformation and the conflict of World War II, were in total disarray when the war ended. Because of the ebb and flow of mass population movements and displacements across Europe the monolithic Roman Catholic Church was in a relatively stronger position than before the war. In Western Germany its nominal share of the population was 45% compared with about 33% before the war and in Eastern Germany, where Christians had to adapt to life under Communist rule, its share of the population was much lower.⁷⁰ But it had to overcome the enormous credibility gap caused by the Vatican's concordat with Hitler's regime, its ambivalence in its dealings with the Nazis and the Western Allies, and its expectations of the benefits which would have flowed from its relationship with Hitler if he had succeeded in his plans. In spite of his efforts to hijack the church's extensive education network, many more Catholic clergy than Protestants had joined and supported Nazi organizations, no doubt encouraged by his Roman Catholic affiliation, the similarity between the stream of anti-Semitic statements in the Jesuit press and Nazi propaganda, and the Vatican's insistence that support for Hitler was the most effective way of countering Communism, about which it was paranoid. One measure which had the effect of diverting the attention of Catholics from these controversies was the promotion of the Liturgical Movement and the recitation of the Breviary. At the same time it helped to offset the shortage of clergy and access to churches, and to retain cohesion within the Catholic community. But at the same time the Protestant churches had their own form of credibility gap to overcome, even though they had always been under greater threat because of Hitler's association with the Catholic Church and because a mere 5% of Protestant clergy had any direct connections with Nazi organizations. A great effort was necessary to reconcile the divisions between the Evangelical and Confessing wings on one hand and the German Faith Movement and the Faith Movement of German Christians which had sought to rationalize Christian theology and National Socialism on the other. This reconciliation could not be achieved through a simple mechanism such as increased dependence on prescribed liturgy because that was not a mechanism of worship which the Reformed churches, generally, were comfortable with.

The leadership of all of the churches had been weakened by deaths, casualties, imprisonments, expulsions, evacuations and, in addition, the requirement to provide chaplains for the armed services. Somewhat surprisingly, in view of their known opposition to the Nazi government, their involvement in resistance movements and the prior commitment of the Catholic Church to provide chaplains for the German army, some 45% of all Protestant clergy were required for military duty and this placed heavy demands on elderly and infirm clergy to service parish needs. Even so, chaplains were only posted to the army and navy. The air force had none.⁷¹ A very high proportion of church properties were in ruins; their people were in a state of shock after the bulk of the population had been coerced into widespread acceptance of Nazi philosophy and the degrading policies which the Third Reich had pursued, and attempts to bring the entire church under Nazi control. This tended to break down barriers between the people on opposing sides of the Reformation barrier and lead to greater cooperation than there had previously been in such matters as the shared use of buildings and pastoral care of congregations.

However those who remained firm to the principles of the Confessing Church and provided the backbone of the Resistance gained strength and determination from their experience and from their belief that their faith and their stand had been vindicated. A large number of theologians, biblical scholars and church historians of the German Protestant Churches were prominent in stimulating a new self-understanding within the church and theological reassessment during and following the war. The list is enormous but they included Martin Niemöller, Dietrich Bonhoeffer (executed, 1945), Rudolf Bultmann, Jürgen Moltmann, E. Kasemann and Paul Tillich, with whom Karl Barth must be included because of his long association with the church in Germany. In due course they would be joined by a number of Roman Catholic theologians, but once the peak of the crisis had passed the churches' main interest was reconstruction and a return to what they were comfortable with. In the Roman Catholic Church dissent and reassessment would be suppressed in an effort to maintain and build on a position of privilege. Among the Protestant Churches it would be suppressed for a different reason: an effort to maintain the ecumenical momentum and to move towards the 'One Body of Christ' which everyone yearned for. And the church could use the writings of some of those theologians to justify a 'no change' attitude.

One of them, Dietrich Bonhoeffer, was a remarkable model of commitment and selflessness in the face of adversity and a threat to faith. A Lutheran by upbringing, he studied theology in Berlin and, later, in the United States just at the time that Hitler was struggling towards power in his home country. He was 33 when Hitler seized power. He took an anti-Nazi stand and went to London as pastor to the expatriate German community but returned to Germany to help train pastors for the Confessing Church, saying that he would have no right to participate in the reconstruction of Christian life in Germany after the war if he did not share in the time of trial by its people.⁷² Banned by the Nazis from teaching at the University of Berlin, he went to the US to teach at the Union Theological Seminary in 1939 but returned to Germany after only a few months. Prominent among leaders of the ecumenical movement, he also became involved in plotting a change of government, acted as a conduit for messages to Britain via church leaders in Sweden. He was arrested on suspicion of direct involvement in plots to assassinate Hitler, imprisoned from April 1943, thrown into concentration camp in February 1945 after files had been discovered which confirmed his involvement in the plotting, and he was executed on April 9, four weeks before Germany's unconditional surrender.

Bonhoeffer's Letters from Prison and other writings led to controversy and confusion among theologians, some of whom had been personal colleagues, but they also provided inspiration for many people in a time of trouble and they help to illustrate the depth of the problem confronting the church. Because of the incisiveness of some of his writings he was regarded as an iconoclast who wanted to dismantle the established church,⁷³ saying, for example: "Those who are recognized as authorities are only bearers of an authority belonging to the community, bearers of an office, bearers of a Word. They are not the office itself, nor the Word itself."⁷⁴ But, like Karl Barth (who actually found some of Bonhoeffer's letters disturbing and "a thorn in the flesh"⁷⁵), when it came to pursuing a line of argument which might undermine peoples' faith (or the church, which was often assumed to mean the same thing) which was so important to him, he became a rank conservative. So: in Christology he was at pains to justify Trinitarian belief. In the introduction he acknowledged that: "... christology remains unique. It has no proof by which it can demonstrate transcendence of its subject. Its statement that this transcendence, namely the Logos, is a human person, is presupposition and not subject to proof ... (but) ... christology is the centre of all disciplines."⁷⁶ He then proceeded to discuss and to justify the contemporary teaching about Christ, moving from one of the church's developed statements to another (for example: "Because Jesus Christ is man, he is present in time and space; because Jesus Christ is God, he is eternally present"⁷⁷) with theological gymnastics which would have done justice to Thomas Aquinas' Treatise on the Truth of the Catholic Faith, against Unbelievers. (Chapter 8) He posed a series of questions, such as: "How could God suffer in Christ – and still be omniscient and omnipotent in him?" On that, his comment was: "The answer to these questions must be so given that it does not place the deity of Christ in question, nor make nonsense of his humanity."⁷⁸ And in discussing the Word of God under the heading 'Positive Christology' he said: "Rather than something added, this Word coming down from God is that man Jesus Christ himself. And therefore, because Jesus Christ is also God's judgement on himself, he points, at one and the same time, to both God and to himself."⁷⁹ But a key statement comes towards the end, under the heading 'The Historical Christ': "The humiliated God-Man is the stumbling block for the Jews, i.e. for religious, upright men."⁸⁰ In that, he got it very wrong. The humiliated God-Man is the stumbling block for the Christians.

Germany's Roman Catholic Church reactivated most of the structures and organizations of the pre-war period as quickly as it could and, with the help of its world wide connections through the Vatican, its rehabilitation, restoration and welfare services, and social or political action organizations were soon in full swing. These included Catholic Action, Bonifatius Verein, the Catholic Workers' Movement, Caritas, newspapers and book publishers, and a re-invigorated Liturgical Movement, but only a small part of the Catholic school system because the Federal German Republic provided for church-supervised religious instruction in all schools, and all high schools and universities were to be state institutions.⁸¹

On the other hand the top priority of the Protestant churches had to be reorganization. The leaders of the Confessing Churches soon took effective control. Leaders of the German Christians and the Faith Movements who were discredited through their cooperation with the Nazi regime were soon removed from office and barely three months after the surrender, in August 1945, the Evangelical Church in Germany (the EKD) was established as a loose federation of the Landeskirchen plus the Moravian Church, with Bishop Otto Dibelius of Berlin as chairman of its council. The other 'Free' or independent Protestant churches remained outside the EKD but established working links with it and its member Landskirkchen as members of the Committee of the Christian Churches with Martin Niemoller as its head, and some confessional groups were established within the framework of the EKD. Only two months later the EKD was welcomed into full fellowship with Protestant churches in the countries with which Germany had been at war when the general secretary of the World Council of Churches (still in process of formation), W.A. Visser 't Hooft, and representatives of a number of major churches and national councils of churches met with the EKD council in Stuttgart. At that meeting, after outlining the path of the world crisis which arose in part from the Treaty of Versailles, the council gave clear notice of the policy which was to become its hallmark. It pleaded for Christians to unite "to establish relations between peoples on the basis not of revenge and retribution but of forgiveness and trust and thus to seek to counter the alienation from God and the hostility to Christ which twice in a generation had brought disaster to peoples and states originally founded on Christian principles."⁸²

An early initiative of the EKD was the establishment of Hilfswerk as an umbrella agency of all non-Roman Catholic churches in Germany to provide welfare, refugee resettlement, church restoration and social action programs with very strong lay participation. In addition some of the pre-war Protestant organizations were revived, such as the Inner Mission and the Gossner Mission, and new ventures were established, including a series of youth villages operated through the YMCA; the Ecumenical Sisterhood of Mary; and a series of eighteen Evangelical Academies, five of which were in East Germany (the German Democratic Republic). Recruitment for ministry was not a problem but servicing the numbers of young students and those of mature years who enrolled for theological training for the ministry was. For six years the number of candidates offering for Protestant ministry rose strongly, possibly reflecting the fact that under the Nazis the theological faculties of universities were closed to Confessing Church students. They reached a peak in 1949–50 before falling away. To cope with the numbers and to tailor their training to the pastoral needs of the time a series of church colleges (Kirkliche Hochschulen) for theological training, and a separate series of Pastoralcolleges providing specialized training in theology and ministry for pastors as an alternative to universities were established. In addition an ongoing system of Kirchentags or lay pastoral training programs was also established.

As in World War I, so in World War II German Protestant Missions in most countries were closed and only a few missionaries were able to remain active through the support of the International Missionary Council and the Orphaned Missions Fund. Formal contact between the German and other Continental mission societies was re-established in 1946 and in 1947 German delegates attended the IMC meeting at Whitby. Clearly, the German churches and related mission societies were not in a position to offer missionaries for placement in Japan at the time of the occupation and in any case the victorious Allies would have seen no basis on which to agree that they could do so.

ITALY: VANQUISHED, VICTOR OR TURNCOAT OF CONVENIENCE?

Now, Italy. Because it is the home of the Roman Catholic Church we must look at it from three points of view: things which the Catholic Church did which related to Italy in a domestic sense; things which the Vatican did as the controller of its world wide religious network; and things which the Vatican did to maintain its power base or its temporal authority. During the war the Pope and the Curia had tried as best they could to play down (in the countries of the Western Alliance) the fact that they had a concordat with Germany and both a treaty and a concordat with the government of its historical host country, Italy. It was hard to avoid being seen to favour, or to respond to the demands of the country within which they ran their land-locked mini-city-state without port, air or road access or any means of communication except radio, other than by courtesy of the country's Fascist dictator. The task was made even harder by the fact that German Jesuits had become particularly influential on academic questions under Pope Pius XII⁸³ and this showed in such practical and political areas as reporting on Jewish affairs in the Vatican press. But one of the immediate consequences was that when Italy entered the war in June 1940, the Vatican had to establish a purchasing office in a neutral center. It chose Portugal's capital, Lisbon. It stayed there for four years, until after the 'friendly' German forces had been expelled from Rome in June, 1944. At that time the Pontifical Commission of Assistance was also established, essentially for refugee support. These moves both helped to reinvigorate the Italian operations of the Catholic Church.

A SHIFT OF GEAR: THE LITURGICAL MOVEMENT

On March 24, 1945, still a month before the American break through at Bologna, Pius XII issued the encyclical Motu proprio Quotidianis precibus, promoting the Liturgical Movement and the recitation of the Breviary in a transparent bid to focus peoples' attention on the form or practice of worship and to distract them from the greater controversy over the role and activities of their clergy and the church which was obviously about to erupt with the impending defeat of the Nazi regime and the collapse of the current phase of Fascism. And in a bid to further the Vatican's policy of Ultramontanism and to cement its grip on the world wide church by focussing attention on Rome, he announced the discovery of what was purported to be the grave of the Apostle Peter under the high altar of the cathedral of St. Peter, in Rome. Then in May, following Germany's agreement to unconditional surrender, he announced the establishment of the International Committee of Catholic Charities to coordinate relief work, with its headquarters not in Rome but in Paris where it could be expected to attract more sympathy and support. He also began more actively promoting Catholic Action which, during the war, had become fragmented under regional leadership and brought it under the direction of the church hierarchy to ensure continuity of Catholic political intervention and a recovery in its political influence. As already noted, there was an immediate response in countries such as France and Australia. Some months later he moved to establish a Papal Commission of bishops in Italy and new statutes were announced (in 1946) to revive the national, diocesan and parochial structures with greater lay participation and direction. A large number of organizations based on occupations or professions were established and a network of local civic committees was soon in operation organizing annual Catholic Action conferences.

DEIPARAE VIRGINIS MARIAE

Another important move came on May 1, 1946, when Pius XII canvassed the bishops on the possibility of defining the Assumption of the Blessed Virgin Mary as a dogma of faith. In his encyclical Deiparae Virginis Mariae,⁸⁴ he referred to long term veneration of Mary, widespread invocation of her assistance, and the faithful vying with each other in ever renewed demonstrations of ardent piety toward the Queen of Heaven. He noted that two volumes of petitions received between 1849 and 1940 had “reached the Holy See, all begging that the bodily Assumption into heaven of the Blessed Virgin should be defined and proclaimed as a dogma of faith” and that “almost two hundred fathers” in the Vatican Council in 1870 [out of some 800 present] had “fervently requested it.” He said that in line with papal responsibility to “keep away everything adverse to this Kingdom (of Christ) and to support what ever may promote it, (he) had to examine most carefully whether it would be lawful, convenient and useful to support with Our authority” the proclamation of the Assumption as dogma. He asked the bishops to inform him “about the devotion of your clergy and people (taking into account their faith and piety) toward the Assumption” and whether the proclamation is “desired by your clergy and people.”

There was no question about theological honesty or integrity. Just the desirability, lawfulness, convenience and usefulness of promoting it. It was a classic case of dogma being determined on the basis of likely impact on the religious and political numbers game without regard for the impact on interfaith relations at the very time when the world was struggling – really struggling – to understand and to disentangle the worst crisis in human history: a crisis which had occurred as a result of the abuse of religion and interfaith relations. It was also a classic illustration of the fact that the Vatican could not understand how the world crisis had come about and, because of its deeply entrenched self-understanding, it did not understand its own responsibility for, or role in, the evolution and impact of that crisis. The only thing to be said in its favour is that very few other people did either.

TEMPORAL AUTHORITY, THE LATERAN TREATY AND CIVIL GOVERNMENT

A consideration of far greater significance resulted from the fact that Pius XII, in his various roles under his predecessor, Pius XI, had, together with Pius XI, come to the view that contemporary Italian and German authoritarian forms of government were ‘normal’⁸⁵ and were the forms which most closely complemented the Vatican’s want to be the equally authoritative moral enforcer for the world in association with such governments. He only grudgingly moved away from that view and came to accept ‘democracy’ as an alternative. (Chapter 25, ‘Another change of heart’) He did not necessarily equate ‘democracy’ with ‘capitalism’ which he had vigorously supported against 'communism.' This is evident from his Christmas Allocution, dated December 24, 1944, Democracy – True and False.⁸⁶ Referring to the “universal upheaval” which had brought mournful groans of sorrow from “the heart-rending anguish of oppressed individuals and countries” Pius XII noted that “an ever-increasing number of noble souls” were determined that it should mark “a starting point for a new era of far-reaching renovation – the complete re-organization of the world.” He said: “While one may well discuss the worth, the feasibility, the efficacy of various proposals, and suspend judgement about them, it is for all that plainly true and evident that this movement has begun ... and peoples have awakened as it were from a heavy sleep.” They had, he said, “taken a new attitude toward the State and toward those who govern – they ask questions, they criticize, and they distrust. Taught by bitter experience, they are more aggressive in opposing the concentration of power in dictatorships that cannot be censured or touched, and in calling for a system of government more in keeping with the dignity and liberty of the citizens.” Then, clearly implying that the change could have been avoided, that it was not intrinsically necessary, and that it was not necessary to change the whole system, he said the multitudes “are today firmly convinced ... that had there been the possibility of censuring and correcting the actions of public authority, the world would not have been dragged into the vortex of a disastrous war, and that to avoid the repetition ... we must vest efficient guarantees in the people themselves.”

Quoting from an 1888 encyclical of Leo XIII he said “it is not forbidden to prefer temperate, popular forms of government, without prejudice, however, to Catholic teaching on the origin and use of authority,” and that “the Church does not disapprove of any of the various forms of government, provided they be by themselves capable of securing the good of the citizens.” [Emphasis added] In other words Pius XII was saying: ‘change if you must, but I prefer the old way.’ He directed attention to “the problem of democracy” and said: “Our aim is to examine the norms by which it should be directed ... and democracy ... admits of various forms, and can be realised in monarchies as well as republics.” Then came a caution. Because “the democratic form of government appears to many a postulate of nature imposed by reason itself ... the demand ... for better democracy ... can have no other meaning than that citizens shall be increasingly placed in a position to hold their own opinions, to voice them, and to make them effective in promoting their general welfare.” He did not say in so many words that the Church would lose its influence and its control. He didn't have to. If “reason itself” prevailed, where would that leave the church? Then as he worked through a couple of contradictory concepts he noted firstly that “the masses ... become an easy plaything in the hands of anyone who seeks to exploit their instincts and impressions,” and secondly that the masses “are the capital enemy of true democracy and of its ideal of liberty and equality.” And reverting to the thrust of previous encyclicals that all peoples are not equal, he said: “In a people worthy of the name those inequalities which are not based on whims but on the nature of things – inequalities of culture, possessions, social standing – so long as they are not prejudicial to justice and mutual charity, do not constitute any obstacle to the existence and the prevalence of a true spirit of union and brotherhood.” Then: “If men, using their personal liberty, were to deny all dependence on a superior authority possessed of coercive power, they would ... cut the ground from under their own dignity and liberty for they would be violating the divinely-ordained order of beings and purposes.” Put another way, Pius was saying: ‘rule by those who are privileged and dominant is the God-given norm.’

He insisted that the dignity and authority of that absolute order of government was conferred by God through its participation in the authority of God exercised through the Church. Experience showed, he said, that “every legislative body ... should have within it a group of select men ... chosen because of their solidly Christian convictions (and) where such men are lacking, others come to take their places to make politics serve their ambition, and to a quick road to profit for themselves, their caste and their class.” But neither that absolute order of government, nor absolute monarchy, were to be confused with “state absolutism” in which “there is no right of appeal against it to a higher law which binds in conscience.”

Then, with an eye to the facts that while more than 90% of the Italian population were baptised Roman Catholics only 20% of them were practicing and almost 50% of the population then supported either Communism or Socialism, Pius XII said: “If the future is to belong to democracy, an essential part in that achievement will have to be given to the religion of Christ and to the Church. She is the mouthpiece of our Redeemer and the institution which carries on His mission of saving men. She teaches and defends supernatural truths and communicates to men the supernatural helps of grace in order to actuate the divinely-established order of beings and ends which is the ultimate foundation and directive norm of every democracy.” So everything was dependent on the Church: the Roman Catholic Church. Democracy couldn't even be set in motion without a touch of the church's magic.

Pius XII had served notice to the world, yet again, that any country or any peoples who wanted government without the Church of Rome would face a determined and well orchestrated battle. He was not responding to the Cold War. The real war was still far from finished. German forces still occupied half of mainland Italy and it would take another four months of grueling bombardment before they would be forced to capitulate when American forces finally broke the German frontier at Bologna. The Italian Fascist government had realized where its fortunes lay more than a year earlier. It deposed Mussolini and arrested him in July 1943, signed an armistice in August, then swapped sides and declared war on Germany in October, only to find it was powerless to do anything to expel the Germans without an Allied invasion. A landing was made near Rome in January, 1944, and the city was occupied on June 4. Then in October the Allies agreed upon ‘spheres of influence’ in the Balkans. Rumania, Bulgaria and Hungary were to be under Russian influence, Greece was to be under British influence, and Yugoslavia under joint influence.

At that time, as Pius XII prepared his allocution, there was certainly no such thing as a ‘cold war.’ The concept had not even been dreamed up. The people of the West were lauding the Soviet successes in pushing the German armies out of Russia and back across Poland – and the wonderful cooperation between countries with such different political systems. Tension over the zones of influence was still a thing of the future. In fact Pius XII was most unhappy with the adulation which was being heaped on the Russians and he was providing one of the major ingredients which would fuel tension over the question of zones of influence, and in the postwar period his unrelenting anti-communism would "fit perfectly into the Cold War mentality of the West."⁸⁷

It was not a cold war but a very real war which was looming in Italy over the shape of its post war constitution and the role of the church which was uppermost in his mind. The existing constitution was of no consequence. It had not been in operation from the time of the Allied occupation. There would be a lot of hard bargaining and outbreaks of civil war before a new one would be settled. There were a lot of people, and not only the Communists, who did not want a role for the church written into the Italian constitution. If the Vatican and the state of Italy were totally separate and independent temporal powers, as the Vatican claimed and as was recognized in the Lateran Treaty, why should one be obliged to accept a role for the other? The state of Italy and its people – especially those in business – were very happy to accept the benefits of pilgrimage, or tourism, which flowed from the special character of Rome as the seat of Roman Catholic Christianity. The extent of that 'pilgrimage,' and the value of it, would fall considerably if the Vatican were ejected or lost its special status. But there were many who were not happy to accept the conditions which went with it: exclusive recognition of Roman Catholicism as the religion of the nation; compulsory Catholic religious education in all schools; a total ban on divorce; and, of the greatest potential irritation in the post war environment, that all bishops were to be Italian speaking Italian subjects and that they were to take an oath of loyalty to the state. This ensured that the church would be forever imposing what the state required and that the state would forever be under pressure to legislate in accordance with the church's very restrictive social teaching. As a working relationship it was little different to that in the most oppressive days of the Holy Roman Empire.

It was fundamental to Vatican self-understanding and to its ability to impose its policy of ultramontanist that the constitutional links with Italy had to be maintained and the Vatican knew that to do so was going to be very difficult. After Mussolini had been deposed and imprisoned by the Fascist Grand Council then rescued and installed as puppet governor of Northern Italy, partisan armies quickly formed to help the Germans on their way home. No more than one third of the 70,000 or more partisans were either Christian Democrats or Fascists, while about two thirds were under the command of Communists and sympathetic to their cause, or Socialists or other anti-Fascists. When the Germans were driven out of Milan it was the partisans who occupied the city before the Allied forces arrived. Immediately after the war the country was administered by a loose coalition of anti-Fascist parties led by Ferruccio Parri, and for a time the northern region was swept by waves of purges, massacres and counter-purges by both the anti-Fascists and the Fascists. In the circumstances it was clear to the pope and the Vatican hierarchy that the support of the United States and Britain was essential if the links between the Vatican and the state of Italy were to be maintained. This had a major bearing on the pope's new 'alliance' with Churchill and his change of heart towards democracy which he reluctantly announced in his 1944 Christmas broadcast. (Chapter 25)

A TOUCH OF FOREIGN AID

In November 1945 Parri was forced from office and a Christian Democrat, Alcide De Gasperi, the Foreign Minister favourably disposed towards the US, took office as Prime Minister. DE Gasperi entered parliament as a deputy in 1921 but in 1927 he was gaoled for four years by Mussolini for anti-Fascist activities. However in 1929 he was released as a result of intervention by Pope Pius XI during the negotiations for the Lateran Treaty and appointed a librarian in the Vatican. His main tasks on taking office as prime minister were to agree a peace treaty with the Allies – while the Americans were the occupying power – to determine a new constitution and to determine the relationship between the Vatican and Italy. A referendum was agreed to determine the fate of the monarchy. Echoes of Germany after the First World War. King Victor Emmanuel III, having reigned during the Fascist era, abdicated in favor of his son who became King Umberto II. Umberto's reign was cut very short. The referendum in June 1946 recorded 54 per cent in favor of a republic. A peace treaty was drawn up and ratified in September 1947 in terms much more favourable than would have been the case if Italy had not changed sides in mid 1943, or if it had decided to retain the monarchy, or if it had retained a left wing coalition government. The new constitution took effect in January 1948 – with the Lateran Treaty of 1929 confirmed – and with elections set for April 18. Italy and the Vatican were also confirmed as the focal point for anti-Communist fervour in Europe and American aid and investment flowed freely.

In fact Central Intelligence Agency money flowed so freely that it “swung the results of the Italian election to the right.”⁸⁸ The US signed a ten-year treaty of friendship, commerce and navigation with Italy – the first such treaty that it signed after the war – and during the three or four weeks before the election there was a Hollywood-style American bombardment of the air waves, the press, the unions and every human nerve centre. It included a letter writing campaign coordinated by The Committee to Aid Democracy in Italy which involved churches in America and the American Legion mailing up to ten million items. The US Justice Department served notice that any Italian who was known to have voted for a Communist candidate would be excluded from entry to the US. Both US and British warships were frequently anchored off major Italian ports and Time magazine published a widely distributed editorial expressing the sentiment that “The US should make it clear that it will use force, if necessary, to prevent Italy from going Communist.” Gifts which had been collected in the US were distributed freely from a ‘friendship train.’ The CIA and the Italian-American Labor Council worked closely with the Christian Democrats and subsidized the campaigns of anti-Communist unions and candidates. By its own later admission the CIA gave $US1 million to centre parties, but it is thought that the actual figure was closer to $US10 million. Truman announced the ‘transfer’ to the Italian government of 29 merchant ships, most of which it had seized during the war anyway. The US approved an additional $US18.7 million in “interim aid” to Italy, then made a “first payment” of $US4.3 million as “wages” for Italians who had worked “voluntarily” for the occupation forces. Then followed two shipments of grain, value $US8 million; the promise to allocate $US31 million in gold to replace gold looted by the Nazis during their occupation of Rome (which the pope had described as orderly); and, only four days before the election, the announcement of a series of grants to the Italian Ministry of Fine Arts.

All of that was complemented by a fraudulent smear campaign against Communist candidates which involved quite a bit of document forgery and accusation of scandalous sex and fascist or anti-church conduct, backed up by a blitz of American ‘culture’ of the type which the pope had objected to in making his reluctant shift from the support of authoritarian governments to democracy. It was merely a taste of what was in store for other countries.⁸⁹ But the most sordid aspect of the whole campaign was that the unresolved issue of the trusteeship for the former Italian colony of Somaliland became a matter of competitive propaganda between the US and the Italian Communists. United Nations approval for an Italian trusteeship would show the world that Italy had sloughed off its Fascist flirtation with Nazi Germany and that it was again a respected member of the international community and worthy of such responsibility. A country which would sponsor such a trusteeship was, naturally, Italy’s friend and a good model to follow. The US government even stated that it favoured Italian trusteeship over some of its other African colonies such as Ethiopia and Libya,⁹⁰ in spite of the fact that Ethiopia, having been relieved by the Allies in 1941, had actually been an original member of the United Nations with its membership dating from November 13, 1945!

However, in addition to the CIA’s direct contribution to the anti-Communist campaign, it may have collaborated in another program which shows in the records as a Vatican contribution. Mgr. Giovanni Battista Montini, Undersecretary of State and later pontiff as Pope Paul VI, arranged “financing for an organization of Catholic civic committees dedicated to countering Communist influence and campaigning for the Christian Democrats.” He provided a start-up fund of a hundred million lira through the Vatican Bank, and financed it through the sale of surplus United States war material.⁹¹

MISSIONARY ENTERPRISE

While the Vatican’s primary focuses in Europe were the rehabilitation and reconstruction of the church throughout the continent, the suppression of communism, and the strengthening of the church’s political thrust by the consolidation and expansion of lay participation through Catholic Action, it did not lose sight of missionary enterprise. In due course, in 1951, Pius XII sought to shift the emphasis heavily in that direction and issued the encyclical Evangelii Praecones.⁹² He referred to the fact that “this year also there is a great increase in the generous help and support given by Our children to the missions” and said: “Your charity can certainly be employed in no better cause since it is thus destined to propagate the Kingdom of Christ and to bring salvation to so many still outside the Fold.” He linked it very deliberately to Catholic Action, saying "we exhort ... not only missionary priests but also those laymen who 'with a great heart and a willing mind' collaborate with the missionaries in the ranks of Catholic Action." And: "Although it is clear that Catholic Action should exercise its influence primarily in promoting the works of the apostolate, its members are not prevented from joining other organizations whose purpose is to reform social and political life according to the principles and teaching of the Gospel; in fact their participation not only as citizens, but as Catholics also, is a right which they possess and a duty to which they are bound." However, like the Protestant churches, the Vatican was forced to rely heavily on support from the United States in the period immediately following the war and the recruitment and training of priests and other religious for mission fields was stepped up a notch.

It is very difficult to compare figures for missionary placement published by different authorities because they are often prepared on different bases, and it is difficult to even determine the total number of Christian missionaries working in 'foreign missions' in the years following World War II. However there was a widespread belief that Christian missionary traffic was all one way and had to be that way: from Europe to the rest of the world. The situation was summed up by a Swiss theologian even thirty years after the war with the words: "Europe is Christianity: Christianity is Europe."⁹³ But while France retained its pre-eminence as the provider of Roman Catholic missionaries from Europe, with strong contributions also from Belgium, Ireland and the Netherlands, the church was accelerating its efforts to recruit and train clergy in non-European countries and the influence of the United States was growing rapidly. By the 1950s the Society for the Propagation of the Faith (a fund raising and promotional body of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith which directs the Roman Catholic Church's world wide mission operations) obtained more than two thirds of its income from the United States (the society's expenditure represented about one fifth of total Roman Catholic mission expenditure)⁹⁴ and by 1956 about 20% of all missionary priests were drawn from there.⁹⁵ At about the same time two out of every three Protestant missionaries world wide were from the United States.⁹⁶

Also at the same time, the Protestant churches and the Ecumenical Movement were relying heavily on funds from the United States. The World Council of Churches accepted a substantial gift from John D. Rockefeller Jnr., son of the founder of the Standard Oil conglomerate, in February 1946 which enabled it to establish the Ecumenical Institute at Chateau de Bossey, Switzerland, and various US sources contributed heavily to the funding of international ecumenical conferences, a fact which enabled American delegates to exercise disproportionate influence on many occasions. The Commission of the Churches on International Affairs was also established in 1946 under the joint auspices of the International Missionary Council and the World Council of Churches with the help of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in the United States.⁹⁷ Thus, writing in the context of Christian missionary endeavour, Stephen Neill could say in 1964: "This is beyond question the American century. The increasing dominance of the United States in the political affairs of the world is reflected in the vigour, generosity, and vision of the American Churches in the field of Christian missions." The fact that by 1963 the non-denominational Sudan Interior Mission, which drew its workers mainly from the traditionally conservative 'Bible Belt' of the mid west of the US, had grown to be probably the biggest Protestant missionary organization in the world provides another illustration of that dominance.⁹⁸ Thus, as the United States set about its very deliberate Christian Reconstruction of Japan in September 1945 with MacArthur at the helm, it, and he, were almost uninhibited in the policies they could implement, knowing that they were assured of strong domestic support. The money and the people would just keep coming.

THE CHRISTIAN RECONSTRUCTION OF JAPAN

Clause six of the Potsdam Declaration stated that the authority and influence of those who had deceived and misled the people of Japan into embarking on world conquest "must be eliminated for all time ... for we insist that a new order of peace, security and justice will be impossible until irresponsible militarism is driven from the world." Clause ten then noted that the Allies did not intend to destroy Japan as a nation or enslave its people "but stern justice shall be meted out to all war criminals, including those who have visited cruelties upon our prisoners"; all obstacles to "the revival and strengthening of democratic tendencies" shall be removed; and "freedom of speech, of religion, and of thought, as well as respect for the fundamental human rights shall be established."⁹⁹

It could be concluded from those clauses that the Western World's sense of responsibility had progressed with lightning speed since Britain applied its pressure on Japan to recognize its particular state-church link and since the United States so recently imposed an embargo on oils supplies to Japan, effectively precipitating the Japanese decision for war in the Pacific. But it could also be concluded that the signatories to the declaration (the Presidents of the US and China and the Prime Minister of Britain) had a very short memory for the history and conduct of the Christian Western World, the Vatican's innumerable efforts to inhibit freedom of religion, speech and thought, the Oath Against Modernism, and its various other measures to suppress human rights and freedom, including the straight-jacket social encyclicals of a mere ten years before the outbreak of World War Two. And what of its hunt for additional church-state links through concordats like those with Mussolini and Hitler – at exactly the time that the Japanese generals were trying to harness religion for their purposes? Perhaps the Allies would have argued that they had opposed the Vatican's forms of state-church links as well – but they could not do so with any credibility. And what about the clause of the United Nations Charter which the United States had just ratified with its call for the respect of culture? That was just a minor inconvenience. It was not to be an impediment to change if the victor wanted it.

The Allies had taken full advantage of those assorted measures when it suited them but they now expected Japan to adopt the particular contemporary mind set which had come to suit their purposes, and pronto! There is a sense in which, by establishing a Religious Division within the Supreme Command for the Allied Powers (SCAP) the Allies were adding yet another dimension to state-church relations. SCAP took on the role of supervising important aspects of the work of the Japanese Ministry of Education through the subordinate US Eighth Army Headquarters in Yokohama. Their stated reason was that there was already a religious section in the ministry which required a parallel occupation structure, but the driving motive was to establish a version of religious freedom which the Allies saw as a fundamental requirement of a democratic society. It was a radical shift in thinking from 'political stability requires religious conformity.' But they determined to separate Shinto from the State in the mistaken belief that the teachings of Shinto were 'inimicable (sic) to the peace of the world' and that Japan's ultranationalism, militarism and aggressiveness were rooted in and spiritually undergirded by a State Shinto Cult.

In any case, the Potsdam Declaration had much the effect in Japan which the Allied declarations on Germany had had in that country. It so horrified some of the senior military figures in cabinet that, not knowing that the United States had developed an atomic bomb, they sought to prevent the Emperor from proceeding with surrender and also sought to hold back from the negotiating table and to fight on in an effort to achieve more acceptable surrender terms. Their decision gave the US exactly the 'justification' it was determined to provoke so that it could assess the destructive capacity of its latest weapon in real life-and-death warfare and demonstrate its unchallengeable authority to the whole world. But when the Soviet Union, through which they were hoping to negotiate with the Allies, reneged on the non-aggression pact between them, declared war and invaded Manchuria on August 8, (between the two bombs), it actually strengthened their determination to do so and coup plotting began.¹⁰¹ The emperor then took the matter into his own hands and advised cabinet to accept the surrender terms to avoid further death and destruction. On August 10, his government advised the US that it was willing to surrender on the understanding that the Potsdam Declaration did not prejudice the prerogatives of the Emperor as a sovereign ruler. But in spite of two facts, firstly, that Truman had already decided not to abolish the Japanese Imperial system and to use the authority of the incumbent emperor as an instrument of the occupation policy and, secondly, that former Ambassador Grew had pressed for the inclusion of a clause to the effect that Emperor Hirohito would continue as Emperor, Truman could not make such a declaration because of domestic political considerations.¹⁰² Nevertheless the Emperor proceeded to broadcast acceptance of the Allied terms to his people, the landing of occupation troops began on August 30, and military government became a fact on September 2.

The structure of the Occupation and the personal beliefs of a highly authoritarian Supreme Commander then complicated the reshaping or reconstruction of the nation. General Douglas MacArthur wore three major hats. He was Supreme Commander of the Supreme Command for the Allied Powers; he was Commanding General of the Armed Forces, Pacific (later the Far East Command); and he was also Chairman of the Allied Council for Japan. He was therefore responsible jointly to the Allies as a group and to Washington, but as the Allies had delegated responsibility for the occupation to the United States he could wear which ever hat he wished and his power was virtually absolute. SCAP-the-person became synonymous with SCAP-the-organization.

THE TOKYO CHARTER

The London Conference authorised SCAP-the-organization to draw up the Tokyo Charter for the organization and conduct of War Crimes Trials. It also authorised SCAP-the-organization to establish a structure and procedures for the administration of Japan under occupation. Then when SCAP-the-person approved the Tokyo Charter by executive order on January 19, 1946, it included provision for SCAP-the-person to appoint the eleven judges required for the trials from names submitted by the governments which were signatories to the Instrument of Surrender. Furthermore, when SCAP-the-organization appointed staff to key senior positions in the SCAP General Headquarters they received letters from the US War Department saying that General MacArthur had expressed an urgent need for their services and they were to be known as “advisors of General MacArthur.”¹⁰³ In reality they formulated policy which was subject to the Supreme Commander’s approval and which they then communicated to the Military Government units of the Eighth Army which implemented it with a different line of command back to the Supreme Commander. No one except the head of the religious division got anywhere near the Supreme Commander – he only rarely – and the Supreme Commander took little notice of their advice and recommendations, and did not consult them. Nowhere was MacArthur’s dominance of the occupation more evident than in the field of religion. Although he did not get involved with detail he frequently expressed views on the subject which had to be taken into account by the Religious Division,¹⁰⁴ and even though policy development originated in that division, “in the last analysis all the important policy statements were CIE or SCAP decisions.”¹⁰⁵

Apart from the severing of official links between the State and Shinto, the Allies’ official policy was for total religious freedom and the Religious Division attempted to implement this. However the intention and trustworthiness of the official policy was called into question by MacArthur’s disparaging remarks about indigenous faiths, his constant promotion of Christianity, his determination to make the occupation a “practical demonstration of Christian ideals,” and most of his written statements which endorsed the Christian movement and appeared to the Japanese to be in violation of official policy.¹⁰⁶ He had a simplistic view of the Bible, drew on personal associates and visitors for his information, used spurious figures for the number of Christians in Japan to boost its apparent influence, publicly endorsed the distribution of Bibles (calling for ten million copies to be distributed instead of the one million which an evangelical group had planned), and accepted the post of honorary chair of a fundraising committee for the International Christian University.

TREATMENT FOR COMMUNISM: A THICK LAYER OF AMORPHOUS CHRISTIAN GEL

In an inverted cargo cult approach he would later say that through the ravage of destructive defeat the Japanese had come to “the bewildering realization of the complete failure of their own past faith,”¹⁰⁷ but in his official address at the signing of the surrender documents on September 2, before he had even set foot on land, he said the problem of Japan was “fundamentally theological” and involved a “spiritual recrudescence and improvement of human character.” However it was not long before he exposed his other motive – base politics – and his determination to prevent Communism from making inroads into Japan using any weapon at his disposal. Religion included.

MacArthur wasted no time at all in beginning his Christian Reconstruction of Japan. The Basic Directive for Post Surrender Military Government in Japan was not issued until November 3, 1945, two months after he arrived and took command, but on the afternoon of September 2, with his derogatory remarks about religion in the nation still ringing in peoples' ears, he instructed Colonel Ken R. Dyke (soon Brigadier General) to take charge of all public information media and the re-education of the Japanese people and to write his own general orders based on material received from the Joint Chiefs of Staff. After becoming operational three weeks later Dyke's Civil Information and Education Section (CIE) became a special staff section of SCAP responsible for advising the Supreme Commander on “policies relating to public information, education, religion, and other sociological problems of Japan and Korea” on October 2.

Only two days later, on October 4, a SCAP instruction, The Civil Liberties Directive, was prepared and issued in the name of the Supreme Commander ending all discrimination and restrictions on religious practice and organizations. Two laws under which the religious community had been regimented and mobilized for the war effort were revoked. One was the Religious Organizations Law. The other was the Peace Preservation Law. All persons imprisoned for reasons of religious faith were required to be released, and organizations and agencies which had been established for purposes of religious mobilization, including the Indoctrination Bureau, were dissolved. Shinto was not mentioned in the directive and arrangements were foreshadowed to enable incorporated religious bodies to retain their status. There was some dissent within the CIE's Religious Section about how the directive should have been worded, but there appears to have been consensus among the leaders of faiths who were consulted that the actions being proposed were reasonable; the general public seemed surprised and pleased by the directive, and the Shrine Board of the Ministry of Home Affairs called for the prefectural governors to comply with the directive. However there was dissent within the government, the Higashikuni Cabinet fell, and it was the task of the new cabinet to implement the directive.¹⁰⁸

But on October 8, a crisis erupted. In a radio broadcast interview intended for domestic American consumption the Chief of the State Department's Division of Far Eastern Affairs said that Shintoism as a state religion would be done away with. This was picked up in Tokyo and newspapers carried headlines such as “Shinto Official Status Abolished.” Secretary of State Byrnes tried without success to clarify the statement but great distress was caused throughout Japan. Although there was a national organization of Shinto priests there was not, at that time, a national organization of shrines which could respond to this dramatic development in US policy. There soon was. Members of the Conference of Young Shintoists convened a meeting of leaders from the major Shinto organizations and pressed their case for the SCAP policy to be modified. They did not succeed, but they established the Association of Shinto Shrines which SCAP had to recognize and with which it had to relate during the years which followed.¹⁰⁹

In spite of that disturbance SCAP pressed on with its – or his – policy of Christianization and on October 24 the Ministry of Education was directed to eliminate discrimination against Christians by reintroducing Christianity to St Paul's University and Middle School. But non-discrimination was a luxury which Shinto organizations were obviously to do without. On November 6 the use of Neighbourhood Associations to collect funds for Shinto shrines or festivals was banned, eleven officials who had discriminated against Christianity were dismissed and banned from future employment in education, and 78 institutions were placed under surveillance. Then on November 20 the Japanese Cabinet approved a policy for the management of shrines and a series of financial and organizational changes which it believed would satisfy the demands implicit in the State Department broadcast. It submitted an English translation of the policy and changes to the CIE at SCAP on November 28.

THE SHINTO DIRECTIVE

However the demands of management of religion in Japan in terms of SCAP's intentions were such that on that very day, November 28, the Religious Section within the CIE was supplanted by a special Religions Division. Its 'mission' was to expedite the establishment of religious freedom and to maintain liaison with religious organizations "in order to insure their understanding of and cooperation with the information and education objectives of the Supreme Commander." The person, not the organization. But the responsibilities of the new division specifically included two contentious items: prohibiting Japanese government sponsorship, support, perpetuation, control and dissemination of Shinto; and formulating policies relating to the return of Christian missionaries to Japan and Korea.^{110 111} Its augmented staff continued the seven-week task of intense consultation and the drafting and seven-times repeated redrafting of the 'Shinto Directive' which had begun immediately the controversy burst and it was issued on behalf of the Supreme Commander on December 15. They had been given no advance warning of the State Department's broadcast; no guidance except the Potsdam Declaration and a copy of the Secretary of State's 'clarification' of the broadcast; and, initially, three weeks in which to produce a directive – in spite of the fact that the new constitution for Japan was still in an early stage of drafting.¹¹² The person chiefly responsible for the drafting, W. K. Bunce, sought to provide "a rational basis for the eradication of Shinto Nationalism without interfering with harmless religious practices"¹¹³ and to expand the disestablishment of Shinto into the universal principle of the separation of "all religions, faiths, and creeds from the state." In doing so he gave the directive a universal character which the State Department had not anticipated and which was generally ignored.¹¹⁴

It was not described in such terms but it provided a framework for the final phase of the Christian Reconstruction of Japan. Its aims as stated in the final approved directive were to free the Japanese people from compulsion to believe or profess to believe in a religion or cult officially designated by the state; to end compulsory financial support of an ideology which has contributed to their war guilt, defeat, suffering, privation, and present deplorable condition; to prevent a recurrence of the perversion of Shinto theory and beliefs into militaristic and ultra-nationalistic propaganda designed to delude the Japanese people and lead them into wars of aggression; to assist them in a rededication of their national life to building a new Japan based upon ideals of perpetual peace and democracy.

The directive required: an end to any support or sponsorship of Shinto by any level of government; an end to official financial assistance to shrines or to any functions or services provided through them (private assistance could continue); an end to propagation or dissemination of any ultra-nationalistic or militaristic ideology through the doctrines of any religion; the abolition of the Shrine Board and the Religious Functions Order; the closure of all Shinto educational and training institutions and the diversion of their properties to other uses (except that privately funded schools could continue); the censoring of all educational manuals, text books, and government guidelines and instructions to eliminate any references to Shinto doctrine; the ending of school visits to shrines; the removal of 'God-shelves' (Kamidana) and other Shinto symbols from all schools and other official structures; an end to the practice of visiting shrines to report appointments to official positions and other matters or to participate in any ceremony or observance as a representative of government; and it specified which branches or aspects of Shinto could be continued and which were to be abolished. It specified that "Sect Shinto will enjoy the same protection as any other religion" and that Shrine Shinto would be granted the same position after the 'cleansing' operations required by the directive had been completed, but it prohibited the use of terms such as 'The whole world under one roof' and 'the greater East Asia War' which implied any aspirations for Japan to gain a dominant world influence through Shinto. President Roosevelt and his successors were permitted to promote the idea of "one world" under US patronage¹¹⁵ (in spite of the Monroe Doctrine and its implicit promotion of continental or regional independence without interference from other power blocks), but not the Japanese.

Among the teachings, beliefs and theories which were to be expunged were the doctrines that: the Emperor of Japan is superior to the heads of other states because of ancestry, descent or special origin; the people of Japan are superior to those of other lands on the same basis; the islands of Japan are superior to other lands because of divine or special origin; and any others which tended to "delude the Japanese people into embarking upon wars of aggression or to glorify the use of force as an instrument for the settlement of disputes with other people."¹¹⁶

In a lengthy memorandum to the SCAP Chief of Staff which accompanied a draft of the Shinto Directive a brief history of developments in State-Shinto relations from 1971 was set out and it was noted that: "No other modern nation ... has attempted to secure social and political cohesion through the strength of a ceremonial nexus that was normal in occidental culture 2,000 to 4,000 years ago. Nor has any other modern religion attempted to utilize such ritualistic agencies for vivifying and achieving the primary ends of national life."¹¹⁷ However that note requires significant qualification and interpretation. To begin with, it did not mention nor take account of the US and European intervention, using Christianity as an excuse, which precipitated Japan's civil war and the rise of State Shinto. (chapter 15) It appeared to take the religion clauses of the amended US Constitution and the 1946 constitution of the Philippines (with which it has been compared) as the norm for non-Japanese countries, ignoring the history of religious interaction in those countries and in particular the fact that colonial America had been shaped by people escaping religious torment and the consequences of church-state links in their own countries.

To consider the legitimacy of using the Shinto Directive as a means towards the Christian Reconstruction of Japan we can look at each of the clauses of the directive, set out above, in turn. Sponsorship of Christianity was no less real under papal concordats or in countries such as Britain in which the monarch was constitutionally the head of the church than it was under Japan's State-Shinto links. Japan's use of religion for promoting nationalism and militarism was little different to Britain's 'God, King and Country' propaganda and the provision of a special edition of the New Testament for British troops in World War I with a personal message from the king commending the value of the Bible and "the courage to be gathered from the daily reading of it."¹¹⁸ Britain not only used its public purse to support certain religious functions, but the senior clergy of its State Church were granted seats in the House of Lords and exercised very real and very nationalistic political influence. But what about the Education Act which had been passed only the year before, under which the teaching of the Christian religion was made obligatory in British schools in order to instil discipline into students who were soon to become cannon fodder in Britain's war? It was precisely the same mechanism which was now to be struck out of the Japanese system.

The gross misrepresentation of the history of the Crusades, the Inquisitions and the colonial conquests of Latin America, Africa and Asia by the European Christian powers in text books which were still being used through virtually the entire Western education system was far more extensive than any historical omissions and misrepresentations by Japanese educators. So was the political misuse of the church and religious faith in the suppression of non-European non-Christian cultures. The use of 'God-shelves' and religious symbols in Shinto relates directly to the use of crucifixes, Madonnas, other icons and prayer beads in Christian worship, and the veneration of ancestors as models of conduct and ethics is, at the very worst, no different to the Christian veneration of saints. One logical corollary to the prohibition of government representatives taking part in any religious ceremony or observance in Christian countries would be that the legal profession would forgo its parades and church services to mark the beginning of each legal year. Then the patronising abuse of the concept of "The White Man's Burden" to justify and promote the exploitation and rape of the non-European world in the name of civilising and Christianizing its people makes a mockery of the Allied prohibition of references to the Japanese concepts of 'The Greater East Asian War' and 'The whole world under one roof.'

And finally: the prohibition of references to the teaching that the Japanese Emperor, people and land were superior to others because of "ancestry, descent or special origin." The Shinto Directive ignored both the teaching of the Athanasian Creed and the similarity between the Shinto concept of Japanese Imperial divine links and papal claims to divine authority and the linked concept of the Divine Right of subordinate kings in the Christian world. Perhaps MacArthur had not read the pope's Christmas address, just a year earlier. If he had, he chose to ignore references to "Catholic teaching on the origin and use of authority (and) the divinely-ordained order of beings and purposes (and) that absolute order of government ... conferred by God through its participation in the authority of God exercised through the (Catholic) church" with its "supernatural truths." Perhaps two bodies were not allowed to make the same claims. The church got in first. However, even if the drafters in the Religious Division of SCAP were painfully conscious of that similarity it would have been absolutely impossible for them to recognize it in a document which was to be the Allies' means of dismantling Japan's religious system and entrenching their Christian colonial dominance of the overall Asian region. Certainly they did not know about the Pope's want to dogmatise the Assumption if it was "lawful, convenient and useful" to do so. His encyclical Deiparae Virginis Mariae was not published until six months after the Shinto Directive.

The publication of the Shinto Directive was stage managed very carefully indeed. So well that it did not prove to be the 'bomb shell' which the CIE chief expected. The Japanese government and Shinto authorities had adjusted to the demands which they expected to be made and, in fact, the draft which they submitted to SCAP on November 20 took account of almost all the demands which were made. The US press generally praised the document – it was going to produce the results the US was looking for – and although reaction in Japan was mixed, the general public accepted it – because the Emperor had told them to.¹¹⁹ Truman's assessment had been correct. America could not do without the Japanese imperial system even if the Supreme Commander wanted to make more sweeping changes to accommodate his Christianization plans.

FILLING THE SPIRITUAL VACUUM: THE IMPERIAL RESCRIPT

MacArthur had already told four visiting Protestant leaders that Japan was a spiritual vacuum. "If you do not fill it with Christianity it will be filled with Communism. Send me a thousand missionaries."¹²⁰ Four years later he was still pressing that view, a press report noting: "General Douglas MacArthur hopes to Christianize Japan as a first step toward saving Asia from Communism."¹²¹ But on December 15, 1945, the very day that the Shinto Directive was released, he urged the Catholic Church to increase its request for missionary admissions a hundred-fold. Then on December 29 he cabled Washington that his policy was to permit the return of as many missionaries as possible. The Religious Division of CIE was in a cleft stick. It had already advised the Chief of Staff, prior to the release of the Shinto Directive, on a schedule which could be the basis of a policy for the return of missionaries. During the first six months of 1946 each missionary organization would have been permitted entry for one missionary or, if it had been represented before the war, up to 20 percent of the number serving in Japan in 1940.

During the second six months of 1946 the quota would be another one or an additional 40 percent of the prewar number. From the beginning of 1947 there was to be no limit.¹²² However the word of the Supreme Commander was generally taken both by SCAP staff and Japanese officials as the SCAP policy they had to follow, whether it was in the form of a directive or not, such as his expressed wish that representatives of the Pocket Testament League be given any assistance they might need.¹²³ The penalties for 'acts prejudicial to the Occupation objectives' or 'violations' which could be interpreted as 'failure to carry out' any requirement were imprisonment for up to ten years or fines up to 200,000 Yen.¹²⁴ Augustine and his heresy hunters would have been proud of their latter day 'saint.'

On January 1, 1946, Emperor Hirohito issued an Imperial Rescript which eased the task of the Occupation forces considerably and assisted MacArthur in his bid for Christianization. Whether he issued that rescript on his own accord, knowing it to be in the nation's interest that he do so, and the extent to which he responded to pressure from MacArthur's staff has been widely debated and is not clear from the records available. It was a masterly, inspiring statement of the peaceful direction which the nation was embarking upon and a call for unity in pursuing that direction. But the key statement was that which became known as his 'Declaration of Humanity' which should have finally dismantled all concepts of the Divine Rights of Kings and not only that which had been used to harness the authority of the Japanese Imperial Person. The Emperor said, in part: "The ties between Us and Our people have always stood upon mutual trust and affection. They do not depend upon mere legends and myths. They are not predicated on the false conception that the Emperor is divine, and that the Japanese people are superior to other races and fated to rule the world."¹²⁵

With the Shinto Directive in effect the Religious Division staff set about drafting a host of consequential regulations within the even-handed framework which they believed to be the Allies' intention. On February 2, 1946, a memorandum was addressed to the Chief of Staff of SCAP and circulated to other divisions of the CIE stating that it was not the mission of the Religious Division to propagate Christianity, but to separate Shinto from the State and to establish and preserve religious freedom for all religions. It acknowledged that the division was to advise on the return of missionaries but said its only interest was to see that they "do not become a burden on the occupation forces" and it did not represent religious organizations in the US or in Japan.¹²⁶ That was consistent with its scheduling advice two months earlier. But two weeks after the Shinto Directive was issued the Education Division of SCAP, (not the Religious Division), issued a Religious Corporations Ordinance and followed with instructions to the government to suspend immediately all courses in morals, Japanese history and Japanese geography and not to revive them without permission.¹²⁷ Then, on November 25, 1946, MacArthur advised the Joint Chiefs of Staff in Washington that "It is the policy of this theatre to increase greatly the Christian influence and every effort will be made to absorb missionaries as rapidly as the church can send them into the area."¹²⁸ While accurate figures are not available for the entry of missionaries, the official clearances were: for the 17 months from the occupation to the end of January 1947, 243; for the remaining eleven months of 1947, 255; then 1948, 707; 1949, 804; 1950, 1,171 including some repatriated from Korea after the outbreak of war in that country. That was a total of 3,180 Christian missionaries. In contrast, during that period entry permits were granted for one Buddhist priest, one Muslim 'missionary-businessman', one Jewish rabbi and one Mental Science Institute representative, each of whom required special approval to circumvent the terms of the missionary regulations.¹²⁹ So much for freedom of religion.

That misuse of the Christian religion for political purposes by MacArthur, in league with those member countries of the Allied Commission which were Christian, was in the same mould as Constantine's reconstruction of Rome, Napoleon III in French Indo-China, or Britain's Balfour Declaration. It was also just as deliberate a reconstruction of a country's religious system using military authority or intervention in the interests of the conqueror as was the papal reconstructions of Scandinavia and Latin America or Hitler's reconstruction of Germany, although much less violent than either. It was also as deliberate as the Muslim imposition of Islam in Asia Minor, the introduction of Judaism in the Khazar Khanate, or Akbar's intervention in India, but it was neither as successful nor as constructive as any of those.

CONSTITUTIONAL REFORM – AND A NEW US-JAPAN RELATIONSHIP

Parallel with that religious reconstruction program and the higher profile program of retribution through the war crimes trials, MacArthur was implementing several other crash programs. As far as America's Allies were concerned the main purposes of the occupation were simply demilitarization and the development of a stable relationship with a Japan which would not rock the Western World's boat. But MacArthur's agenda was different. If the United States was to achieve its war aim of not only filling the political and economic power vacuums in Asia but of dominating it, and if it was to ensure that there could be no challenge to its seat at the pinnacle of world affairs, then the biggest economic power house in Asia had to be compliant, reasonably friendly towards it, preferably modelled on the American ideal, and definitely accessible for both markets and resources. His crash programs therefore covered demilitarization, the political structure, economic reform and education – and land tenure reform. That was vital.

The most basic reform – constitutional reform – was therefore a matter of priority and the United States made this patently clear to the Japanese government and business leaders even before the occupation – even before a surrender would be accepted. The Meiji constitution had to go. The Japanese were invited to draft a new constitution for themselves, but when this proved unacceptable, as expected, MacArthur's government section prepared its own draft and presented it to the Japanese government. It was placed before the first postwar Diet in April 1946, complete with the Emperor's endorsement in advance. It was promulgated on November 3 and took effect on May 3, 1947.

The US had reluctantly accepted that it could not do to Japan what it had done to Germany at the end of the First World War – eliminate the monarchy – so it had to accept that if there was an emperor there could not also be an elected president. But the role and status of the emperor was downgraded, the people were told that sovereignty now lay with them, and to prove it they were presented with a 31-article bill of rights in which Article 9 renounced "war as a sovereign right of the nation" forever and pledged that "land, sea and air forces" would "never be maintained." The Emperor was no longer "sacred" or "inviolable." He was simply the "symbol of the state and of the unity of the people." A bicameral Diet was introduced, the peerage was dissolved and the House of Peers was replaced by a House of Councillors, with power concentrated in the House of Representatives. The Privy Council was abolished. The prime minister was to be chosen by the Diet from its members who would be elected on the basis of universal suffrage, and an independent judiciary was established together with the right of judicial review.

But the electoral provisions of the constitution were stacked against strong, stable government, and Japan was faced with a series of governments in quick succession. True, the first government of Yoshida Shigeru (1946–47) was at a disadvantage because it had to force through all of the reforms required by MacArthur, but its Socialist successor, led by Katayama Tetsu (1947–48) was no more successful. That didn't matter. The United States didn't want a socialist anyway. Neither was the first government of Ashida Hitoshi which lasted only five months in 1948. Then when Yoshida regained power in the third election within a year, backed by US interests, he was able to cling to it until 1954. An important reason was the way in which the land tenure reform was carried out, and the combination of the two factors – the electoral and land tenure reforms – led to a constitutional crisis in the 1990's.

DEMILITARIZATION

The demilitarization of Japan was even harsher and more humiliating than that which had been imposed on Germany at Versailles. Germany had been permitted to retain an army of 100,000 troops and specified limited armaments for its defence, but under the 'Bill of Rights' pledge imposed on Japan that land, sea and air forces would never be maintained, its entire military command structure was eliminated. Its armed forces, both in Japan and overseas, were disarmed and demobilized, and their officers were stripped of their commissions during the early months of the occupation – except for those which were required to help the US Marines secure the cities and ports of China until the Chinese Nationalists could take over and prevent a Communist Party government from being formed. (See below: The challenge of China) Even the Home Ministry with its prewar powers over the police and local government was abolished; the police force was decentralized and its authority was curtailed. Japan was not only occupied: it became subject to United States suzerainty and totally dependant on it for its defence. Defence dependence automatically meant the inability to develop its own foreign policy and therefore Japan had to bow to US pressure, accept its strategy for the area, and form regional alliances with Taiwan and South Korea. Naturally the United States 'agreed' to maintain and staff defence bases in Japan. It was 'purely coincidental' that this gave the United States strategic dominance of the entire East and that, because of that enormous high-tech US military presence, Japan became a prime target for another atomic attack once Soviet Russia achieved nuclear capacity and the Cold War reached its peak. On both counts, an unwelcome foreign military presence and interference in the nation's foreign policy, crises were being set up and put into store for the next generation to cope with.

In line with their policy of retribution and of placing the blame for the war on Japan, the Allies had planned to exact heavy reparations, but in view of the US self-interest need to establish the best basis for its future relations with Japan, and in a misguided bid to discourage support for 'subversive' Communist elements in the South East Asian countries which would have received some of the reparations, that plan was soon changed. SCAP decided to review the reparations demands. The revised plan still required the forfeiture of Japanese assets overseas and a small number of war plants, but reparations were otherwise largely limited to agreements reached between Japan and those in Asia who wished to pursue claims after the peace treaty was signed.

ECONOMIC REFORM

In the horrific pounding which was inflicted on Japan in the extended period prior to the surrender, Japan had suffered the destruction of about one hundred cities; its war dead rose to two million; and its industrial production was crushed to just ten per cent of its pre-war level. Seven million people were repatriated from overseas. They were mainly demobilized armed forces but there were also large numbers of civilian employees who were required to leave to minimize Japanese influence in the countries which had been "relieved." The result was unemployment on an enormous scale, widespread poverty and near starvation, rampant inflation, and a level of crime such that Japan, with its strict ethics and high level of personal discipline had never experienced.

The American assessment was that in such an environment political democratization within an anti-Communist society would require economic and social changes as well as Christianization and reconstruction. MacArthur believed that because nearly half of Japan's farmers were subsistence tenants, there was little hope of achieving it without significant changes in the ownership of land. Therefore in 1946, within months of the occupation, SCAP imposed a hasty program of land reform which was designed to convert tenants into owner-farmers. The bigger city-based landlords were forced to forfeit a high proportion of their holdings to the government on terms of part cash and bonds redeemable thirty years later which amounted to expropriation, and land was sold to tenants on favourable terms. They were protected by contracts, rents were set at a maximum of 25 per cent of production, and their land was designated "inalienable." As American legislators and courts had already decided ten years earlier, such a designation was untenable, and it was reversed only four years later. But in addition, tax incentives and price support, or subsidies, ensured that the majority of the nation's new owner-farmers quickly gained control of their land.

However the average holding was of a meagre 2.5 acres (1 hectare) so that without subsidies and government-maintained high agricultural prices the farmers could not have survived and the entire reform would have been untenable. Productivity per person fell compared with productivity under the old regime, even though yields per acre increased through sheer hard work. Mechanization was very hard to justify on such small areas and employment of labour was unrealistic. The farmers – enormous numbers of them on such small plots – therefore formed a powerful conservative lobby which resisted agricultural trade liberalization. Having just gained their own plots they were hardly likely to call for land tenure reform. Another crisis, this time in international trade relations, was being generated and put into storage until a later date, but MacArthur achieved his immediate objective. The Japanese countryside prospered and rural voters became the mainstay of the conservative Liberal Democratic Party (LDP) when it was formed in 1955 – made even more powerful by both the electoral reforms, which had given the vote to both the farmers and their wives, and the agricultural price supports which had become politically immovable. These were major factors in ensuring that Japan became a consumer-based economy within a few years.¹³⁰

The dissolution of the zaibatsu, Japan's great financial houses, had also been an early SCAP priority, but this disappeared as Japan's cooperation became more important in the deteriorating international atmosphere and the Cold War became the focus of American attention. The zaibatsu had been regarded as Japan's most likely war makers, but in view of the perceived need for an economically viable and friendly non-communist Japan they were soon regarded as essential for economic recovery. Out of about 1,200 organizations listed for investigation and possible dissolution, a mere handful – less than thirty – were broken up, although the major holding companies of the zaibatsu empires were dissolved. Their assets and component parts were made available for public purchase. However none of Japan's banks were broken up and they proved to be the centres for a measure of industrial and commercial reconsolidation after the occupation ended.¹³¹

Another basic plank of SCAP's plan to keep Japan on the non-communist path required the reorganization of industrial labour. A new Ministry of Labour was established in 1947 and trade union and labour relations laws were modelled on Roosevelt's New Deal legislation. At first a strong union movement was encouraged but because many of its leaders were either socialists or communists who had been released from prison by the occupation there was soon a purge – prompted by a plan for a general strike in 1947 and Cold War paranoia. SCAP ordered the government to deprive government workers, including those in communications unions, of the right to strike and a new labour organization, Sohyo, the General Council of Trade Unions of Japan was sponsored to offset the influence of the Congress of Industrial Labour Unions of Japan (Sambetsu Kaigi).¹³²

SCAP regarded the Education Ministry as another source of nationalistic influence and, as already noted, directed that it discontinue courses which had that tendency. Its proper role was to be a key promoter of democracy, US style. The Fundamental Law of Education, 1947, guaranteed academic freedom, extended compulsory education from six to nine years, and provided for coeducation. The supposedly elitist system of channels for vocational training, higher technical schools, and universities was replaced by standardized grade levels and automatic progression through the American structure of elementary, lower secondary, higher secondary, and undergraduate higher education. The establishment of prefectural universities was encouraged and within twenty years Japan was a world leader in tertiary education.

So: with an occupation regime such that no other country had ever been subjected to, Japan's new relationship with the United States had been fairly well cemented in place within three years of the occupation. The United States was free to go its own way in Asia, and Japan's course in the world had been charted for it, but it would take many more years before the bitter antagonism which had been generated towards it by the deliberate actions and policies of the Allies could be overcome. The crash program of war crimes trials was still in full swing, and certain aspects of those trials serve to illustrate the differing approaches of the governments and religious regimes involved, and the way in which the Christian military powers had sought to denigrate the Japanese and the religion of Shinto by cross-referencing their actions and by avoiding debate about their own.

THE COMFORT WOMEN

The matter of Japan's 'Comfort Women' had caught the Western World's imagination and attracted a great deal of publicity. It was not difficult to establish that the coercive recruitment of about 100,000 women, mainly from Korea, and their transportation to other countries with the Japanese armed forces to work as prostitutes was rape, a form of slavery and a crime against both the women and the countries concerned. It was a very short step to connect that with their non-Christian religious influence. But, as in the case of the biological warfare experiments, no one faced trial primarily on the basis of responsibility for the comfort women program. The reasons become apparent as we consider the background to the Comfort Women affair, details of the occupation and the conduct of the war trials. Several important issues which were largely and deliberately ignored must be noted at this point.

First: massive abuse of women by Allied troops in the countries in which the Allies fought, whether against Japan or Germany. Second: at the time of the war crimes trials American, British and Australian troops were 'enjoying the services' of Japanese women – or exploiting them – in occupied Japan in a revised version of the Comfort Houses organized with the full knowledge and agreement of the Allied (US) Military Government. Third: rape outside the Comfort House system was even then being committed by American and Australian troops in Japan at a rate comparable to that reported anywhere during the war. These issues clearly involved war crimes for which Allied officers should have stood trial in the same way as the Japanese. But they did not. The victorious allies were only interested in retribution against the vanquished and not in getting to the bottom of war crime.

Concerning the first issue: abuse of women by Allied troops. As already noted, a number of countries of the Western Alliance, including Australia, had to struggle to cope with pathetic ignorance of sexual matters among many of their serving soldiers prior to their enlistment; the suppression of their sexual activity, and psychological maladjustment which had resulted from the repressive social and moral regime which prevailed between the two world wars. In Australia, on the outbreak of war the defence forces took steps to offset those problems through education and counselling. Their aim was to produce disciplined troops who would act responsibly in the theatre of war, and to minimize the social and medical problems of war for families and communities both in Australia and in those countries in which Australia was to fight. It did so against opposition from the church which maintained that sex education was not appropriate, that it would draw attention to a problem unnecessarily, and that it would encourage undesirable sexual activity. However the steps taken were only partly successful.

By the time Japan entered the war in December 1941 with its cadres of 25 to 30 carefully supervised Comfort Women per 1,000 troops accompanying its armies, the sexual activity of Australian troops was such that there was an overall rate for all venereal disease infections in the Australian army of 67 cases per 1,000 troops. The rate in the Middle East was about 82 cases per 1,000 troops. During 1942 the rate of infections among troops in Syria actually rose by some 18 per cent to about 97 cases per 1,000 troops and a senior medical officer reported that the problem of venereal disease was still serious, "especially with the Australians who appear to be either more promiscuous or more careless." These rates compare with an estimate of 133 cases per 1,000 troops in the Middle East in 1916 and it is therefore clear that the measures which the army introduced had a significant effect. During the Palestine campaign in 1916 the 'constant treatment' rate had reached a peak of 24 per 1,000 and it is quite apparent that with an average period of hospitalisation of three weeks the fighting efficiency of the army was reduced and it is difficult to quantify the social consequences of the infections for both the host countries and Australia.^{133 134}

In a carefully conducted investigation in Tripoli, at a time when 13,500 Australian troops were based there, 11,955 'attendances' were monitored at supervised brothels during a 12-week period. No estimates are available for intercourse with prostitutes outside the supervised brothels, rape or 'voluntary intercourse' with other women. However, during that 12-week monitored period 134 cases of suspected venereal disease were reported. That is a rate of 10 infections per 1,000 troops in a very short period. Many of those cases were attributed to intercourse with women not in the supervised brothels and it can therefore be assumed that there was a very high rate of unreported rape whether it involved physical force or simply coercion. In spite of the measures taken there was real cause for alarm even on the home front where the troops could be expected to be less promiscuous. The rate of confirmed venereal disease infection among troops based in Australia in 1942 was 19 per 1,000, compared with a rate for those based in the South West Pacific, where contact with the local population was restricted, of only 2 per 1,000.¹³⁵

In spite of the seriousness of these reports, in the circumstances of the time, the available records suggest that overall, British, American and Commonwealth troops were relatively restrained in their conduct towards women in the countries in which they fought as relieving forces rather than as invading or occupying forces. The British established brothels in North Africa and India. In Tripoli, to provide for their composite armies with troops drawn from the colonies and dominions, they set up different brothels for troops of different races and for officers and enlisted men. In India they were for officers only – and after a time they were closed on orders from London. American military chiefs considered operating brothels for their troops but the decision was taken not to do so – because a public outcry was expected at home. American troops were therefore left to find and take advantage of any ‘facilities’ or sex workers who were available – or to simply rape their way through the community.

But it cannot be said that the troops of any countries acted with greater or lesser ‘ethical restraint’ than others when they were forces of invasion or oppression. In view of their atrocities against the Jews in situations such as Crystal Night in November, 1938, and as a consequence of the manipulative use of media reporting during World War I, the people of the Western Alliance expected beastly conduct from German invaders. It was therefore no surprise when Molotov presented a report to the Allies in January 1942 of large scale rape of Russian women by German troops as the Nazis steamrolled towards Moscow. That report was later used at the Nuremberg war crimes trials, together with reports of rape of Jewish women on a massive scale during the subjugation of Poland and in the concentration camps. In fact the Nazis favoured organized brothels for their troops, too, and a plan was prepared to staff brothels in Warsaw with Polish Jews. It was only scrapped when senior authorities remembered that intercourse between an Aryan German and a Jew was a criminal offence under the Nazi’s Nuremberg Race Laws.

However the beastly conduct continued when the tables were turned and the Russians (Communists and Christians in league) were on the offensive. Claiming that they were taking revenge for what the Germans had done in their country, Russian troops rampaged through Berlin committing grotesque acts of rape on an atrocious scale which were not documented until the 1960s. And when they joined the war against Japan just in time to share the spoils of victory and invaded Manchuria they committed mass rapes in a similar bestial manner in spite of the fact that no Japanese troops could have been involved in rape against Russians simply because they were not at war until the Russian invasion.¹³⁶

And the restraint which the British, American and Commonwealth troops had shown when they were fighting in friendly or neutral countries disappeared when they became forces of occupation in enemy territory themselves. They were no longer influenced by the need to maintain appearances because they were ‘relieving’ peoples from the oppression of Japanese invasion to enable their ‘return’ to one or other of the European imperial folds or to American colonial or neo-colonial status. In any case, given the circumstances of war and their training for battle, the troops would not have been conscious that the Japanese invasions had occurred as a consequence of Western policies, and that they were, in part, dependent on the cooperation of the people of the colonies to enable the recovery of those territories for the imperial powers.

RECREATION AND AMUSEMENT FOR GIs

So, the second issue: the exploitation of women in occupied countries as prostitutes. The Japanese government had a very good understanding of the pattern of sexual conduct and rape in war, the effectiveness steps which had been taken to minimize rape by its own troops, and the suffering already imposed on Japanese women by Russians during the invasion of Manchukuo which had begun on August 8, 1945, sandwiched between the dropping of the first atomic bomb on Hiroshima on the 6, and the second, on Nagasaki, on the 9th. Its people also had a heritage of very strict personal and social ethics. It therefore held discussions within days of the announcement of its surrender on August 14, 1945, and well before the arrival of Allied occupation forces or the signing of formal surrender documents on September 2, to find ways of dealing with the expected problem of mass rape by Allied troops. On August 17 the governors and police chiefs of all prefectures were instructed to procure women from geisha houses, brothels and night clubs to work as prostitutes in a system of somewhat grand 'comfort houses' for the occupying forces. Four days later, on August 21, Prime Minister Higashikuniomiya held a meeting with several ministers, including those for health, internal affairs, the foreign ministry and legal affairs at which thirty million yen was allocated for the establishment of the 'Recreation and Amusement Association' (RAA) which was to be ready for the 'benefit' and pleasure of the occupation forces. The first of hundreds of RAA brothels opened on August 27 in suburban Tokyo.

The expansion and operation of the RAA continued under the supervision of the Allied Military Government of General Douglas MacArthur and more than 20,000 women had been 'drafted' into the RAA within four months, by Christmas 1945. The numbers reached a peak of 70,000 within another three months. There were simply not enough practicing prostitutes, geishas and other hospitality workers available to satisfy the demand – or the lust – of the victors. Thousands of high school students were among the other women who were forced to work in the brothels of the RAA. The students included many who had survived the bombing of Hiroshima because they had been drafted into munitions factories towards the end of the war but who had lost their entire families in the bombing. The system was disbanded on March 27, 1946, officially on the grounds that it was contrary to the principles of the 'new democracy' which military governor MacArthur was intent on establishing. However there are other reasons why the system was disbanded. One was to halt the rapid spread of venereal disease among the American forces and to stifle criticism at home. It was impossible to adequately supervise such a vast network.¹³⁷ But it should have been obvious that if the RAA could not be properly supervised there was no hope of supervising either the conduct of the troops or the network of informal brothels to which they turned and which therefore expanded rapidly, and the situation became worse. So to the other reason.

On July 26, 1945, only 18 days after publishing the London Agreement which included the Statute for the Nuremberg International Military Tribunal (German war crimes trials), the London Conference of the Big Four Powers published the Potsdam Declaration that Japanese officials would also be prosecuted for war crimes. Subsequently, on January 19, 1946, General MacArthur, as Supreme Allied Commander in Japan, issued an executive order approving The Tokyo Charter which included the jurisdiction, constitution and functions of the International Military Tribunal for the Far East. The charter gave the Supreme Commander sole authority to appoint the judges for the tribunal, from names submitted by countries which had signed the 'Instrument of Surrender, plus India and the Philippines. It included, as noted above, two newly defined classes of crimes, 'Crimes against Peace' and 'Crimes against Humanity', as well as the previously recognized 'War Crimes.' [Crimes against Humanity were defined as "murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation or other inhumane acts committed before or during the war, or persecution on political or racial grounds in execution of or in connection with any crime within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, whether or not in violation of the domestic law of the country where perpetrated."]¹³⁸

However, although MacArthur approved the charter on January 19, it was not issued until April 26, and in the meantime the RAA was ordered to be disbanded on March 27. The Tokyo Trial of 28 Class A defendants, with eleven international judges sitting as a tribunal actually began on May 3, a mere seven days after the charter had been released. Charges were only brought against persons for "offences which included crimes against peace." No proceedings were brought under charges classed as 'war crimes' or 'crimes against humanity.' Any conduct and any events which logically would have been dealt with under those classes were dealt with only if the person held responsible could be charged under the dragnet of 'crimes against peace.'¹³⁹ The majority judgement was published in November 1948, but the complete proceedings, including the dissenting judgements, were not published until thirty three years later – 1981 – after one of the judges, B.V.A. Roling, and a Dutch professor, C.F. Rutter, undertook to edit and publish them in 1977.¹⁴⁰ One effect of that sequence of events, coupled with the very deliberate and careful choice of terms in the charter, was to avoid any comparison of the conduct of the Japanese army and its political and military leaders with the conduct of the American and other Allied armies, and their political and military leaders.

This is consistent with MacArthur's view that the trials should have been limited to responsibility for the "treacherous attack on Pearl Harbour" which should be "avenged" and branded "a grave violation of the laws of war."¹⁴¹ It is hardly credible that MacArthur was not aware of the circumstances of the deliberate incitement of the Japanese to attack Pearl Harbour and of the sequence of events at the time, especially considering that he was one of the privileged people in the circle of "the splendid arrangement" and that Governor Dewey had planned to make it a key item in his presidential election campaign in 1944. (chapter 24) The choice of terms in the charter is also consistent with MacArthur's position that the trials were "epochal proceedings designed to formulate and codify standards of international morality."¹⁴² That position surely should have called for substantial international publicity of the kind which was generated for the trial of General Yamashita rather than the deliberate suppression of reporting and international discussion which took place. Given the way in which the Allies had exploited the issue of the abuse of captive women in Comfort Houses for the Japanese Army, and continue to exploit it fifty years after the war, the abuse of Japanese women through the RAA system was indeed a ghastly matter which MacArthur and his colleagues were not eager to have on the legal record. But it leads to an even more significant matter.

THE RAPE OF JAPAN

The third issue: rape committed by the Allied occupying forces. In spite of the fact that their countries were no longer at war, the provision of RAA brothels did not prevent rape any more than the comfort houses for Japan's troops had. American soldiers engaged in mob rape from the day they landed in Japan, August 30, 1945, and four cases were reported at Yokosuka, in the prefecture of Kanagawa, on that day. The first attack, against a mother and daughter at gun point, occurred in a private house at 1 pm, just three and a half hours after the marines landed. In another attack 27 soldiers gang raped a woman to near death. But that was just the beginning. In the first ten days from that landing, in the prefecture of Kanagawa alone, 1,336 cases were reported. Children were raped in front of their parents and pregnant women were raped on their delivery beds in maternity hospitals. Tanaka states: "If we extrapolate those figures to cover the whole of Japan – and if we assume that many rapes were unreported – then it is clear that rape by the American forces was occurring on a scale comparable to that of any other force during the war." ¹⁴³

However some areas were occupied by Australian, New Zealand and Indian soldiers under the command of British officers. In one such area, Kure, Hiroshima, a prostitute who agreed to a request by police to act as a "firebreak" for the Australians so that young women would not be raped, reported: "The Australian soldiers were the worst. The dragged young women into their jeeps, took them to the mountain, and then raped them. I heard them screaming for help nearly every night." ¹⁴⁴

The debate about whether Japan's system of Comfort Women for its troops was a greater war crime than the systems of male gratification implemented or permitted by the Allies is therefore certainly not at all one-sided. It is especially noteworthy that at the time that charges of mass-rape and rape in the form of enforced prostitution by Japanese forces in China, the Philippines and elsewhere were being heard and judged in the Tokyo War Crimes Trials, and those responsible were being sentenced, "the same practice was continuing throughout occupied Japan, with the active participation of Allied forces, and the approval of the high command of the occupying forces." ¹⁴⁵ A mere 247 American soldiers in all of occupied Japan and Europe were prosecuted for rape in the second half of 1945. ¹⁴⁶ The hypocrisy of the great white Western Christian powers was palpable as they sought to justify their own role and conduct in the war, especially the dropping of 'the bombs'; to extract retribution from the vanquished; to maintain the myth of their own lilywhite purity and Japan's exclusive guilt; to link that guilt with the inferior religious beliefs and ethics of its people; and to impose new systems of ethics, government, commerce and economics on them.

When it came to the crunch the troops of the Allied Occupational Forces were no different to those of the Axis powers. They reacted to exactly the same psychology of war. They felt obliged to strengthen the bonds of combat with their comrades by proving beyond doubt their masculinity in the presence of each other, to demonstrate their dominance over their enemy, and to further humiliate that enemy by physically violating its women in the presence of its men.¹⁴⁷ In very large measure they were taking part in a re-run of the reconstruction of Germany after World War One, and one of the final stages in the Christian Reconstruction of Asia, except that, with the benefit of hindsight, the victors permitted the Japanese monarchy to remain in a modified form to avoid the backlash which was to be anticipated if a vital link in the nation's self-understanding was totally dismantled as it had been in Germany's case. But in Japan's case there was a much more definite religious component linking the monarchy and the national self-understanding. The victors had to negotiate their way around it very carefully, even if they did not understand it properly.

NO AVALANCHE OF CONVERSIONS

MacArthur's attitude to the Tokyo Trials was consistent with his policy to facilitate Christian missions in Japan and the vigorous efforts which were made under his direction to suppress the Shinto religion by "prohibit(ing) Japanese government sponsorship, support, perpetuation, control, and dissemination of Shinto", thus enforcing its elimination from the school system and severing the link between Shinto and State. The West was to be allowed to link religion and state, but not the East. The staff of the religious division of the Civil Information and Education Section of the military government was to "maintain liaison with religious organizations in order to insure their understanding and cooperation with the information and education objectives of the Supreme Commander" – to Christianize Japan as expeditiously as possibly as an aid to achieving his political aims – while they preserved a facade of expediting "the establishment and preservation of religious freedom and encourage(ment) for the Japanese people to develop a desire for such freedom."¹⁴⁸

His policy can hardly be described as a success, and the real consequences may well become evident as the new millennium unfolds. It has been said that all the Japanese government's wartime rules fell to the ground with its military collapse in 1945; that the moral and spiritual shock of the defeat was incalculably severe; that "in revulsion against the system that had brought them to such disaster many Japanese seemed prepared to accept the American way of life entire, and the Christian Gospel as part of it;" and that "out of this mixture of frustration and hope a great Christian movement might develop."¹⁴⁹ That is an inappropriate description of the situation which, as we have seen, was a consequence of the policies and actions of Western Christian powers over a very long period, deliberately compounded by the policies and actions of the Supreme Allied Commander. Taking advantage of those policies "almost every mission under the sun pressed into Japan" and although the rush of the first five years was not sustained, by 1963 there were more than 4,000 Protestant missionaries in Japan – about one tenth of the world Protestant missionary endeavour in a country with two per cent of the world population. Almost all were from the United States.¹⁵⁰ In addition there were about 500 Roman Catholic missionaries from America.¹⁵¹ Those numbers were probably close to the peak which appears to have been reached during the period 1962 to 1970.¹⁵²

A GENERATIONAL GULF AND THE RISE OF CULTS

However, in spite of the number of missionaries being so large, the expected landslide to Christianity did not occur and the "rather superficial religious interest of the immediate postwar years soon died away." Indications are that the number of Christians in Japan had grown to about 750,000 by 1963 in a population of ninety million, but that the Japanese had "soon began to be occupied with their economic reconstruction to the almost total exclusion of everything else."¹⁵³ MacArthur, showing his disappointment in November 1949, expressed the view that Japan would not be Christianized in any conceivable period of time, that pride of race, if nothing else, would prevent most Japanese from becoming Christian, and that Buddhists and Shintoists could only have continuing existence in Japan if they "are accepting those fundamental principles of moral conduct and right living which he (had) so often attributed to Christianity."¹⁵⁴

One of the immediate consequences of the deliberate denigration and undermining of Shintoism and the attempted imposition of the victor's religion was that a gulf developed between the youth of the post war period who rejected many of the principles which had guided their elders prior to the war, and their elders. Three quarters of the student generation rejected the concept of religion. Many were attracted to the alternative philosophy of Marxist Communism which was the very thing MacArthur was trying to avoid by imposing Christianity. The remaining minority were fragmented into sub-groups who explored a number of religions with open minds. Some were attracted to Buddhism, others to Christianity, and yet others to new syncretistic cults which appropriated ideas from each of the major religious faiths and Spiritism, notably from Latin America.¹⁵⁵

The growth of such cults and sects as a result of the establishment of religious freedom had certainly not been anticipated by SCAP or the American Administration. They were "a constant problem" for the Religious Division which had no policy in place to deal with them and they could only be treated as a legitimate part of the Japanese religious scene. When one group was found to be under police investigation a further inquiry had to be undertaken to ensure that their religious freedom was not being restricted by the government. This was not exactly what MacArthur had in mind as 'religious freedom.' His intention was simply the unrestricted right of access and proselytizing for Christian missions. He could be justifiably concerned that the number of registered religious denominations rocketed from 43 when the new regulations were introduced in 1945 to 720 in 1951, but it was a consequence of his own policy decision. (From 13 Shinto, 28 Buddhist and two Christian, to 258 Shinto-type, 260 Buddhist, 46 Christian and 156 'others.') when its leader was gaoled it had virtually lapsed until his release in 1945. Strongly nationalistic in approach and millenarian, it offered an alternative to both the old religions (which had either been discredited or dissolved) and Christianity, the victor's religion, which was rejected because of that and because it had not been proven in Japan. By 1965 Soka Gakkai claimed 13 million members and had developed a powerful political base, with its representatives being the third largest voting block in parliament after the Liberals and the Socialists.

The Office of the Attorney General took action to dissolve three allegedly ultranationalistic societies on one occasion, but 'freedom' meant 'freedom.' The Minister for Education, expressing the Religious Division's position, intervened to advise that fraudulent and harmful actions of a religious group would be subject to criminal law, but "whether a given religion was good or bad could be left to natural selection, and that religion itself should be granted complete freedom." ¹⁵⁷ That was a principle which it was difficult for MacArthur to argue against. After all, the US was the origin of a number of religious movements and non-conventional sects, some of which, although unwelcome initially, had evolved into major organizations exercising considerable influence. They included the Mormons, the Theosophical Society, Christian Science, Jehovah's Witnesses, the Hare Krishna movement and the Black Muslim Movement, and their freedom and right to worship and evangelize was guaranteed by an amendment to the Constitution. Freedom of religious practice also meant, naturally, freedom to export the religious beliefs involved by setting up core groups or 'missions' in other countries. But when some of the new sects which had originated in post war Japan appeared in Western countries they were not generally welcomed by the 'establishment' and steps were taken to bring them under surveillance and to suppress them. The Western world had to face yet another of the many challenges within the overall religious debate.

But as always it tried to camouflage, avoid or nullify one of those challenges: the challenge of Islam, which was a different matter altogether. For the churches the challenge was to find ways to evangelize the teeming millions of the larger of its two partner faiths and to bring them within the fold of the 'saved', or within one of the many folds, anyway. For the politicians the challenge was to isolate the religious faith and movement from the push for decolonization and to prevent the development of power blocks or tight-knit alliances. For the commercial interests the challenge was to find a way around the anti-exploitation philosophies and policies inherent in Islam to enable the exploitation of the copious resources locked away in Muslim-dominated countries. A new round of manipulation was about to begin, but for the moment the Western World's eyes were on China.

THE CHALLENGE OF CHINA

China was regarded by all of the churches as a very special case. Being home to one fifth of the world's people and having been either disregarded or inaccessible (depending on whose point of view one takes), it was clearly both an opportunity and an obligation for the church (or churches) to introduce the Gospel to its people. The number of Protestant missionaries in the country peaked at more than 8,158 in 1925, but it had then been reduced sharply by forced withdrawals under enormous political pressure for two years or so. There was then a recovery as a result of Chiang Kai-shek's marriage to a Christian and his adoption of Christianity by Methodist baptism in 1930. (Chapter 17) Roman Catholic missions also benefited from the relaxation of political pressure and the combined effects of this and the pope's vigorous new policy on missions produced growth of about 30% in the number of declared Roman Catholics from 2.5 million to 3.3 million between 1930 and the outbreak of war. By then there were some 2,000 "native priests" and 3,000 "foreign clergy."¹⁵⁸ However the relaxation was followed by another bout of suppression in the areas controlled by the Japanese after their invasion of 1937 and many Christian workers fled, either to the security of the western regions or out of the country.

The fact that many Christian workers were able to stay in remote regions of the country enabled a prompt response when the Japanese were expelled following their surrender to the Allies on August 14, 1945, and Christian forces emerged from exile, both in the remote regions and overseas, and in spite of the political turmoil and civil war wracking the country they set to work wherever they could to reconstruct, to restore, and to renew. They were helped by the fact that the Soviet Union still recognized the Nationalist government of Chiang Kai-shek, signed a treaty of friendship with it on the day of the Japanese surrender, and called for a coalition government involving Mao Tse-tung whom they regarded as "a mere agrarian reformer."¹⁵⁹ But China had become the object of a tug of war between the anti-capitalist-anti-foreigner forces of the Chinese Communist Party, and the Capitalist forces of Chiang Kai-shek's Kuomintang government in league with the United States which, like the churches and the non-denominational missions, saw China as either the biggest opportunity, challenge, responsibility or prize on offer, depending on their perspective ... except for the elimination of Communism and the return of the Soviet Union to the Christian Western World's Capitalist fold. The United States therefore did not want a coalition.

In fact China was such a special case for the US that it formed a very special working relationship with the armies of the Japanese who were so dastardly that it had been necessary to bomb them into submission with two atomic bombs. Those armies were not expelled and told to swim back to Japan. They were not even disarmed. They were integrated into a US plan for Chiang Kai-shek's half of the Chinese forces, the defeated and humiliated Japanese, and the US marines to jointly "protect" major Chinese cities and ports which Japan had occupied during the war from the other half of the Chinese forces: Mao Tse-tung's Chinese Communists. And while they remained, the US transported between 400,000 and 500,000 of Chiang Kai-shek's Chinese Nationalists far and wide across China and Manchuria by planes and ships to occupy cities and strategic facilities they could not have reached otherwise. Two weeks after the Japanese surrender, when the Nationalist forces occupying Peking were surrounded by Communist forces, only the arrival of US marines prevented their defeat. Similarly, while Mao's forces moved into the suburbs of Shanghai, expecting to take control of it from the Japanese in occupation, US transports dropped Chiang Kai-shek's paratroops into the city to seize control. The civil war was soon in full swing. Truman ordered that 50,000 marines be sent to guard railways, coal mines, ports, bridges. Naturally they suffered casualties. The official US line was that they were disarming the Japanese forces. Eventually they did so, but at that time many of them were jointly guarding key facilities with the Japanese whom they were supposed to be disarming.¹⁶⁰ Truman justified "using the Japanese to hold off the Communists" in these terms:

It was perfectly clear to us that if we told the Japanese to lay down their arms immediately and march to the seaboard, the entire country would be taken over by the Communists. We therefore had to take the unusual step of using the enemy as a garrison until we could airlift Chinese National [Chiang's] troops to South China and send Marines to guard the seaports.¹⁶¹

In January 1946 there were 100,000 US personnel still in China trying to consolidate Chiang Kai-shek's slim hold on partial central government when the US government thought it best to change tack. It knew that Mao's forces were better disciplined, had made a major contribution to the war against Japan, and had worked closely with the United States, providing intelligence and rescuing and caring for airmen shot down in Japanese occupied territory. It also knew that, according to assessments by the Office of Strategic Services, the bulk of Chiang's effort had been directed against his Communist colleagues, not against the Japanese; that he had tried to block cooperation between Mao's forces and the US; and that "his regime was full of officials who had collaborated with the Japanese and served in their puppet government." Taking the line that the government was acting as a mediator in a civil war rather than the principal backer of one party, Truman sent General George Marshall to negotiate a cease fire and to try to set up some sort of coalition government, just as Stalin had proposed.¹⁶² The United States had learned very little from watching Britain – and collaborating with it – only a few years earlier as it struggled to balance its involvement with China and Japan in the Far East, and Palestine in the Middle East all at once. It was doing exactly the same. The difference was that Britain had been trying to secure its position as it slid deeper and deeper into a war which it did not understand and which its self-understanding prevented it from avoiding, whereas the United States was trying to secure its position as it took advantage of the very same war which it did not understand any better.

In the meantime, in the areas under Nationalist control, the churches had been reopening hospitals, schools and universities as quickly as possible and, in April, 1946, Pius XII established a Chinese hierarchy incorporating twenty archdiocese and 79 diocese (said to be the largest number in any one country) under a newly appointed Chinese cardinal. The new hierarchy replaced a system of vicariates apostolic, and an internunciature was placed in Peking. However six months later the situation deteriorated markedly. The tenuous 'coalition' had been little more than a truce because, believing that he could still rely on US backing, Chiang Kai-shek gave Mao Tse-tung no meaningful role in government. Fighting between Chiang's Nationalists and Mao Tse-tung's Communists resumed in October. At first the US imposed an arms embargo in a bid to restrain Chiang Kai-shek but it was to no avail. Chiang pressed on and in March 1947 his forces captured the stronghold of Yen-an, deep into Central China. But without a flow of US aid he had overextended his communications and was dependent upon exposed railways. He desperately needed more political help from somewhere. He appointed an ambassador to the Holy See. This was quite consistent with his previous policy because, although all of his established links had been with and through the Protestant churches in America, his government had actually sent an envoy to the Vatican in 1943, at the height of the war, to bid for Roman Catholic support in its struggle with Japan. This time his concern was Communism and not the Japanese. Truman responded in May. The US resumed supplies on the basis of a policy of "neutrality against the Communists." Both wings of the church benefited and by the end of the year Protestant missionary numbers had recovered to about 3,000 persons, or about half the immediate pre-war number.¹⁶³ By the time the Communists were able to proclaim the People's Republic two years later the number had risen to 4,062.¹⁶⁴ However the tide began to turn against Chiang's Nationalists and the churches at the end of 1947 when the Communists were able to mount a sustained counter attack and cut Chiang's lines of communication. His forces were left isolated in the cities and many of them simply deserted and melted away.

THE CHANGING WORLD SCENE

During those first two or three years of "peace" the world situation had become unbelievably complicated as it stumbled from one situation of conflict to another. The United Nations was supposed to be on hand to moderate any crises which developed, but its influence was very limited because of the manner in which it had been set up, the conflicts of interest which divided the dominant powers of the Security Council in a way which undermined its moral and political authority, and the fact that it was not a truly representative body. When the charter came into effect on October 24, 1945, the fifty one members represented only two thirds of the people of the world. The other one third were not represented. Some of them – about nine per cent of the world population – were said to be represented by the colonial powers who exercised sovereignty over them. Some, the vanquished, were not considered worthy of representation. Some had chosen not to participate in the victors' club on the conditions of the invitation: to become a party to the war which they had been able to avoid! But a close look at the membership makeup shows that the voting representation was very unbalanced indeed when considered on each of three bases: dominant ethnic composition, dominant religion, and dominant political orientation.

Concerning ethnicity or, loosely, racial heritage. It has been claimed, repeatedly, that the founding members of the United Nations "represented all geographic areas of the world"¹⁶⁵ because the fifty which were represented at the San Francisco conference was made up of nine continental European states, 21 American republics, seven Middle Eastern states, five British Commonwealth nations, two autonomous Soviet republics in addition to the USSR, two East Asian nations, and three African states. But geography does not reflect the reality. The UN member countries in the sector which was then regarded as the white European or white dominated world, and which was made up of Europe (including Eastern Europe and White Russia), the Americas, and the British dominions of Australia, New Zealand and South Africa, accounted for only one quarter of the world population but enjoyed three quarters of the votes in the United Nations. On the other hand the UN member countries from Asia, Africa and Oceania (excluding Australia and New Zealand) which accounted for almost half of the world population enjoyed just under one quarter of the votes. However the bulk of the other 25 per cent of the world population which was not represented, including Japan and most predominantly Muslim countries, was also in Asia and Africa, and this shows that control of the United Nations' affairs was even more unbalanced than the apparent composition suggests. The approximate total population split was: Europe and the Americas, 35 per cent; Asia and Africa, 65 per cent.

Concerning the member country's dominant religion. The total Christian population at that time can be estimated at about 29 per cent, but Christian countries held 76 per cent of the votes in the UN. [See note ¹⁶⁶ for details.]

Concerning political orientation. The non-Communist powers effectively controlled – or sought to control – 44 votes, while the Soviet Union and its suzerain or satellite block had only seven votes. Under the rules proposed by the Western Allies, the Soviet Union would have had only one vote, but a compromise of three votes was agreed to, and the additional votes were held by the Soviet Republic of Byelorussia (now Belarus) and Ukraine. It was not until the breakup of the Soviet Union that the constituent republics were each admitted in their own right, so that they now hold a total of eleven votes. In the meantime the political population balance had lurched heavily away from the West when Communist parties gained control in China and then in a succession of neighbouring Asian countries. But the voting power did not lurch with it. China's population was greater than all of Europe which had 14 founding-national member votes but it was entitled to only one vote, and in due course the Western powers insisted that the fleeing Chiang Kai-shek take that vote with him to Taiwan which assumed the title of Nationalist China

With the United Nations in place on that basis in mid 1945, the people of the Western World were quite content to settle back to making love, not war, and to look on with admiration as MacArthur set about his Christian reconstruction of Japan, as Chiang Kai-shek took his rightful place as leader of a great new democracy in China, and as the European powers returned to their rightful roles as rulers of colonial empires in Africa and Asia. They noticed that some of the Asian colonies were a bit upset at the return of the British, the French, the Dutch and the Portuguese, and there were even some rumblings in Africa – mainly among the Arabs – but they were not too worried at first. The South East Asians, the Africans and the Arabs could not run their own countries, they told themselves. They would need the superior white Western Christian powers to do that for them, and they would soon realize that, and things would return to normal. After all, article 76 of the Charter of the United Nations placed an obligation on countries administering a trust territory to promote the economic and social welfare of the indigenous peoples and to foster their progressive development towards self-government or independence. The word 'towards' confirmed what everyone knew: the natives were just not ready for self-government or independence.

But the people of South East Asia and Africa did not see it that way at all. Hitler's parody of Mein Kampf had exposed the fact that the great white Western Christian powers had the same frailty and equal immorality and self-interest as Hitler, even if he had ended up on his own funeral pyre with the whole world against him. For a time he, and Japan in league with him, had broken their chains and given them a glimpse of independence. They liked what they saw, and although they did not want to substitute Japan for one of the European powers, they were determined that the Europeans would not come back. The powers most heavily involved were Britain, France and Holland. It is not feasible, nor necessary to examine in detail the circumstances of each of their colonies and territories, and the nature of the amorphous Christian gel and the implications of the parody of Mein Kampf are illustrated by the circumstances of a few: Britain's India and Burma; France's Indochina; and Holland's Dutch East Indies.

COLONIAL POLICY: PHILOSOPHY OR PERFIDY?

Britain began the Second World War with a remarkable empire – or 'family' within a Commonwealth of nations – which included, in addition to great slabs of Africa and the self-governing dominions, several colonies and dependencies in South and East Asia and the Pacific. Chief among them were India, Ceylon, Burma, Malaya, Singapore, Sarawak and North Borneo, plus the leased territory of Hong Kong which was administered as a colony, and territorial rights in China under treaty which were never counted in the official imperial pecking order. Its wealth and power had largely been built around them during its heydays in the eighteenth, nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, and that was why it had gone to war. It could not let them slip through its fingers. It is one of the ironies of the parody of Mein Kampf that the interests which were most at risk and most vulnerable, and which actually precipitated some of Britain's most critical decisions as it floundered into war were not in the major colonies which were striving for self-government and independence, but in those last named territories which were held by the most tenuous imperial links. It is similarly ironic that the ones which were the first to gain their independence were the ones which Britain most wanted to cling to, and the last to go was not one of the territories it claimed by annexation, but the territory which it held under a fixed term lease from a nation which soon changed from ally to political foe and therefore should have had few qualms about breaking the lease.

The idea that they should understand or develop a 'philosophy of empire' was something that does not seem to have bothered the leaders of any of Europe's great powers. The impulses or stimuli which propelled them all into imperial mode have been discussed progressively (chapters 9, 16, 18 & 19) and it is clear that the basic motive was always self-interest and the competitive urge, tempered by national self-understanding. This explains why there was no cohesion or consistency in the policies which each power pursued from one colony to another and from one period to another and, also, why there were differences in emphasis in the policies of different powers at the same time in adjacent colonies.

Britain and France rushed headlong into colonialism in intense competition – competition for resources, power and prestige – and not wanting to be left behind. Both were highly exploitative in the approach to a territory over which they gained control, and neither could be said to be humane in their attitude to the peoples they subjugated and then ruled – trading them and their territories from time to time like any other chattel to suit their own purposes, usually in settlement of war claims. But from that point they tended to take different directions. Britain recognized that its territories were appendages which each required a separate administration. France treated them as territorial extensions of France just as in the days of the Franks and the Romans. It was as if they were continuous with its continental land mass with no water barriers – possessions just as firm as Bretagne or Gascogne – and with administration fully integrated. The British appointed governors or governors-general who were responsible to cabinet through a secretary of state for the colonies, implying that there was a need for coordination with a number of other departments. France also appointed governors or governors-general but it made it perfectly clear what their role was: they were responsible directly to the minister for trade and they were obliged to support French agrarian (food bowl) enterprises as well as resource extraction wherever they were.

Concerning culture: Britain had been able to avoid the worst excesses of Europe's religious wars but, like the Vatican, it had adopted the position that it had a responsibility to superimpose Christianity over whatever religions it found in its colonies, so, being on the Reform side of the fence, it did so in competition with the Vatican. It was imbued with the idea that, in Rudyard Kipling's words, it had to carry "the white man's burden" of civilizing or Christianizing (they were regarded as the same thing) wherever they went. That policy was usually fairly easily implemented through support for its church if none of the Abrahamic traditions or the other long-established Eastern traditions were already present, but if they were, there were grave implications. On the other hand France, having endured some of the most bitter and devastating of Europe's religious wars, did not recognize the obligation in the same way. It was perfectly happy to take advantage of the religious factor, as in the case of Napoleon III's manoeuvring in Indochina (chapter 15), but in other respects it was more 'tolerant' or, at least, more accommodating.

But there was another aspect to "the white man's burden" which Britain did not welcome. When national independence movements began to take more substantial form in the years following the First World War it found that it might sacrifice control of its colonial milking cows if it was not prepared to either assist them directly or introduce economic policies which would enable them to accumulate development funds in their own accounts for the development which some political theorists said was a prerequisite for self-government. At first it was not prepared to do either, but when it actively resisted change and was not prepared to offer India dominion status in 1926 when it granted that status to Australia, New Zealand, Canada and South Africa at the Imperial Conference in 1926 (chapter 20), it found that passive movement turned to positive pressure. Three years later, in 1929, the Commons passed the first Colonial Development Act and the government allocated small amounts for economic development under the control of the colonies. France did not take similar action. However when the Second World War burst they both found it advisable, out of sheer self-interest, to introduce more liberal policies for two reasons. First: without such a change it was very likely that the colonies would rise in revolt, refuse to help their "mother countries" and all would be lost anyway. Therefore in 1940, at the very time it could least afford it financially, Britain increased funding under the Colonial Development Act and approved the use of the funds for social as well as economic projects. Second: both powers were desperate for increased production of raw materials and income from the colonies for their own survival and this could only be achieved by stimulating further development.

However there was to be no admitting self-interest in the new policy: certainly not for public consumption during parliamentary debate on the appropriation of moneys. The British Colonial Secretary, Malcom MacDonald, insisted that: "The peoples of the colonies are not merely content to be His Majesty's subjects, they are positively happy to be His Majesty's subjects." Britain's media obligingly carried illustrated reports to confirm what the minister said, and to show how much better off the natives in former German colonies were than when they were under German administration before the First World War. Britain's official policy towards Africans was, MacDonald said: "to teach them and to encourage them always to be able to stand on their own feet," and its overall colonial policy was inspired by the love of freedom for others as well as for the British. And turning specifically to Nigeria, then one of the most technically and commercially advanced of Britain's colonies, he justified continuing colonial administration on the grounds that the country was "not ripe for self-government."¹⁶⁷ There was careful camouflage of the fact that cabinet had, on several occasions, considered deals to cede some African colonies to Germany in a bid to appease Hitler only a year or two earlier, (Chapters 20, 21), but at least there was none of the arrogant deprecation shown by Churchill during Gandhi's bid to negotiate a better deal for India nine years earlier. (Chapter 23)

In fact, once France had fallen under German control and the Vichy French government was collaborating with Japan in Indochina, the only sources of support General DeGaulle could rely on for his Free French Movement were the African colonies. Once those policies were introduced, they could not be reversed and political change had to keep pace with the new approach to economic and social development. Britain modified the composition of legislative councils which it had established in the African colonies to include more Africans, but it still sought to restrain demands by keeping the numbers of appointed and elected members balanced in its favour. For its part, France proposed consolidating the concept that colonies were a land extension of France by granting them the status of overseas territories of France within a French Union under the Fourth Republic. So: the four illustrations.

THE INDIAN SAGA¹⁶⁷

Britain's policy of 'defending the faith' or preferentially promoting English Christianity and denigrating other faiths caused serious problems in India. While other issues were also involved, it was a major factor in the mutiny by the Bengal army in May, 1857, which was the trigger for a nation-wide spate of insurrection. Some of its endeavours were laudable, no doubt, such as its effort to stamp out widow immolation and infanticide, but the approach of both the church and British authorities was flawed. The establishment of privileged enclaves, and the provision of incentives linked to an alternative set of religious rites was not the way to go. It simply added to the list of grievances against imperial policy and provided a base from which nationalist and independence movements evolved.

After a year of violence countered with repression, the government was able to announce the end of the uprising and to move into reform mode. In August 1858 the Commons passed the Government of India Act, transferring power from the British East India Company to the crown and vesting it in the Secretary of State for India and the India Office, and it established the post of viceroy. It followed that dramatic change in administration with an equally dramatic change in policies which was proclaimed by Queen Victoria only three months later. First: political unification through princely state annexation was at an end. The princes were free to run their affairs as they wished, as long as they swore allegiance to the British crown. The implementation of any unifying programs was therefore hampered by the presence of about 560 enclaves of autocratic princely rule scattered through the nation because of British fears of another mutiny and the government's decision to use the princes as a bulwark against an expected tidal wave of revolt. That decision served Britain's immediate aims, but the ultimate consequences were catastrophic because it was the basis on which the future of Kashmir was determined at the time of partition. Second: the government would no longer intervene in religious affairs. The reason was the same: fear of renewed mutiny. The government recognized that orthodox Hindu and Muslim reaction to the combination of its previous policies and the methods of proselytizing used by Christian missionaries had been important in triggering the revolt.

Planned socio-religious reform was discontinued for about thirty years but social attitudes of white imperial superiority remained unchanged, and sympathy for, and some understanding of, Indian life and culture gave way to suspicion, indifference, and fear. British civil servants remained aloof and isolated from the "native contamination" of the crowded cities in secure military towns with straight roads wide enough for cavalry to gallop through as necessary. The Indian army was reorganized and the proportion of British troops was doubled from 16 to 32 per cent, and Indian soldiers of different faiths and castes were mixed in each unit to avoid the cohesion which had been apparent in the Bengal mutiny.

Significant industrial development took place during the next few decades and the bulk of India's massive railway network was established, but as its main purpose was to transport minerals and the produce from mechanized large scale agricultural production (both of which were under British ownership) to ports for export to Britain, the social consequences were mixed. The benefits did not flow down to the ordinary Indian population. Three universities were established, in Bombay, Bengal and Madras, and an effort was made to raise the intellectual calibre of British recruits to the Indian Civil Service but the changes were made in such a way that Queen Victoria's intention of an end to discrimination in the selection of civil servants was easily circumvented. Examinations for the services were held only in Britain and only for males aged 17 to 22 who could meet a list of conditions. In a service of well over a thousand officers only one Indian candidate was accepted in the first ten years after the announcement. When a handful were admitted during the 1870's they were made painfully aware that they were unwelcome second class citizens and a pretext was found to dishonourably discharge one of the brightest, Surendranath Banerjea. From loyal servant he changed to nationalist agitator.

At that time a number of provincial political associations were being formed in Bombay and, after teaching for a while Banerjea became editor of a newspaper, founded the Indian Association of Calcutta, then convened the first Indian National Conference in 1883. The Indian National Congress was founded in Bombay two years later. At that time a young teenager named Mohandas Karamchand Gandhi, having been married at the age of thirteen, was struggling to catch up with his studies after taking a year off from school to become accustomed to his new responsibilities. He matriculated in 1887, then entered Bombay University to study law in a language which was foreign to him. At that stage Gandhi was not a nationalist, nor an anti-government activist. Because of his father's civil service background he saw England as "a land of philosophers and poets, the very centre of civilization." His attitude would change gradually under the impact of his experience in England and, subsequently, South Africa, (Chapter 16) but the attitudes of many of his peer group were already hardening. A leader of the movement for revolutionary nationalism, Bal Gangadhar Tilak, was gaoled for sedition in 1897, and after his release he stepped up his efforts to mobilize orthodox Hindus to take a keener interest and pride in the religious, cultural, martial, and political glories of pre-British India. At that time The Arya Samaj, a reformist Hindu society, was having a strong influence, stressing the call of its founder, Swami Dayananda Sarasvati, to "reject the corrupting medieval excrescences of their faith, including idolatry, the caste system, and infant marriage, and to return to the original purity of Vedic life and thought." Dayananda said that such corruption had weakened India's society and destroyed its capacity to resist foreign invasion and subjugation.

That linking of the nationalist movement with Hinduism, which was a consequence of the policies which the British had adopted, disturbed Muslim members of Congress and steps were taken to establish the Muslim League. It met for the first time in 1906 and immediately sought the establishment of designated Muslim electorates to represent the special national interests of the Muslim minority. That was agreed to by the viceroy and put into effect in 1909. Whether his agreement was calculated to pursue the old policy of divide-and-rule or whether he simply reacted to circumstances is open to debate. However it certainly had a divisive effect, and on the basis of Churchill's later remarks about Britain's policy in India (chapter 23)¹⁶⁸ it would appear to have been quite deliberate. Britain was heading for trouble with progressively deepening division in the colony as it moved through the First World War, the Depression and the chaotic 1930's towards the Second World War. (Chapters 20, 21, 22, 23)

When the Second World War ended, Indian leaders of both Hindu and Muslim persuasion, whether they had been ready to cooperate with Britain during the war or not, were all very conscious that Britain had only been able to maintain its grip on the country because of United States intervention. From late 1942 onwards, US arms and planes had streamed into Calcutta and Bombay, bolstering British India as the major Allied launching pad against Japanese forces in Southeast Asia and China. Only because of that, the British raj had been able to remain firm in the face of growing Indian opposition, both violent and nonviolent. Indian industry grew rapidly. During the war the output of electricity doubled and Jamshedpur became the British Empire's foremost producer of steel. Indian shipyards and light-manufacturing plants flourished in Bombay, as well as in Bengal and Orissa, and, although attacks had been threatened for the same reason that Darwin was bombed (to deny the United States the use of the base) the Japanese never launched air attacks against either Calcutta or Madras which were well within their range from Burma. In mid-1943, the new Viceroy, Field Marshal Lord Wavell, imposed full martial law which remained in force for the duration of the war. No progress was made in talks between Gandhi and Jinnah to resolve Hindu-Muslim differences over Britain's policies, and, in June 1945, soon after the war ended in Europe, Wavell convened a political conference in Shimla. No agreement was reached which could bridge the gulf which Britain's conduct had caused between the Hindu-dominated Congress and the Muslim League.

Only two weeks after that conference collapsed, Churchill lost office and Clement Attlee formed a Labor government in Britain. Its immediate concern was to find a political solution to the Hindu-Muslim conflict which would enable the British raj to withdraw its forces and as many of its assets as possible. The new government was less concerned with Indian national and human rights than with its assessment that India had become more of an imperial burden and a liability than any real advantage for Britain.

When elections were held at the end of the year the Muslim League, led by Jinnah won all 30 seats reserved for Muslims in the Central Legislative Assembly and most of the reserved provincial seats as well, on a platform of demands for Muslim regional autonomy. This undermined the Attlee government's wish to transfer power smoothly to one national administration which, it hoped, could then resolve the internal disputes. After sending a cabinet delegation on a fruitless visit to assess the situation it adopted a plan for a three-tier federation with a minimal role for a central-union government in Delhi. Its powers were to be limited to foreign affairs, communications, defense, and finance for matters affecting the whole federation. The subcontinent was to be divided into three major groups of provinces: Group A, the Hindu-majority provinces; Group B, the Muslim-majority provinces; and Group C, the Muslim-majority Bengal and the Hindu-majority Assam. The group governments were to have a high level of autonomy, and within each group the princely states were to be integrated into their neighbouring provinces. Provincial governments were to have the option of changing to another group depending on the outcome of a popular vote.

The plan soon struck trouble. The soldiers of the influential Sikh population of the Punjab were fiercely opposed to the British raj but they were widely recognized for their wartime role in the British army, and they hoped that this would entitle them to the status of an autonomous group. When they were placed in group B, with the Muslims, they objected because of antagonism dating back to oppressive 17th century efforts by the Mughal emperors to convert their gurus to Islam. In March, 1946, their leader, Tara Singh, demanded a Sikh nation-state to be called either Sikhistan or Khalistan. However the British delegation had no time or energy to focus on either the demands of the Sikh separatist movement or those of the Muslims for an independent Pakistan. Under pressure from London they simply wanted to finish their task. Both Jinnah and the Congress leaders reluctantly accepted the proposal, but Nehru, at his first press conference on being re-elected president of Congress, announced that no constituent assembly could be "bound" by any prearranged constitutional formula. Jinnah read Nehru's remarks as a "complete repudiation" of the plan, which had to be accepted in its entirety in order to work. He convened the league's Working Committee, which withdrew its previous agreement to the federation scheme and called for the "Muslim Nation" to launch "direct action" in mid-August 1946. India collapsed into a year of bloody civil war. Hindu-Muslim rioting and killing started in Calcutta and soon engulfed the subcontinent.

Lord Louis Mountbatten succeeded Wavell as viceroy in March 1947 with instructions from the government to transfer power no later than June 1948. He soon decided that the situation was too dangerous to wait that long and, fearing a forced evacuation of British troops still stationed in India, he opted for partition based on a plan that would divide the Punjab and Bengal virtually in half, rather than risk the total breakdown of further political negotiations and the mutiny of Indian troops. Gandhi opposed partition and urged Mountbatten to offer Jinnah the premiership of a united India rather than a separate Muslim nation but Nehru and senior Congress colleagues would not agree. The Indian Independence Act was then passed by the Commons in July 1947, ordering the demarcation of the dominions of India and Pakistan by midnight of August 14–15. The first – and the biggest – chunk of the world's largest empire was not so much released as cast adrift. With only two weeks to do it, two boundary commissions worked desperately to partition Punjab and Bengal in the most acceptable way but they could not do it in a manner which would avoid massive dislocation. As soon as the new borders were known, ten million Hindus, Muslims, and Sikhs fled from their homes on one side to supposed safety on the other. Panic and hatred resulted in the deaths of one million people in history's worst communal massacres. Sikhs, caught in the middle, suffered the highest casualty rate.

Two new nations began life in the worst possible circumstances, but in spite of the massive bloodshed which they had become hardened to, it was the death of one man which shook them – and the world – as much as years of interfaith fighting. Mahatma Gandhi. The symbol of non-violence, the person who had steered the entire subcontinent towards self-esteem under the crushing weight of the raj, who recognized the best in each religion and ignored the worst, and the person who had struggled vainly to keep the diverse population of the world's second most populous nation together was assassinated by a religious fanatic only a few months after partition took effect. Prime Minister Nehru, deeply affected, told the world: "The light has gone out of our lives and there is darkness everywhere." The people agreed. India and Pakistan would live with the ongoing prospect of war between them over the fate of Kashmir which had been placed in an untenable position by the way in which partition was finally determined, but conscious of Gandhi's legacy and that Nehru was trying to provide similar enlightened leadership, not only did India's flood of religious hatred and violence recede but also some progress was made toward communal reconciliation and economic development. Contrary to the principle proposed for the group plan but then abandoned, which allowed for a level of self-determination in that a province could move from one group to another on the basis of a referendum, the princes were given authority to determine which nation their principalities would join. Against the wishes of his overwhelmingly Muslim population, Kashmir's ruler determined: India.

And the two nations would later become three. The two Muslim regions, separated by a thousand miles, quite different in circumstances and problems, could not be governed as one and East Bengal chose to go its own way as Bangladesh. None of this need have happened if Britain had been prepared to relinquish control of India prior to, or shortly after the outbreak of the war. Certainly there would still have been severe and testing difficulties for the government of an independent India to resolve as a result of its colonial history – in particular Britain's policy of divide and rule – but nothing approaching the scale which the partitioned states faced in 1947. Their problems were compounded successively by Churchill's stubborn insistence that the British Empire was not to be broken up, which exemplified the self-understanding of his portion of the amorphous Christian gel; then his refusal to act on Roosevelt's advice after Japan entered the war, thus expanding the scale, devastation and impact of the war as already discussed; his ruthless enforcement of martial law to enable India to be used as a war base by both Britain and its prop, the United States; and then the Attlee government's ill-considered rush to quit when the country had passed its use-by date. It was costing Britain more to hold it than it returned as a colony.

THE BRITISH SOUTH EAST ASIAN SAGA¹⁶⁹

Burma or, at that time and again now, Myanmar, was the first of Britain's mainland Asian colonies to become enmeshed in its war in the Far East. The Burma Road supply route to China was a focus of action while Britain was manipulating its complex relationships with China, first to try to keep Japan out of the war cycle, and subsequently to try to draw it in. (Chapter 24) And Burma had certainly not passed its use-by date, but the conduct and consequences of Britain's colonial policies – especially in relation to religion – had fueled the rise of independence movements from the moment it completed its three-phase annexation of the country and eliminated the monarchy in 1885.

Myanmar was certainly not an under-developed territory which Britain could say was occupied by backward natives who needed to be 'lifted' by the great Christian powers of Europe as part of 'the white man's burden.' It was home to a series of fabulous, wealthy and highly organized kingdoms based solidly on the ethics, culture and traditions of Buddhism, and it was a major centre of trade in Asia while Europe was still wallowing in a mire of religious corruption in the Middle Ages. Its national life centred on a system of Buddhist temples and monasteries, estimated at between three and four thousand at its peak, with complete integration of church and state in what has been called a symbiotic relationship. Its government centred on the Hluttaw (Place of Release), a body which had executive and judicial functions and over which the king presided as head of state, patron of Buddhism, and appointor of the primate – a combination of roles not unlike that of the British monarch as Defender of the Faith. Primary and higher level schools were attached to the monasteries and Buddhism provided the basis of a highly organized but male-oriented education system and a national way of life. Literacy among males was high, but among females it was not. As with all of Asia and sub-Saharan Africa, Myanmar's first contact with Europe was during the early sixteenth century competitive rush for spoils which largely coincided with the Reformation and Europe's torrid round of religious wars. Then during the seventeenth century its foreign trade was stimulated by intense competition between the Portuguese, Dutch, British and French. But its fate was sealed by that same competition. A series of wars rolled through the region, making and unmaking dynasties, then during the eighteenth century Siam (Thailand) was drawn into the conflict and China, alarmed about its neighbour's growing power, invaded Myanmar several times without success.

Then it was Britain's turn to 'protect its interests.' Friction developed between Arakan, in the western region of Burma, and the British in Indian Assam. Myanmar occupied its smaller neighbour, then its army moved on to Assam to put down counter attacks which had been launched from there. When it did so a second time in 1823, the first of a series of three Anglo-Burmese wars resulted in Britain occupying the northern and southern coastal regions of Burma, but not the middle. Accusations by British traders of extortion gave Britain the excuse to occupy the middle section in 1852. Then, to take advantage of the opening of the Suez Canal in 1869 it encouraged the mass clearing of the Irrawaddy delta mangrove forests for rice production, and planned to push a shortcut, or a 'golden road' through the mountains to South China. In 1885, the year that India's Congress was founded, prompted by nothing other than sheer colonial greed, Britain made a clean sweep of the whole country on the grounds that the king had offered a trade treaty to France which threatened Britain's monopoly of the Burmese teak forests.

The proclamation of the annexation of the whole of Burma as a British colony took effect on January 1, 1886. The monarchy was abolished; the colony was attached to India as a province; the capital was shifted to Rangoon; and the links between the state and the Buddhist church system was severed. The Defender of the Faith certainly could not be seen to be defending Buddhism, and by shifting the capital to a different centre, the connection between the government and the system of the Hluttaw and the Buddhist hierarchy was severed very definitely. Christian missions were encouraged and given financial assistance; free secular schools were opened as well as mission schools to discourage attendance at the monastery schools which no longer had state support; lessons were introduced which criticized and denigrated Buddhism and its culture; the status of the monks was deliberately undercut and their prestige was undermined; discipline fell away, and there was a rise in both crime and guerrilla activity. This 'justified' a five-year crackdown with mass executions of guerrillas and rebel monks, and other atrocities by British troops. Villages were burned; headmen and their families were exiled; and strangers were appointed as the new headmen in a program of pacification. More than 30,000 British and Indian troops were engaged in the program which was not declared complete until 1890. So much for Queen Victoria's 1858 proclamation that there would be no further intervention in matters of religious belief and worship within British India!

After such a program of ruthless suppression in what is, by nature and philosophy, a pacifist society it was natural that some time elapsed before the evolution of a nationalist movement with organized leadership. It was equally natural that in due course the focus of that movement was religion, culture and education. The Young Men's Buddhist Association (YMBA) was established in 1906 and set about establishing a number of schools and encouraging renewed recognition of Burmese tradition and Buddhist culture. At that time it was not anti-government. But after the First World War, when Britain introduced some reforms in India but withheld them from Burma, the situation changed. Some of the students of those schools had reached university and graduated. Barristers among them roused the people to a nationwide protest which included a boycott on British goods. Students at Rangoon University went on strike, supported by the Buddhist clergy and secondary school students. The government backed down and amended the contentious and restrictive University Act. The strike was thus settled – superficially. When many of the striking students refused to return to government or mission schools the YMBA opened its schools to the strikers and renamed them 'national' schools. Some constitutional reforms were granted, reluctantly, by Britain in 1923 but it was too late. The rising nationalism was gradually intensifying and taking on distinctly anti-British sentiment. A radical student group began organizing protests in what became known as the Thakin ('Master') movement, and when a peasant revolt erupted in 1930 because of the effects of the New York stock market crash and the consequent Great Depression on Asia's rural economies, the peasants turned to the young Thakins for leadership.

The peasant's troubles were basically a consequence of the policy which the British authorities followed when they set out to convert the Irrawaddy delta into a rice bowl for Europe. The price of rice more than doubled from 1857 to 1890, and continued to increase until the depression. The area under rice production rose from approximately 60,000 acres in the 1850s to nearly 10,000,000 acres in 1939. That 166-fold increase in production caused a significant shift in population from the northern heartland to the delta and the basis of wealth and power shifted also. British banks would not grant mortgage loans on rice land, the government had no policy for establishing land-mortgage banks or for agricultural loans, and to finance land clearing and cultivation farmers had to borrow from moneylenders, most of whom were from Madras, in India. Interest rates were exorbitant. Rice prices were high in the international market, but local prices were kept down by a handful of British firms which controlled the wholesale trade and by Indian and Chinese merchants who controlled retail trade. With land values and rice prices soaring, the moneylenders foreclosed on mortgages at every opportunity.

Dispossessed farmers could not find employment, even on the lands they had forfeited, because thousands of Indian labourers came to Burma eager for work at even low wages. Burmese villagers, unemployed and lost in a disintegrating society, took to petty theft and robbery and they were soon marked as lazy and undisciplined. The level of dysfunction in Burmese society is shown by a dramatic rise in homicides during the early decades of the 20th century. Burma's annual homicide rate was second only to that of the United States. Thus, although the Burmese economy and transport infrastructure developed rapidly from 1890 to 1900, most Burmese did not benefit from it. A railway ran the length of the Irrawaddy valley, and hundreds of steamboats plied the river; but both systems were owned by British companies. Government roads had been built, but they were for rapid troop transport. A British company worked the ruby mines to near exhaustion. Oil and timber were also monopolized by two British firms. This all meant that the balance of trade favoured Burma, but with little benefit to Burmese people or society.

When university students again went of strike in 1936, they also turned to the Thakin movement for inspiration, and two of their leaders, Aung San and U Nu, joined the movement and were soon prominent in its leadership. A year later, as Britain struggled to isolate its crises in the Far East from those in the Middle East and Europe, it separated Burma from India and gave it a constitution. But that did not have the desired effect. It made the situation worse because the Burmese, suffering ruthless repression, quite astutely took it to mean that their country would be excluded from future reforms in India. (Chapter 20)

On the outbreak of war in Europe the young Burmese leaders, like the Japanese and the Chinese, saw an opportunity to bargain, or put pressure on Britain for more reforms – as the price for their support against Germany. Britain simply saw it as subversive blackmail to be suppressed and issued a warrant for Aung San's arrest. He fled to China seeking support from radical groups, but received it from Japan instead. With a promise of Japanese support for Burma's independence he returned to Burma, recruited 29 others, and went with them to Japan for military training. When the Japanese reached Bangkok in December 1941, Aung San announced the formation of the Burma Independence Army (BIA), and there was strong support for the Japanese when they advanced into Burma in 1942 and quickly occupied the country.

The Japanese appointed former prime minister Ba Maw head of state with Aung San and U Nu in cabinet, and with Aung San as commander of a reformed Burma Defence Army. In 1943 the Japanese declared Burma a fully independent sovereign state but, in the manner of all occupying powers, they maintained firm military rule. However, seeing the writing on the wall when the Allies gained the upper hand in the war, Aung San and the Thakins formed an anti-Fascist coalition, contacted Lord Mountbatten and, in March 1945, took their army, renamed the Burma National Army, over to the British and fought with them until the Japanese surrender in Burma in May. At that point the British military administration and some members of the prewar Burmese government demanded that Aung San face trial for treason, but Mountbatten intervened and no action was taken. However after the formal Japanese surrender and the return to British civil administration Aung San was arrested. With Burma about to erupt in rebellion it required the British government to change the governor in order to have the decision reversed and settle the country. Aung San was then included in a new cabinet; talks were commenced which led to an agreement being reached in January 1947 for the transfer of power to a sovereign state; and in June the decision was made that the new nation would leave the British Commonwealth.

However the situation was so confused and so bitter that groups at both ends of the political spectrum were opposed to the terms of the settlement. The Communists broke away and went underground, and the conservatives went into opposition. Aung San, then de facto prime minister, and six other cabinet members were assassinated on July 19, on the orders of an extremist conservative former prime minister, and the country plunged into crisis. The British governor asked U Nu to form a new cabinet; a new constitution was drafted; and on January 4, 1948, Burma became a sovereign independent republic, outside the British Commonwealth. So ended 62 years of colonial rule which had started because certain British traders, backed by their government, insisted that a vibrant, responsible and effective kingdom should be subjugated – out of sheer greed – and that government, hand in glove with its churches decided that it should be converted from Buddhism to Christianity. It was another illustration of the amorphous Christian gel at work – par excellence. Another of the most sparkling jewels in the British imperial crown had been lost. It was one of the jewels east of Suez which Britain had gone to war to prevent from slipping out of its grasp, and the harder it tried to cling to its jewels, the deeper the dungeon of war became and the more certain it was that they would slip out of its grasp.

THE FRENCH INDOCHINA SAGA¹⁷⁰

France progressively imposed suzerainty over the three countries of Indochina – Vietnam, Laos and Cambodia – as protectorates between 1858 and 1893, at about the same time that Britain was doing so to Burma. France took full advantage of assorted wars between the Indochinese group and Burma and Siam, both of which had been trying to expand their empires, by intervening to help resolve border disputes. However in each case their status soon changed.

In the case of Vietnam, persecution of the Catholic community was used as a pretext for French intervention in 1858, the introduction of special “missionary” passports to help the process along (chapter 15), followed by a full invasion the following year to capture Saigon. Eight years later it succeeded in occupying the whole of southern Vietnam and annexing it as the colony of Cochinchina. It then precipitated another war in 1883 to secure first Hanoi and then Annam and Tonkin as protectorates, and in 1887 it was able to amalgamate the two regions under one governor general. King Norodom of Cambodia, having accepted protectorate status in 1863 was forced, at gun point, to sign an agreement in 1884 transforming his country from a protectorate to a full French colony. Laos was the last of the trio to fall to France. In a weakened state it had come under the control of Siam, and in order to avoid war with the French in Vietnam after a series of naval 'incidents' in the Mekong River, Siam agreed to cede the bulk of Laos – everything west of the Mekong – directly to France in 1893. Within a few years France had taken control of the remaining area, east to the border with Burma, and between 1904 and 1907 it formally annexed each of the three Laotian states. It had little interest in their territory except as a buffer between resource-rich Vietnam and Siam.

Having gained control of the entire area of Indochina France established an Indochinese Union under which the three subjugated royal houses retained their status as heads of governments in a federal system in which the central government was responsible for foreign affairs, defence, customs, finance and public works. In fact, the French Governor-General, Paul Doumer, who took up his post in 1897, held all the power. He deposed and replaced Vietnamese emperors at will, and all important government posts were staffed with French officials. That situation persisted even in the 1930s, after reforms and concessions had been made to placate local nationalist sentiment. Vietnamese officials held only minor positions at very low salaries.

The French policy was unabashed rapid and systematic exploitation of coal, minerals, rubber and rice for French industry by French investors and a market for tariff-protected goods of French industries. Construction of railroads, highways, harbours, bridges, canals, and other public works, all built by the French, was planned solely for that purpose. The development of local industry was limited to the production of goods for immediate local consumption: breweries, distilleries, small sugar refineries, rice and paper mills, and glass and cement factories. The largest venture was a textile factory at Nam Dinh, which employed more than 5,000 workers. Because the aim was immediate high returns for French investors, very little profit was reinvested.

Irrigation works, chiefly in the Mekong delta, quadrupled rice production between 1880 and 1930. It was a minuscule increase compared with that in Burma, but during that period consumption of rice by peasant families fell – and not due to the substitution of other foods. Land was either sold to the highest bidder, without regard to the rights of peasants in the area, or at nominal prices to Vietnamese collaborators and French speculators. Two new classes developed: landlords, and landless tenants who worked the landlords' fields for rents of up to 60 percent of the crop, compared with the maximum of 25 per cent which SCAP set under the land tenure reform program which it imposed in Japan a few years later. Market control and exploitation was such that peasants who owned their land were rarely better off than the landless tenants. Their share of the export market price was less than 25 percent. As in Burma, the peasants lost their land during the Depression, almost systematically, because they were unable to repay loans from landlords and moneylenders at exorbitant interest rates. By the mid 1930's 45 per cent of the land was owned by less than three percent of landowners, while small peasant farmers who made up about 70 percent of the owners, held about 15 percent. In a country in which, before colonization, the economy and the social system had been based on small-holder family farming, an estimated half of the population was without land by the start of the Second World War.

Direct and indirect taxes levied by France to finance public works to support export industries disadvantaged the small holders further, and in addition forced labourers were employed for public works, on rubber plantations and in the mines under scandalous working conditions, with low wages, and poor medical care. At the height of the Depression there were close to 100,000 people working the mines of Vietnam. Social legislation introduced under pressure from the French Chamber of Deputies during the late 1920s was rarely enforced. In 1939, no more than 15 percent of all school-age children received any kind of schooling, and about 80 percent of the population was illiterate. In contrast, before annexation the majority of the people were literate to some degree. With a population of 20,000,000 in 1939, Vietnam had one university, with less than 700 students. Few Vietnamese children were admitted to secondary schools which were intended for French children. In 1939 there were 2 doctors per 100,000 Vietnamese, compared with 76 per 100,000 in Japan and 25 in the Philippines. Medical care was, however, well organized for the French in the cities. The social consequence of French colonial policy was that, apart from the landlords, no property-owning indigenous middle class developed in Vietnam. Such exploitative and neglectful policies meant that Capitalism and its evils appeared to the Vietnamese to be solely a product of foreign rule. Together with the lack of Vietnamese participation in government, this profoundly influenced the nature and orientation of the national resistance movements. Therefore although the focus of the initial French 'intervention' was religion, it was around economic and social issues that the nationalist and independence movements developed in French Indochina, in contrast to the religious focus in British India.

Nguyen Sinh Cung, later known as Ho Chi Minh, experienced the worst of those issues. Born in 1890, while the war of annexation was fresh in everyone's minds, his childhood was spent in wretched circumstances in the village of Kim Lien but from age 14 he was able to attend grammar school in Hue for five years. From 18 to 28 he saw a lot of the world: teaching, serving an apprenticeship, working as a cook on a French steamer which visited various African ports and the American cities of Boston and New York, and living in London for two years. He moved to France in 1917 and worked in assorted jobs at the height of the war, became an active socialist, organized a group of Vietnamese living there and, in 1919, in his first significant political act, addressed a petition to the Versailles Peace Conference, demanding that the French colonial power grant its subjects in Indochina equal rights with the rulers. It was totally ineffective, of course, but he was immediately recognized by politically conscious Vietnamese. The following year, inspired by the success of the communist revolution in Russia and Vladimir Lenin's anti-imperialist doctrine, Ho Chi Minh joined the French Communists when they formed a party separate from the Socialists. In 1923 he moved from France to Russia, where he took an active part in the fifth Congress of the Communist International in 1924. His statement to the congress set out his belief in the importance of the revolutionary role of oppressed peasants, as opposed to industrial workers. He went next to Canton, a Chinese Communist stronghold, where he recruited the first cadres of the Vietnamese nationalist movement, mainly Indochinese exiles, later called the Thanh Nien.

When Chiang Kai-shek expelled the Chinese Communists from Canton in April 1927, Ho Chi Minh travelled via the Soviet Union, Brussels and Paris to Siam where he served as a representative of the Communist International for two years. The decision to form an Indochinese Communist Party was taken by members of the Thanh Nien meeting in Hong Kong in May 1929, and others, in Hanoi, Hue, and Saigon undertook the organizing work until February, 1930, when Ho Chi Minh returned at the height of the Depression and presided at the founding of the party Vietnamese (later Indochinese) Communist Party (PCI). The founding of the PCI coincided with, but was not directly linked to, a violent anti-French uprising. However in a reaction typical of those in entrenched repressive power – ‘don’t fix the problem, kill the messenger’ – Ho Chi Minh was blamed and condemned to death in his absence as a revolutionary. The French sought his extradition from the British in Hong Kong but he was able to get to Moscow. Five years later the seventh Congress of the Communist International sanctioned the establishment of a Popular Front alliance with the non-Communist left groups against Fascism; and a moderate line was adopted until repression recommenced in Indochina following the defeat of Léon Blum’s Popular Front government in France in 1937.
